ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I suggest that if the circumstances are such that the consideration of the Bill is taken with perhaps some haste, before points of this kind are made it should occur to the Deputy that he should weigh them well, even if they look attractive on the surface. I want to say, first of all, as regards this measure, in the few observations I have to make in closing, that it does not set up new Ministries. That statement has been made here by several Deputies. The Constitution provides for twelve Ministers; this Bill sets up no Ministers. This Bill takes existing departments of administration, sorts them out, divides them into their natural compartments and provides for their organisation, their method of making orders, and matters of that kind. It still remains possible to assign these departments in any number when a Ministry is being constituted to a Minister, provided that not less than five Ministers are appointed, and when people talk of creating a number of Government posts it has to be remembered that you have in the Constitution Ministers outside the Executive Council.

At the initiation of the present Government a number of Ministries were left outside the Executive Committee, and the Dáil could have assigned all these to the charge of a single individual if it had chosen, and everytime the Ministry is reconstituted the President of the Dáil will have it in his power to assign to any particular Ministers in his Executive as many Departments as he finds it convenient to do, and it will be for the Dáil to deal with the outstanding Departments and to assign them to one, or two, or three as the case may be. The only new thing in this Bill is the creation of Parliamentary Secretaries, and perhaps the only new thing is that power is given to pay salaries to Parliamentary Secretaries. The Dáil does not provide a large number of people who are able to work without remuneration, but even with this provision it is still possible that persons will be glad to serve a Parliamentary apprenticeship without stipend. Perhaps it would be too optimistic to hope that they might even pay an apprenticeship fee for the glory of serving in one of these offices. Subsequently when they have acquired the first elements of Parliamentary skill they might perhaps be paid, as Parliamentary improvers, at a somewhat more meagre rate than they would afterwards earn.

These are all matters which are quite fluid and open to criticism from year to year, and to determination from time to time. I do not think I have anything more to add to the observations I made the last day, save to emphasise this, that this is not the creation of Ministries, it is the organisation of administration; that the number of Ministers remains uncontrolled so far as this Bill is concerned, save by the Constitution and the will of the President of the day, and to suggest that before the Committee Stage perhaps we all shall have a more profound knowledge of the constitutional position of the various individual officers and Ministers.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: On a point of order, perhaps it may be more a point of procedure, might I submit that the Attorney-General has just stated that this Bill does not raise the question of the creation of new Ministries, but when the proposal for the nomination of certain Ministers to certain positions was before the Dáil on an earlier occasion, and certain criticisms were raised as to whether it was or was not desirable that such Ministries should exist for the conduct of certain Departmental duties, it was stated that these were questions which it would be more proper to raise when the Ministries Bill was before the Dáil. Therefore, I suggest that if the Attorney-General is now saying that these matters which were referred to this occasion from that earlier occasion may not be raised now, or may be estopped, by such arguments as the Attorney-General has raised, then the Dáil is in the extraordinary and unfortunate position of being told on occasion A that these matters must not be raised then, because they must be raised under B, and when B happens, we are told that they should not be then raised under B, because they should have been raised under A, so that we are in the extraordinary position of not being able to determine with any accuracy under what thimble we may find the pea.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I do not know exactly what the Deputy means. The point I wished to make was that the Ministers are not created by this Bill, that the Constitution has provided for Ministers, that this Bill provides for the division of administration into its natural distribution, and in addition contains the express power of assigning any Department or Departments to a single individual in any grouping that may be considered expedient. I have raised no question of estoppel.

Mr. JOHNSON: Perhaps I may be permitted to ask whether the Attorney-General will say that the Council of Defence as constituted under this Bill is something new.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The Council of Defence already exists under an Order, which I think has been laid on the Table of the Dáil. It was constituted some time ago.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Bill says "There shall be and is hereby constituted."

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: It gets legal and statutory existence from this Bill. Such Council has existed as a matter of administration for some time.

Captain REDMOND: Perhaps I may be permitted to ask the Attorney-General—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Is this on the point of order raised by Deputy Darrell Figgis?

Captain REDMOND: Yes. The question I wish to ask the Attorney-General is whether it is necessary for 4 o'clock. the Government to fill up all the Ministries created by our Constitution, and if that is not so, whether the filling up of these Ministries is not in effect the creation of them?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: If the Deputy was not here and had not heard my suggestion, perhaps I may make my suggestion now, that he should study the Constitution and he will find that that is not the case. There must be at least five, and beyond that no Ministries need be appointed.

Captain REDMOND: It is not necessary to create them?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: With regard to the limitation of debate, Deputy Figgis is fortunate in that nobody can limit his power of debate except myself, but he must not assume that the Attorney-General is making any endeavour to indicate the lines on which debates should go. I do not think the Attorney-General was doing so in any sense.

Mr. MILROY: The Attorney-General has reason to complain of the absence of some critics of the Bill, but my cause of complaint is rather the absence of the Head of the Department concerning which I wish to make some observations. That is the Department which shares with the Ministry of Fisheries the severest castigations by the critics of the Bill—the Ministry of External Affairs. I have no intention whatever of sharing in the expression of opinion that that Ministry should be scrapped. I think it is a very important Ministry and one that will be of great advantage to this State in international intercourse, and in raising the prestige of the Free State in world affairs, that is, provided it fully and effectively discharges its functions. At the moment I will not comment on whether it does or does not, but this is the point I wish to arrive at: There was a provision made on the last Estimates for the appointment of several representatives under that Department in various countries at a cost of £37,290, an increase of over £20,000 from the previous year's estimate.

I want to know what exactly are the functions these representatives fulfil. Particularly I want to know do they deal with our external trade. If so, why are they under this Department rather than the Department of Industry and Commerce? I looked through the Estimates and the definitions given to these representatives, and I only found one—in Paris—who is described as a trade representative. In Berlin, Rotterdam, Brussels and New York they are termed consuls; in Washington and Geneva representatives, and in Great Britain High Commissioner. I had on a previous occasion to make adverse comments upon the composition of the Ministry of Industry and Commerce, which I do not intend to pursue to-day, not because I have been convinced of any error of judgment in this matter, but because I wish to refer more specifically to this particular subject. If it is contended that all the economic arteries of this nation should be under some unity of command, such as the Ministry of Industry and Commerce, why is, what I might term our overseas trade, our foreign trade, not under the control or direction or influence of this Department? I suggest it should be. I suggest, with all due respect to the talents of the Minister for External Affairs, that matters dealing with economic life and trade and industry are not his particular speciality and not the subjects in which he shines with the greatest lustre. I suggest, also, that it is a cumbersome method of procedure, if the Minister for Industry and Commerce wishes to effect some beneficial result for Irish external trade in some foreign country, that he has to do so through the medium of the Minister for External Affairs, rather than through agents directly under the Ministry of Industry and Commerce. I should like to know, further, whether it is possible to ascertain the results that have been effected in this direction through the Ministry of External Affairs; what is the volume of our foreign trade and where it is located? I do not know whether it is possible to lay hands on data in regard to this matter, but I think it would be of importance. If these agents still remain under the control of the Minister for External Affairs I trust that when the Estimates for that Ministry are presented to the Dáil that we shall be given figures regarding the extent of the trade that is being secured or maintained as a result of the efforts of that Department.

This is not really a criticism of the Bill itself, because it is simply a suggestion with regard to certain powers embodied in the Bill. In Section 11 power is given to the Executive Council to redistribute or transfer from one Department to another certain functions, or authorities, or services, and I think it is extremely advisable that the Executive Council should consider the transfer of the control of the agents abroad, who deal with our foreign trade, from the Ministry of External Affairs to the Ministry of Industry and Commerce, in order that there may be a more direct, less cumbersome and more efficient control and direction of this matter. I have not a great deal of sympathy with most of the criticism that has been passed upon this Bill. It is in reality merely a setting up of the framework of the State's administration. It covers a very wide and comprehensive field. Neither do I agree with some of the comments which were incidentally introduced into the debate about the necessity for economy. I do not think this nation is yet bankrupt, and I wish Deputies would remember that we have only just emerged from the throes of a struggle with anarchy, and that we have not yet sufficiently stabilised the State so that we can live in normal times or think in the normal terms of a State's life. I believe some critics who have denounced extravagance would be the first to cry out for wholesale expenditure of the State's finances, if there was any outbreak of violence, in order that they might be saved from disaster. Let us remember that the State has just emerged from one of the most terrific trials that any State could have gone through and has emerged with the possibilities of stability and security. It is to make these definite and lasting that this Bill, I take it, is devised. But if we have only got the possibilities, those possibilities may yet again be overthrown and the country plunged back into chaos and disorder, if those who are responsible to the State refuse to give to those who have to exercise administrative charge the necessary means to render permanent the basis of peaceful development which we have secured.

Mr. WILSON: I think the Minister for Agriculture was singularly unfortunate in allowing the College of Science to be taken from his Department and given to the Ministry of Education. If agriculture is to be developed it is by means of research. I would like to know how the Minister now proposes to supply the means for developing research in agriculture. Singularly enough he takes charge of the College of Veterinary Science but refuses to take charge of an institution which will enable him, by research, to develop seeds and plants adaptable to this country; as well as to find means for preventing diseases in them. Take for example potato blight. There are varieties of potatoes able to resist the blight. The growers are told how to cure the disease when it comes, but there is nothing available to show the cause of the blight or how to produce potatoes that will resist it. Regarding animal diseases, the position of the Department of Agriculture is that when there is an outbreak on a farm, and when, say, five or six cattle are affected, if the local Veterinary Surgeon is not able to diagnose the disease the help of the Department is invoked. The duty of the Department's Inspector is not to find out what disease the cattle had but to ascertain if they had anthrax or foot-and-mouth disease. When he is satisfied that it is not a scheduled disease his duty is done. He goes away and as far as the Department is concerned everything is all right. There is no means by which the unfortunate farmer can be told what the cattle are suffering from and in what way the disease might be combated. I contend that as the Minister for Agriculture takes charge of the Veterinary Department, he should also take charge of research in regard to plant life. That can only be done at the College of Science. I think it is a mistake to allow that institution to be handed over to the Ministry of Education. I remember that there was a wheat-growing district in South Africa where a very suitable milling wheat was raised, but the straw became subject to rust. The Department of Agriculture in that country set to work and produced a seed that gave wheat of the same milling quality with a straw that resisted rust. If we had research in this country it would enable us to carry on the business of agriculture. Apart from the evils from which agriculture is now suffering we want more careful research into diseases, their cause, and also how to get better seeds. As to diseases of animals, I believe there should be a particular Department under the Minister for Agriculture that would investigate these diseases and find out what they are. Half of them are not known. At the present time there is in Co. Wicklow a disease known as "braxy" and the loss to this State from that disease amounts to £30,000 per annum. It would be a very good day that investigation would reveal the cause of a disease that inflicts so much damage on the country. If the Minister hands over the College of Science to the Minister for Education he is giving away the only weapon that can help the farmer to make progress.

Professor THRIFT: I think it is quite clear that this Bill is going to get its Second Reading with practically very little or no opposition. Some such Bill is necessary. There has been very little purely Second Reading criticism of the framework of the Bill. In fact, there are many very good points in that necessary framework. I, for one, think that even Deputy Wilson and the farmers will, later on, be very glad that the different branches of education and scientific work and scientific research have all been united. We may hope for some progress and co-ordination amongst the different branches of education once we have got one Minister to take charge of them all. But, I think it is very important, even at this stage, even though it is not strictly a Second Reading criticism, to stress, from as many points of view as possible, the objections which seem to me to lie against the two clauses, which have received most attention from the previous speakers. I mean the clauses referring to the seven Parliamentary Secretaries and the Army—Clauses 7 and 8 of the Bill, I think they are. Even though I run some risk of coming under the lash of the Attorney-General, I will say that it seems to me in the time that I have been able to give to the consideration of this Bill, that both these clauses are open to one line of criticism. That is, that the Ministry have attempted in a Bill, which they themselves wish to be permanent in form, to meet difficulties which arise from exceptional circumstances. I think it would be wiser in a Bill of this kind, which is intended to be permanent, to make it permanent and not, as the Minister for Agriculture said, elastic, too. If the Bill is made elastic it may be stretched in a way that the framers would not intend it to be stretched. I think it would be wiser if the Bill were made permanent, so that, as far as our lights would go, it would deal with matters which we intend to be in the future permanent, or for a long time, at any rate.

If the Government dealt in a separate way with their proposals for meeting exceptional difficulties, I am quite prepared to admit what the Government claims, the urgent importance of meeting those exceptional difficulties. I am quite prepared to admit that the Ministers are seriously overworked, for example, and that they need Parliamentary help at present. Whether that will be a permanent necessity or not I do not think we can say now. I am quite prepared to admit the need at present for all this suggested Council of Defence, for example. The Minister for Defence the other day said what I am now about to say. It seems to me that this proposal for a Council of Defence is assuming and taking it for granted, in a way that we cannot decide at present, whether it ought to be so taken for granted or not—the existence of a Standing Army. We cannot now go into that question with advantage. I think this proposal assumes that that is going to be the case. I think it would be wiser for the Government to defer such a discussion until we see what the developments in the next two or three years are going to be. I think also that it is regrettable, at a time when there is such urgent need for economising, when the Minister for Finance himself said that he was determined to balance the budget, and that he was sure it would take the greatest cheeseparer in order to be able to balance the budget, that the Government should come in and ask for power to spend money, which they say in the same breath that they do not think they will spend, and which they hope they will not have to spend. I think to put such power into the Bill is regrettable. I think it would be wiser to get powers to deal with the present emergencies in the present overworking of the Ministers in a separate Bill.

On the whole, I hope, when we come to the Committee Stage, we shall succeed in getting from the Government important modifications of these two clauses. I think, however, there will also be other alterations required in the Committee Stage of the Bill. I suggest to the Attorney-General for consideration, for example, the introduction of a schedule of repealed clauses. I do not see any such in the Bill. As I said in the commencement, the Bill is capable of much modification in the Committee stage, and I think it is probable it will commend itself to us as far as this Second Reading is concerned, and that we will pass it with little or no opposition.

PADRAIG MAG UALGHAIK: Níl mórán agam le rádh ar an Bhille seo. I merely take part in this debate to deal with one extraordinary thing that I notice here in the arguments that are being used in the criticism of this Bill. And that is as regards the Minister for Fisheries. I see here a sort of concentrated attack, or a desire to arraign that Ministry as one of those which should be scrapped for the sake of economy. I think if there is need for any Ministry in this nation it is a Ministry of Fisheries, and no department in this nation requires the service and encouragement and guidance that a Minister could give it more than the fishing industry. We have so many looking to this industry for their livelihood, and so many people who are so absolutely dependent upon it, and upon the development of this industry, that its importance cannot be overstated. We have, at the same time, a field for development in this industry that does not appertain to other countries. We have a prospect of national wealth from that industry, and we should concentrate our energies in trying to obtain and secure it. I think the arguments that have been urged to scrap and do away with that Ministry are not well or intelligently directed. I admit that the industry, at the present time, is going through a period of stress and trial, and going through difficulties that appertain generally to the same industry in other countries. But it is not at that period of stress or difficulty that we here, who are charged as a body with debating the affairs of the nation, should withdraw from that industry the encouragement which it is necessary it should get to tide it over this period of difficulty, and if possible to bring it to some prospect of success and development. It is a bad time for the doctor to retire when the epidemic is all round. I think now is the time that that industry should be backed up and that something should be done to get it over its difficulties and bring it along its proper road to development.

I am not so much concerned with the other criticisms of this Bill or with some gentlemen who, with clear optical vision, can see ghosts of British Kings and Commanders - in - Chief flying around. Whatever credit they are entitled to for these superior discerning powers, they are certainly not doing any good to the nation by making those allegations which are absolutely groundless. I would urge upon the Ministry to stand behind this Ministry of Fisheries and see that it is properly directed, and that it does its duty.

Mr. GOREY: Finance!

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I would also urge upon the Ministry to see that there is something done for those people who have to live by the fishing industry, to enable them to earn a livelihood or benefit in some small way. Finally, I may say it is an industry by which can be accumulated wealth for the nation, and I would strongly urge on the Ministry to put that industry on the right road.

The PRESIDENT: I do not know that much remains for me to say on this Bill, except again to refer to the fact that the criticisms which have appeared in regard to it, notably in the "Independent," and to which I have already referred, are criticisms which, on examination of the accounts or the charges made by the "Independent," will not bear the same scrutiny as the proposals we have here. In 1914, I think, you could purchase the "Independent" for a halfpenny, and to-day you pay 2d. for it. That fact is not blazoned in the same little frames that the Attorney-General spoke of; but it is a fact, notwithstanding. There are other reasons, sir, which have prompted those particular references to the Ministries' Bill. I do not think it is necessary for me to go into them now as far as that journal is concerned, but I will refer to them later on if necessary. I think, sir, you know something of that yourself. This Bill is one of the most important measures which will come before the Dáil. In most of the criticisms either here or in the Press, very little consideration has been given to one or two or three important matters. One is that previous to the setting up of the Saorstát there were two Governments functioning or attempting to function in this country. The one which had the confidence of the people had naturally many of the defects of a young Government. The one which was attempting to function in spite of the people must naturally, during the progress of the struggle, have become very much disorganised, and in that disorganised state it was handed over to us, one of the conditions being that practically every official having a certain status in the employment of that Government was entitled, under certain headlines, to demand compensation and to leave the service. As a consequence of that particular provision, we have a very heavy charge to meet annually for a number of years to come.

The real point in mentioning these peculiarities of the particular period in question is that in order to reorganise that Government machinery, certain checks have got to be made and certain administrative control has had to be secured, and in order to get that administrative control we have, during the last twelve months, had three Parliamentary Secretaries, and it is proposed in the Bill to empower the Executive Council to have seven. It is not proposed either inside or outside the Executive Council to have at any time more than three; but it is in our judgment necessary that sufficient authority should be there to make such appointments if and when it is considered necessary to do so.

Mr. DAVIN: Would the President mind telling the Dáil the names of the Parliamentary Secretaries in the Third Dáil?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is not a relevant matter.

The PRESIDENT: No, and I think the Deputy knows it.

Mr. JOHNSON: I do not know it. It is quite news to me. I thought there was an Assistant Minister for one, and a Minister without Portfolio for another. I did not know of any Parliamentary Secretaries.

The PRESIDENT: We may not have called them Parliamentary Secretaries, but I suppose some time or another, when we do commence to give them a statutory position, they are entitled to some baptismal appellation, and if the name is not one by which, officially, they were hitherto known, it will be made more distinct in future. The real question is how far it is possible in this Bill to make for efficiency in Government control. Those who are comparing the appointments of the Ministries in this Bill with those of other States, or other Governments, compare a new State in the circumstances I have mentioned with old States functioning normally and with none of the difficulties that we have had to contend with. I have already mentioned, in the lifetime of the last Dáil, the amount of time that is occupied in dealing with adjustments, financial and otherwise, with the British Government. That time may not be measured in the length of service the Minister can give or the number of hours he can serve in his office. Another consideration which was present to our minds was that in our experience in maintaining a Government which had the confidence of the people from the year 1919 to the signing of the Treaty, we had a Ministry of Fisheries, and we learned that this particular service of Fisheries was an important one, one in which a very large amount of money could be lost, and on which, as a matter of fact, during the time of the First Dáil, a considerable amount of money was expended.

From the experience we had during that time, we learned it would not be advisable to run Fisheries as a Department, and that the amount of money that might be expended on maintaining a Minister in control of it might be saved to the State in years to come from the experience we would have of his administration and the attention he could give to this Ministry. For almost twelve months now the procedure which is outlined here in Clause 8 has been practically the same. In other words, there has been an Army Council, and it is in the light of that experience that this proposal is put forward. I do not know that there is anything further I could say on this Bill. Certainly, from what we have heard of the discussion that has taken place, it is evident that the Bill will receive very close consideration on the Third Stage, and I do not propose to say anything more on it now.

Motion declared carried.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: When is it proposed to take the Third Stage?

The PRESIDENT: Provisionally, I should say, the next day we meet after this week. The Minister for 5 o'clock. Finance will not have his statement ready until Friday. He would like to take the Dáil into his confidence on that day with regard to certain proposals he has to make. If a longer period is required I am quite prepared to consider it. Say this day fortnight.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Committee Stage is ordered for this day fortnight. Under the Standing Orders, amendments must be in on the fourth day preceding that.

THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S ADDRESS (MOTION FOR RESOLUTION OF THANKS).—AMENDMENT RE FISHING INDUSTRY.

Debate resumed on Motion: "That the Dáil returns thanks to the Governor-General for his Address and approves of the legislative programme of the Government, as outlined therein." (Mr. James Burke.)

Mr. THOMAS O'CONNELL: I beg to move as an amendment:—

"To delete all after the word 'Dáil,' line 1, and to substitute therefor the words 'regrets that in its outline of proposed legislation, as disclosed in the Governor-General's Address, the Government has not included any proposals for the encouragement and development of the fishing industry.'"

Several weeks have now elapsed since this amendment appeared on the Order Paper. My object in putting it down was to direct attention to the fact that in the comprehensive outline of the proposed legislation set forth in the Governor-General's Address, no reference had been made to this very important matter. Since then we have had many discussions in this Dáil in connection with the fishing industry, and the Ministry of Fisheries, in one form or another, and we have had notice, by the Minister for Fisheries, of a Bill to make certain provision in connection with inland fisheries. That all goes to show that the Governor-General's speech is not always to be taken as a true criterion of the programme of the Government's legislation. The proposed Bill refers entirely to inland fisheries, and my remarks will deal largely, if not entirely, with the question of deep sea fisheries. In my opinion the fishing industry in Ireland is, or ought to be, and could be, an industry second only to agriculture itself, and I think there is very great room, indeed, for the development, and for the fostering and encouragement of this industry.

Much attention has been paid, in the past, to the development of agriculture in the country, though we all agree that sufficient attention had not been paid to it. Possibly one reason for the neglect—the wholesale neglect—on the part of the former Government of this country of this important industry of fisheries, was that while England undoubtedly wanted our cattle, and our poultry, and our butter, she had little or no desire for our fish.

I may say at the outset, believing as I do, that there is in this industry very great room indeed for increased action and development, I do not hold the view—it is a personal view—that there is no need at the moment for a distinct and separate Ministry of Fisheries. I believe that economy, or so called economy, effected by savings on such matters as education or on an industry of this kind, is not true economy, and will have the effect only of increasing the waste of effort and opportunity in other directions. The Government and the country have done a good deal for agriculture. The credit of this country has been pledged, to a very great extent, and it may be necessary that something in the same direction will need to be done to put the fishing industry on a proper basis. The success of the fishing industry depends, like every other industry, almost entirely on proper organisation and proper education of those engaged in it. This organisation and education ought to be undertaken by the Government. We have the question of production, in the first case, and the question of marketing. From the point of view of production we have to consider the people who are engaged in it, the provision of fishing gear, boats, and such matters, and also we want to have the fish. I might say that so far as the man power is concerned, this industry is a skilled one, in the strictest sense of the word, and undoubtedly, owing to the neglect of the fishing industry during the past few years, the number of skilled men is now rapidly decreasing, and this is a matter that will have to be looked into very urgently.

It is rather a strange thing that only one side of the question has really received any attention at the hands of those whose duty it was to foster it. It is almost entirely, so far as Ireland is concerned, a seasonal occupation and is concerned with the inshore fishing for herring and mackerel, whereas in other countries very much attention is paid to fishing for other varieties of fish rather than herring and mackerel which find a market during the greater part of the year. There is a question of the provision of gear. That is especially a matter in which the Government can give very great help. There is first of all the necessity for experimental and educative work. It is necessary that those fishermen engaged in the work should know the most suitable class of gear to use. There is also the question of the provision of gear, and, as there is very great initial outlay required, the Government must come to the help of those engaged in the industry in order that they may be able to help by short loans or some such method. I am informed that most of the gear used in the fishing industry is manufactured outside the Saorstát. If that is the case I think there is here a great opportunity of developing what might be regarded as a side line to the industry in connection with fishing.

at this stage took the chair.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Nets, for instance, are not made except in one place, I believe, in the Saorstát. Barrels for curing the fish are imported. If that is the case I think this is one of the first things with which the Ministry might concern itself because in these things the production of gear and accessories would in itself form a very useful industry. In some countries very great help is given to those engaged in the fishing industry in providing information as to the movements of fish. I do not know whether that has been attended to here. In some countries aeroplanes are used for this purpose. It is not so much a question of production of the fish that is necessary, as a question of marketing the fish. Fish is a perishable food and rapid transit is really the key to the problem of marketing. Nothing has been done, so far as I know, in the way of organising transit to suit this particular industry. The railways have made no efforts, so far as I know, to accommodate the fishermen and very often we have instances of large catches of fish which have to be thrown into the harbour again because they cannot be dealt with. This provision of cheap and rapid transit is one of the first things which the Ministry should take in hands. I do not know whether they can do that with the powers they already have. If they cannot, I suggest that they should look for increased powers, because, as I have already stated, this is really the key to the development of the industry. There is also the question of the provision of motor transit in certain districts.

The Arran Island Fisheries are some of the most important we have in the country, and fishing for herring especially is done in the Sound between the Arran Islands and the Galway coast. They take their fish into Galway, a distance of 30 miles. The fishermen lose one or two days per week, and there are other delays whereas there is a harbour along the coast of Galway about nine miles from the Arran Islands at Coshla, where, if the fish could be sent by motor to Galway, the fishermen could fish and land their catches inside an hour. There are several instances of that kind especially in the Connemara area where a motor service could be established and they would help very much in expediting the transit of fish to the markets, but in addition to transit you have the question of providing markets, and here, I think, there is a great scope for the efforts of the Minister. The inland markets are not developed. There is nothing being done to bring the people in the Midlands and the inland portion of this country into touch with people engaged in the fishing industry on the coasts. The result is that whatever little fish is used in the country is, to a great extent, imported from the East coast of England with the exception of some herrings and mackerel in season. There could be a market in Ireland, if a scheme of advertising or organisation were undertaken whereby the Government would come in to help the people who want this cheap and wholesome food to get it from the people engaged in the industry. I do not know of course, as I have already stated, whether or not new powers or new legislation were required by the Ministry to do the things which I have been suggesting in outline are necessary to develop the industry. Any powers necessary I hold should be asked for by the Minister, and I have no doubt the Dail would agree to give him these powers.

There is a question which has been touched on here before, namely, the protection of the fisheries. I am not quite satisfied that there is not at the moment sufficient protection provided for our fisheries. Foreign trawlers are invading our fishing grounds, and more measures should be taken to increase the measure of protection for our fishing grounds. A branch of the industry which has been neglected, I think, is the provision of curing stations. I do not know whether in the Saorstát any form of curing fish, except one, that is the salting of fish and the packing of them in barrels, is resorted to, but I suggest that there are other forms of curing which ought to be encouraged, for instance, the provision of kippers and bloaters. I do not know whether Irish kippers and bloaters could be provided or obtained. I rather think they cannot. The whole question of the fishing industry is so very wide that there are very many points which can only be touched on in a debate of this kind. My object will be served if I succeed in directing public attention to the necessity of encouraging this industry established on the western coast. It will solve to a large extent the problem of the Connemara areas where agriculture as such is really out of the question, and where this industry is the only mainstay of the inhabitants. The matter of inland fisheries is being dealt with in a Bill which has just been introduced, as I have said, by the Ministry of Fisheries since this amendment was put down, and I have no doubt that other deputies who are more competent than I am to deal with that particular branch of the industry will have something to say to that matter in the debate.

SEoirse de Bhulbh: Ba mhaith liom cúpla focal a rádh ar leas-rún Theachta Uí Chonaill ar chúrsai iasgoir-eachta na h-Eireann. Deputy O'Connell's amendment is very interesting and most important to a very large number of people; in fact, it is one of the most important subjects that we could possibly discuss. I agree with a great deal that he said, but I do not agree with him in this, that we should scrap the Minister for Fisheries. I think fishing is an industry that well deserves to have a Minister at its head, being of such importance.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I am in agreement with the Deputy, but I rather said that we should keep the Minister.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: We cannot go into the question of the retention of the Minister or of dispensing with his services on this amendment.

Mr. Woulfe: Deputy O'Connell dealt very fully with sea fishing, and he has not left very much for me to say, except that I might suggest, in addition to the industries in connection with it that might be developed, the making of barrels and nets, there is also an opening for the manufacture of ice to be used in connection with the removal of the fish, and this, with the other industries he mentions, if developed and fostered by the Government, would give a great deal of employment. It is a monument to the inefficiency of the Government from which we have escaped, that the industry has remained in the state in which it is. In fact, the English Government were only shamed into doing something for Ireland in regard to fishing by the philanthropic action of Lady Burdett-Coutts when, years ago, she enabled the fisherman of the North-Western coast to obtain proper fishing vessels. That was a matter that ought to have been done by the Government, and it should not have been left to any individual. Leaving the sea fishing, so ably dealt with by Deputy O'Connell, and proceeding to the inland fishing, of which I know a little, I can say that there is no doubt that in the fisheries of the lakes and rivers, we have, or ought to have, a great source of wealth. I have seen it stated that they would be worth about £2,000,000 a year if properly developed. If the Scotch people had our rivers and lakes in addition to their own, they would have developed them to the last degree. Somehow or other, we seem to [Mr. Woulfe.] have been apathetic in working them up as they should have been. There is no doubt that in Scotland a great revenue comes to the Government through licences for fishing, and a great deal of money comes into the country in other ways—about £1,000,000, or perhaps more—through what hotel-keepers make and otherwise. In Ireland, I am afraid, the amount received from licences is extremely small.

It ought to be very big, but the apathy that has been over us seems to have covered the fishing industry entirely for years as regards the lakes and rivers. There has been no proper supervision over these for a great many years. It is notorious that Ireland has been the happy hunting ground of the poacher. The man with the rod and the gun practically walked all over the place, paid nothing, and had a very comfortable and very pleasant time for himself, but it was not a profitable time for the revenue of the country. This is a thing which will be for the Minister for Fisheries to settle. I have been, for my sins, on a bench of magistrates for 30 years, and during that time I do not think I have ever seen a conviction for poaching carried through successfully. It has been notorious that poaching on the rivers and lakes was carried on to such an extent that it would be impossible to develop them in any way until it was stopped. Certain efforts were made to stock the rivers, but it was only putting so much more fish into them for the poachers. A great deal of this is, of course, owing to the multiplicity of riparian owners, who do not act together, and what is everybody's business is nobody's business. The consequence was that nothing was done, and the rivers and lakes were simply left derelict. That is not a healthy state of affairs, and it will be for the Minister for Fisheries to put a stop to, for no industry can prosper if it is at the mercy of everybody who chooses to poach. The recent Land Acts have been greatly responsible for this. The multiplicity of owners makes it impossible for anybody successfully to keep the rivers free from poaching, or the lakes either. I would suggest to the Government that it will be necessary for them to have a much stricter control over the rivers than hitherto, either by putting life into the derelict Boards which are supposed to manage this matter, and making them see that prosecutions are carried out, and that rivers and lakes are worked for all they are worth. Until that is done, it will be hopeless to do anything with this industry, as far as the lakes and rivers are concerned. If they do that, I think it will be well worth any expense that they may have to incur, because I am sure that from the fishing a very large surplus will go to the Government from licences, and in other ways money will be brought into the country. I am sure that if the Government do this they will have the country at their back, because it is a notorious fact that for years this industry has not been fostered, has not had the Government attention that it should have.

Mr. O'DOHERTY: To develop the sea fishing Deputy O'Connell has laid down three main factors with which I entirely agree, the teaching of the men how to fish, rapid transit, and the obtaining of suitable markets. There can be no doubt that these three things are necessary to make sea fishing a success.

He also mentioned that nets and other equipment for this purpose should be produced in Ireland. I thoroughly agree with him that the Saorstát should be able to do its own work in that respect, but I am sorry to disagree with him in the method by which he wishes to carry out his proposal. It would not require one, but three Ministers to carry out efficiently the proposals which Deputy O'Connell laid down. I represent a constituency where there is a very large sea fishing population. I know the conditions of the trade and the hardships that the men have to suffer, and I know where the shoe pinches. Mention was made by a previous Deputy that the British Government deserved blessings for having left the fishing trade in an excellent condition. My own observation is that the intervention of the British Government Departments in the fishing trade has caused more ruin than the greatest calamity that could occur.

Mr. WOULFE: On a point of order, I did not say that. I said that the state the fishing industry was left in was a monument to the late Government's inefficiency.

Mr. O'DOHERTY: I apologise to the Deputy. My own plan is, and I think it is a course that should be adopted by Deputies representing constituencies where the fishing population is pretty large, that the Deputies should organise the fishermen in their districts and lay before them some practical scheme that would suit their districts, and present it to the Minister for his investigation. I hope to have a little representation made of that kind myself. To give effect to Deputy O'Connell's first suggestion, we should have trained fishermen. We should take up first of all the scientific training of the fishermen, and for that purpose the best course, in my opinion, is to employ a skipper from Grimshy, Hull or Fleetwood, with a modern trawler, and place her, with a crew of fishermen in the district concerned to learn the trade. They could be paid on the results of the fishing, which should also pay for the overhead charges of the boat. I understand that boats of that kind can be chartered for six months at a cost of £500. The overhead charges, payment of the skipper, engineer and fireman, and the cost of marketing the fish, would come out of the results of the sales, and the rest would go to the fishermen. With six such boats you could train in six months something like 120 fishermen, and in this way you would have 120 skilled skippers ready to take up this trade. It would also prove that the fish are there, and that the business could be worked commercially. That being so, at the end of six months no difficulty would be found in setting up companies and providing capital to carry out fishing in a scientific way. I suggest to the Minister that that plan might be adopted. Deputy O'Connell might see in the West whether the fishermen can supply a scheme. It need not necessarily be the one I have sketched. I think it would be the easiest way out of the difficulty, considering the straitened financial condition in which the Dáil finds itself.

Mr. GOREY: I see the necessity for this addition to the Address. Our fisheries, inland and sea, have been neglected, and no attempt has been made to develop them. We have been only tinkering with this question before and since the war, and there is no use in saying that at any time an attempt has been made at protection or development. I will deal with the question shortly of inland fisheries. Except the State is prepared to finance the Ministry of Fisheries I see very little hope for inland or sea fisheries. These fisheries ought to be the property of the State absolutely, and there ought to be no private ownership in inland fisheries. To justify State expenditure, we cannot spend money in the interests of the individual. Fish is a different quantity from anything else. You cannot keep fish fenced in on a farm. They are passing through the sea and rivers, and what would be good nationalised in a river would be altogether wrong in regard to the land. The Ministry of Fisheries, and the inland fisheries, will never be a success until we have proper protection. Hundreds and hundreds of miles of our streams never had protection. I have letters from Portarlinton complaining that spawning fish has been hawked round the town and sold at anything that can be got for it at present. I have the same complaints from Clonmel, Carrick-on-Suir, and from every part of the country I am acquainted with, and that has always been the way. I knew cases where spawning fish were taken in such quantities that they were salted, put into the barrels and fed to the pigs—spawning salmon taken at weirs and mills. If a proper system were adopted this could be changed. The money at the disposal of the Boards of Conservators is not sufficient, or anything like it, to police the rivers. The system is all wrong in a good many districts, but it may be right, or nearly right, in others. The Civic Guard and the Military have been mentioned as being of great assistance. In order to make me believe that statement I would like to see the exact figures, and the names of the places where this assistance has been given. The Royal Irish Constabulary under the old régime were not of much assistance; in fact they were none at all. Their operations were few and far between.

It is not intended, I believe, to have as many Civic Guards in the Free State as there were R.I.C. If that is so what assistance can the Civic Guard be as they will have other duties to perform? If you attach to the Civic Guard a certain number of men specially trained in protection duty, and the detection of poaching, you could easily form a very effective force for the purpose. They could always find accommodation at the Civic Guard barracks, and could be transferred from district to district as the occasion requires. By that means you could form a very effective machine. You would not require so many, just a few in every Inspector's district. It has been suggested that we should have organisation amongst fishermen. That might be possible, but I would have very little hope from such organisation, because we find that some fishermen bring out their boats in the close season and kill spawning fish as well as other people. As to sea-fishing, I am not competent to deal with that matter. On the question of inland fishing I would ask the Government, and the Minister in particular, very seriously to consider the position and endeavour, if possible, to make it a State concern. There is no use saying that money cannot be found. Money can be found for other things that are not necessary at all, such as in connection with the Bill which has just got a second reading. Yet we are told that money cannot be found for an industry that would give a means of living to thousands of people. A Government with that outlook does not deserve to be the Government of the country. I put it seriously to the Government to make this a State concern, and to put finances at the disposal of the Minister to develop the industry.

Major COOPER: Deputy Gorey issued a challenge just now as to the effectiveness of the Civic Guard and military in protecting fisheries. I am glad to be in a position to answer that challenge. I own a salmon fishery in Co. Sligo, and in the early part of this year, when I was a private individual, I applied to the Minister for Fisheries to see if he could give any protection to my water-bailiffs to check the poaching on a large scale which was going on. The Minister took the matter up with the Minister for Defence, and the latter undertook to give protection. As a result four poachers were caught, and they were fined by the District Justice on a far higher scale than poachers were ever fined by any Resident Magistrate. That is, at any rate, one instance in which the Government have been effective, and I know Deputy Gorey will be glad to hear it. As the proprietor of a salmon fishery I felt rather sorry that Deputy O'Connell, in his reasoned speech, made so much reference to sea fisheries, and so little to the inland fisheries, because the value of salmon and trout fisheries is really far greater, from a financial point of view, to the country than that of herring and mackerel, although the herring and mackerel fishing gives more employment. I am in general agreement with what he said about them, except on the question of transit. I do not think the transit question is quite as bad, at any rate where there is a railway system, as he suggested. No doubt in Belmullet and places like that, where there is no railway system, it is as bad as possible, and if the fish cannot be sold locally it has to be sold for manure. I have been most successful in marketing fish, mostly in Liverpool and Manchester. Even last year while the fighting was going on at the Four Courts, and when it was extremely difficult, I was able to get my fish to Greenore, and from thence to Liverpool and Manchester. I think if it is a regular business, with regular supplies, the railway companies will make an endeavour to deal with it. Perhaps it is lack of regular organisation and of making regular consignments that causes these complaints of bad transit to be made. With regard to markets, particularly in the Saorstát, I am in complete agreement with Deputy O'Connell. Not only are there inland towns in which you cannot get fish, but there are seaport towns where you cannot be sure of getting fish. In the town of Sligo, on five days out of six, you cannot count on getting fish. There may be an old man pushing a barrow round the town from whom you may be able to buy herrings, but if you want to be sure of getting any fish for a specific purpose you have to send 130 miles to Dublin. That is actually where there is tidal water, and within eight miles of a place where there are fishermen with fishing boats. If you go to a shop that is supposed to sell fish you probably find a couple of old hens and a rabbit in the window. Part of the blame lies with the fishermen. Fishermen, I think, are very apt to be easily discouraged. They do not realise the importance of keeping regular markets. If the day looks inclement, or for one reason or another they very often do not go to sea. They do not realise that that means that people will get out of the habit of eating fish. I am not at all sure, although Deputy O'Connell said that fish is a cheap and wholesome food, that it is very much appreciated by the average Irishman. I think we are naturally a meat-eating people. Historically we have always been a meat-eating people. The ancient Irish eat a very large quantity of meat and very little of anything else. I agree with Deputy O'Connell that it is very desirable that we should eat more fish because it is cheap and wholesome and gives employment. I gather that the Minister has some scheme of marketing, and I hope he will give some details of it when he replies.

On the general question, I do not dissent from Deputy O'Connell's amendment, but I would point out that the Government have been better than their word. Though they did not promise legislation they are promoting legislation in regard to inland fisheries, as there is a Bill down for Second Reading to-day. What is really needed is not legislation. As Deputy Gorey said it is administration and protection that we need more, so that if the Government resist this amendment and do not accept it I shall certainly vote with the Government.

Mr. JOHNSON: I would like to point out that the amendment proposed by Deputy O'Connell does not suggest that there should be proposals for legislation, but that there should be contained in the Address proposals for the encouragement and development of the fishing industry. I suggest that there are powers in the hands of the Government at present, without legislation, which would enable them to encourage and develop the fishing industry. Deputy Gorey has stated that he does not know very much about sea fishing, and he, therefore, prefers not to enlarge upon that. I do not know very much about inland fishing, and I do not intend to enlarge on it. On the principle he suggested to the Government, that inland fisheries at any rate, and possibly also sea fisheries, should be State protected, if not State owned—I think he stated State owned—I commend his advice to the Dáil, just pointing out that Deputy Gorey when he comes up against a practical proposition arrives at the conclusion the Labour Party came to some time ago. The Minister has set up a Committee of Inquiry into inland fisheries. I want to put to him the importance of taking into consideration the views of men who are engaged in salmon fishing at the mouths of such rivers as the Shannon. Men have been engaged for generations fishing at Limerick. I do not know how many men are engaged in that industry in a similar way throughout the country, but there are a considerable number, and their interests are of great importance. I would suggest to the Minister that he would be well advised to add to this Committee members of that fraternity, and I use the word advisedly because in the case of Limerick, at any rate, you have a fraternity of men whose families have been for generations so engaged. They have made it a success more or less, and generally have provided for probably two or three hundred people. I think Deputy O'Doherty and others would be well advised before they pin their faith to plans such as were outlined to consider the situation of the fishing industry around the English coast. We have to bear in mind that there are altogether too many fishing boats around these coasts, fishing for the English market. I am speaking now of sea fisheries. There are many hundreds, if not thousands, of boats laid up, not by virtue of the absence of skilled fishermen, but by the fact that fish has been too plentiful for the market to [Mr. Johnson.] absorb supplies. There were too many boats built and engined and geared, and as a matter of fact they have caught more fish than the people were prepared or able to buy. It might well be borne in mind, paradoxical as it may seem, that the fishing industry around the Irish coast has been developed.

What has been defective is 6 o'clock. that the fish is not landed and consumed in Ireland. I would like Deputies to remember, that supposing boats were built and equipped, comparable with the North Sea, Fleetwood or Milford trawling fleets, to fish out of Western Irish ports, the fact that the market at present is in Great Britain would lead to those boats doing exactly with the fish what the Fleetwood or Milford boats are doing to-day. They would get the fish to the English market by the cheapest and most economical routes. Such boats as have been trawling from Irish ports have as a matter of fact sent their fish to English markets. Some of them tried fishing out of Dublin and went to the North, but failed. I do not think one has to look for the development of sea fishing at present from the point of view of building new high-powered boats, but rather the development of the market at home and organising supplies to that market. That is not going to mean a tremendous and immediate development in the fishing industry. The market in Ireland is limited by the population, and, as Deputy Bryan Cooper stated, Ireland is not a fish-eating country. I am one of those who believe that the fishing industry will probably have to be revived through the teaching of domestic economy in the schools. If in the eight or nine hundred thousand households there were means, as well as knowledge, for the proper preparation and cooking of fish there would be a greater liking for it, and very soon a much bigger market. I suggest to the Minister for Fisheries that perhaps if he is able to induce the Minister for Finance to assist him, it is rather by advertising the value of fish as a food, and the organisation of supplies to the local market, he will find the ultimate and the greater benefit than from any other means. I am sorry to think that may well mean a supply of imported fish, perhaps caught and landed at Grimsby or Milford or Fleetwood, in the first instance. There is no use talking of marketing or of organising markets unless a fairly regular supply can be assured. The Minister will agree with me when I say that there is no such gamble known as the gamble of the fisherman. It is a gamble from the beginning of his livelihood to the final consumption of the fish, and it is even a gamble then if the consumer is eating tinned fish. Deputy O'Doherty and others ought also to bear in mind that in view of recent developments the high powered vessels in Scotland, and on the East Coast of England, at any rate, are likely to be displaced by lower powered vessels, strange to say, because they are cheaper to manage. That is a tendency which has shown itself within the last year. It is remarkable, and perhaps, if one may say so, encouraging to Irish fishing, because if it is only possible to compete with rival fishing fleets by meeting them with the same class of boats, it will mean the provision of money, hundreds of thousands, if not millions of pounds, because of the tremendous cost both in production and in running expenses.

I think the Minister is well advised in the line that has been indicated to encourage the market for fish in Ireland. I think he will find, by that means, that eventually there will be an encouragement to fishermen along the coasts to fish regularly and to fish for a larger variety than hitherto. Mackerel and herring are the most important so far as our fishermen are concerned. Possibly the greater money values that are taken out of Irish waters are in trawling fishing, ground fishing, and larger trawl fishing. But the fish are never landed here. Certainly they are never eaten here. I think the dependence upon mackerel and herring has been a mistake, though there is a great food wealth in these two fish. I believe that they are only going to be made valuable to the country or to the fishermen by a very much more extended system of curing and preservation.

Now, perhaps it would not be out of place for me to remind the Dáil that the predecessor of the Dáil in 1920 and 1921 appointed a Commission to inquire into the resources and industries of Ireland. That Commission, as a matter of fact, reported very fully in regard to sea fisheries, and I think the report is still on sale and it is very valuable. I would venture to suggest to the deputies who are interested, that it is worth reading and the recommendations made there are worthy of consideration at least. But the recommendations of that report are the recommendations of Deputy Gorey, Deputy O'Connell, and Deputy O'Doherty. I think every Deputy in the Dáil is interested as to the expenditure involved. I believe that the expenditure would be quickly repaid and I believe it would be a very valuable investment. Certainly, in respect to inland fisheries it would give a quick return. When the Minister is pleading for money he should emphasise the importance of that. I think he could easily prove to the Minister for Finance that a quick return in a high degree could be obtained from money well expended by the State in fisheries. I am going to repeat what I have said before. Unless there is money available I think it would be unwise to pretend to have a Department, or at least a Minister for Fisheries, who will be supposed to be doing things that cannot be done without that money. I think that it is not much use to be making a pretence of being able to do work for the fishing industry and for the development of the industry in the country unless the means of doing that work are at hand. It would be far better to delay the operation or the pretence at the operation unless the means of carrying it on were provided. I hope the Minister will enlarge upon the statements that have been made in the past and give the Dáil some further assurance that the proposals for the encouragement and development of the fishing industry are in hands and that the means for those proposals are being provided.

Mr. McBRIDE: I am rather interested in fisheries and fishes, but I cannot altogether agree with the Quixotic schemes propounded by Deputy O'Connell. There are plenty of fish. There is no doubt about that. We want the fishermen and we want the buyers. Off the coasts of Ireland there are illimitable fishing grounds, rich fishing grounds where those trawlers and drifters that we hear so much about poach and to which they are absolutely tempted by a clear field within the three-mile limit of the Irish coast. The fishing of the mackerel, which is more or less a luxury in America, and the fishing of the herring, which ought to be cured, is really the trade which ought to be cultivated, because in normal times the trade in cured herring is something enormous on the Continent of Europe. It is the king of fishes, a fish from which most of the money is made both in England and Scotland. The reason there are such a number of boats laid up along the sea coasts in England and Scotland is really the result of the fiscal conditions in Germany and on the Continent. That is the reason they are laid up and that is the reason for the present state of the market. They cannot sell the fish. They cannot sell it in Germany on account of the state of trade. I hope that the trade in this cured fish for export will be cultivated in Ireland, and that the Minister and Department of Fisheries will do whatever they possibly can in order to encourage it. As to why there is no reference in the Governor-General's Address on the state of the industry, it strikes me that the Governor-General, being the man he is—a man of great capacity and a man of affairs—felt it would be rather silly for him to make any reference to the fishing industry in this country because it would be based upon a report which is practically two years old. I presume that the other Ministries turn out their reports in a reasonable time. The Department of Fisheries turns it out practically two years after date. I think it was in October the Report for 1921 was issued. As far as I can remember, the value of the Scotch fisheries in 1921 was £5,000,000, the value of the Irish fisheries was about £200,000. I hope that under the new conditions prevailing in the Ministry of Fisheries that the Report will be turned out at least two or three months after the end of the financial year.

Mr. COYLE: Ba mhaith liom beagán

a rádh ar an g-ceist. Ní morán atá agam le rádh an iarraet so. I have listened carefully to all the Deputies who have spoken, and I must say that I fully agree with most of what they have said, though not with all. We all know that the fishing industry has been very much neglected. At the same time, I do not think it would be fair to blame the Ministry of Fisheries for this neglect. There has been a terrible lot of poaching going on. We all know that. It was just as difficult for the Minister for Fisheries to stop poaching as it was for the Minister for Defence to stop the burning of houses. Deputy O'Connell referred to motor transport. Certainly I am very much in favour of that where railway facilities are non-existent at present, or where they are not likely to be available. In the constituency that I represent, North Mayo, there are two bays which are very rich in fish, Blacksod Bay and Broadhaven Bay. The fish that is caught in Blacksod Bay must be sent to Achill Sound, that is the nearest place. The fishermen have in one day to catch the fish, and in the next day to take it to Achill Sound. They can only get into Achill Sound according to the condition of the tide. The railway station at Ballina, which is the nearest station to them, is 42 miles from Belmullet. In that case certainly a motor lorry would be very convenient and very useful. The fishermen could fish every day and have their fish sent away every morning. With regard to the question of market for fish, if you take Athlone or Mullingar or those inland towns you will find that you can get no fish there, and at the same time the fish is going bad at Blacksod Bay and Broadhaven Bay and other places.

We had Deputy Bryan Cooper referring to Sligo, and he said that he could get no fish at all in Sligo. I am surprised to hear that there cannot be a man found in Sligo who would open up a proper establishment for the sale of fish, and say to himself he would open up a trade for fish in that town and district and arrange with the fishermen to supply him with what he would require. The same applies to other towns. Certainly they ought all be able to produce one man who would take up this business and supply fish to the district. He also said that some of the fishermen are very easily discouraged. I quite agree with him in that. They are very easily discouraged. But if you take the case of one or two men who are going out in a boat with a carrying capacity of 8 or 9 cwt., I think you will not be surprised to find that they are very easily discouraged.

Deputy McBride says that we wanted fishermen and buyers. We have the fishermen; let us get the buyers. There are plenty of fishermen, and all they want is the gear. If they got proper substantial boats and proper gear, the fishermen are all right, and we can look for the buyers. There is a matter I would like to be made clear on. I have been informed that the territorial waters embrace the three-mile limit, and that in some places the fishing limit is nine miles. The result is that foreign boats can fish between the 9 mile limit and the 3 mile limit. I would like to be made clear upon that matter, and if that is the case I do not think it is very fair to Irish fishermen. I hope the Minister will accept a lot of the advice that was given here. I am sure all the Deputies can be of great assistance. If they all interest themselves as much as some of those who have spoken, I am sure they can render assistance to the Minister and help very much in this important matter.

Mr. SHAW: I would like to impress upon the Minister for Fisheries the great importance of hatcheries. For the past 2 or 3 years the trout coming up the rivers have been all destroyed, and the result is there are very few fish of that type at the present time. Around Mullingar there was a small experiment carried out last year, as a result of which fifty thousand trout have been turned into the Co. Westmeath lakes, at practically a nominal cost. As Deputy Gorey said the other day, fishing is nearly as important a matter as the farming industry, because the lakes are teeming with wealth and teeming with food. It is really a most important matter. I do not intend to go into the details of the various causes of the fishing trouble, and I go no further than to impress upon the Minister the desirability of developing the fish-hatching industry. That is the way to produce the fish, and if they are supplied to the various lakes in the manner I have mentioned, in a few years, if they would not be poached, there would be plenty of fish.

There is another matter which may be news to the Deputies, because it is a thing that is not generally known. It is in connection with pike, the fish that destroy the trout. All the young trout in the lakes and rivers are simply food for the bigger fish. About March or April in each year the pike go into the shallow waters to spawn. At that period you will get pike up to 30 pounds in weight. I have been myself responsible for shooting thousands of them. In Belvidere Lake the number destroyed in the month of March would amount to thousands. The result of destroying pike is that the young fish get a chance to thrive. I wish to emphasise the necessity of preserving the young fish and the great possibilities that exist with regard to hatcheries. I would impress upon the Minister the necessity of devoting a great deal of his attention to the industry with a view to restocking the lakes that have been depleted by poaching, especially in the spawning time, during the last two or three years.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I do not think this question presents such difficulties as I have heard pointed out. I have some experience of sea fishing. In two areas of the county I come from, there were, three or four years before the war, five landing places. One of these landing places contributed, in dues, a sum of £500 to the County Council. As the dues were small, a very large quantity of fish must have been disposed of to realise a sum of £500 in dues alone. I think if the collection of these dues is taken charge of, in some shape or other, by a Government Department, or by the Minister for Fisheries, it would provide a basis of security to enable the Ministry to assist in properly equipping and fitting out fishermen who would be unable to buy gear themselves, and this, I contend, would help in the development of the industry. If such a scheme were introduced, making provision for the security that I speak of, I do not think the cost to the State would be very much, if it were to assist in properly equipping the fishermen in the country engaged in the industry. In this connection, too, the assistance of the County Councils might be invoked. These dues could be collected in the manner I suggest, and could be availed of as a security for the development of the industry. It may be, as Deputy Johnson pointed out, that the times have changed as compared with the period of three or four years before the war, and that the conditions that obtain now are altogether different to what they were then. It may be, too, that the market for fish is not as good now as it was then, and that although you might have as good catches of fish, that the return in dues, owing to the financial condition of the country, would not be as good as it was some years before the war. I know that you have the fish and you have also the fishermen. These latter constitute the very best material that you could get anywhere. They are men who are prepared to face anything in the pursuit of their undertakings. They are the very best class of fishermen that you could possibly get.

With regard to the question of finance, I do not think the Ministry should allow that to stand in the way of the development of the industry, seeing that the return from dues alone would be a guarantee to the State against any expense the State might incur in providing proper equipment for the fishermen. The industry in my opinion is one of the most important that we have. The people engaged in it are the most worthy people that we have in the country, and I must also say, they belong to a class which is least able to help itself. They live in remote parts of the country, and are not in touch with centres that might be able to assist them in one way or another. They have to rely, almost entirely, on the Ministry, and on the agents it sends out, to assist and guide them in pursuing their undertakings. I do not think the Governor-General, in his Address in referring to forthcoming legislation, could have touched on a subject of more general importance or interest to the country, than the development of the fishing industry. Although the industry has not been referred to in that Address. I am sure that it is none the less being considered by the Government and its responsible officials. The Government has placed a Minister in charge of this industry and I am sure that it will now be dealt with in a manner satisfactory, not alone to the nation, but to all concerned in its development.

FIONAN Ó LOINGSIGH: Cúis athais dom iseadh é fheicheadh go bhfuil na Teachtaí a chur suim 'sa cheist seo. Ceist tabhachtach iseadh ceist iasgai-reachta na hEireann agus ma bhi aon amhras nach rabh Teachtaí na Dála a' chur suim 'san cheist tá a mhalairt de thuairim ann anois.

If anybody had any doubt in his mind before this, that the question of fishery development was a matter of no concern to members of the Dáil, they have surely been relieved of that doubt. It was, I might say, a pleasure to me to find that Deputies, from every part of the country, take a very intelligent interest in the fishing industry, both sea and inland. To come to the amendment itself, I think Deputy Johnson practically answered that. Legislation will not be needed to develop the industry. I feel that, under the Ministers' Bill and the powers of the Congested Districts Board and of the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction, which have been handed over to us, that we have sufficient power to carry on without any further legislation enabling us to do so. Deputy O'Connell referred to the fact that, under the old régime, more attention was devoted to the development of what might be called casual fishing, that is to say, drift-net fishing and occasional fishing of salmon and herring, than to trawling, which is of a more permanent type, or, as one might say, all-the-year-round fishing. The Deputy referred to the fact that in other countries it was on this aspect of the fishing industry that the people concentrated. In Great Britain that is so, but it was not through Government agency. The development of trawling is a matter for private or capitalistic enterprise.

And now we are bringing that forward, and we have brought it before the Chambers of Commerce. Deputy O'Connell referred to the possible development of the supply of gear. That was done by the old Boards, and continued to be done until comparatively recently by the Ministry. Its financial provision for the supply of gear is curtailed for the moment, at least, owing to the financial conditions. I might say that outstanding loans amount to between £120,000 and £140,000, and this fact, of course, governed a good deal the action of the Minister for Finance in stopping any further financial loans for the moment. Deputy O'Connell referred to the industries in connection with fishing, the making of nets and fishing barrels, etc. Nets are made at one place in Ireland—Baltimore. There are no barrels made at present. But it is difficult to know whether the suggestion is that the Government should start factories. The Government is encouraging, as far as it possibly can, any enterprise that is undertaken in this way by private individuals, having in the past provided loans. As a matter of fact, there is, I understand, a proposal for the barrel-making industry now being revived in West Cork. The Deputy referred to what we are doing in regard to the provision of information as to the movements of fish, and he referred to the fact that aeroplanes have been used by other countries. But the fact is no satisfactory result was effected or accomplished in that way, and the aeroplanes have been a practical failure as far as getting any real information is concerned. The next point he mentioned is a very important one, namely, that of marketing and transit. Nearly every Deputy referred to these two things, as they naturally would, as the most important in their speeches. To take transit first; we are, of course, always in close communication with the Ministry of Industry and Commerce in regard to transit. We have got some concessions, not a terrible lot, because we are always met with the reply from the railway companies, if we ask for reduced freights, that they are up against high wages bill, high cost of coal, etc. The Deputy mentioned the Arran and Coshla Bay Scheme. That is being examined at the moment by the Department, and if it is found practicable it will be adopted. It is known, I think, that we have under way a plan for the development of markets. As a matter of fact, one section of the Department is at the moment devoting all its time to it. A general outline of their scheme is the organisation of the retail trade in certain selected towns for a start.

The appointment of salesmen from the Ministry to work up the trade, a scheme of propaganda to encourage the eating of fish, and then, after having encouraged people to eat it, to organise regular supplies to these inland towns. Deputy O'Connell also raised the question of protection. That is, of course, an old sore. There has always been considerable poaching. It has continued, and it possibly increased in recent years from one reason or another. But we hope that with the aid of the additional patrol vessels, now placed at our disposal, and that have actually done considerable work already in aid of the Ministry, we hope to make this poaching not so profitable for those persons as it used to be. Then he mentioned kippering stations, and he wanted to know if there was any such thing as an Irish kipper to be got. There are kippering stations at Dunmore, Howth, Clogherhead and Baltimore. These have all been assisted by the State in the past. Then Deputy Wolfe referred to ice making plant. These are, as a matter of fact, being now gradually developed—and developed by private enterprise. There is one in Cahirciveen and one in Galway. In the past, the procedure of the Department was that they supplied the ice at a low cost during the season. This was found more practical than setting up anything in the nature of Government ice factories for the short periods that it would be necessary to use them during the year. With regard to the question of licences, that at the moment is being considered by the Ministry. It was one of the questions submitted to the Advisory Committee on Inland Fisheries recently. Provision is also being made to enable the Board of Conservators to deal more effectively with the question of protection by putting them on a better financial basis. Deputy Gorey wanted to know what the Civic Guard or the military had done, and Deputy Bryan Cooper was good enough to mention at least one specific case. I can quite easily give many more, but I cannot do so offhand, and I can give figures of prosecutions at the instance of the Civic Guard and the military. I know, as a matter of actual fact, that they have been effective, and much more effective, than the old R.I.C. Deputy O'Doherty referred to organising the fishermen on something like a co-operative basis. Well, I am waiting to see a scheme in writing before I commit myself. I am prepared to scan, very carefully, any scheme submitted to me by any Deputy, but I will be quite candid and say that I will look very carefully at any scheme of that kind. My first few months after the formation of the Ministry, had to be devoted practically to cutting losses as a result of former schemes of co-operation undertaken by a former Minister, all of which proved to be failures. It is, as a matter of fact, the general belief, by persons who know them best, that before co-operation can be undertaken, our people engaged in the fishing industry will first of all have to have a long educational course. Their life and work is individualistic, and it is extremely difficult to get them to accept even the very first principles of co-operation.

Mr. JOHNSON: How does a crew work?

Mr. LYNCH: Occasionally they work on the share system, but you will find, at any rate, that even in the buying of their ordinary provisions, if you except the crew of one boat which does not mean co-operation, they will not co-operate. The crew of one boat will be trying to down the crew of another boat, and co-operation between four or five persons does not mean a scheme of co-operation, surely. You might as well say that because one family will try to work things out for the benefit of themselves that that is a sign that co-operation is possible generally. Deputy Gorey referred to the sale of spawning fish. That is an offence; and if there has been neglect in the way of prosecution there, it is the fault of the bailiffs, and, of course, if it is done openly, it is also the fault of the Civic Guard.

Mr. GOREY: Who ever saw a bailiff in Portarlinton?

Mr. LYNCH: The Deputy is a member of a Board of Conservators, and they are supposed to have control.

Mr. GOREY: I am not.

Mr. LYNCH: Deputy Johnson referred to the fishermen at the mouth of the Shannon. On the Inland Fishery Committee already there are two representatives of the net fishermen in estuary waters, one at the mouth of the Liffey and one from the mouth of the Boyne. I will look into the question of whether we can add further to the present Committee.

I do agree, as Deputy Johnson thought I would, that the fishing industry is a gamble from start to finish. I may say that it was because of that that I think the system of finance, which I will be raising with the Minister for Finance, in regard to the development of fisheries that prevailed with the C.D.B. is preferable to the actual control of every detailed item of expenditure that prevails at present. That matter will have to be dealt with departmentally. The Deputy from Mayo referred to the territorial water fishery limits. The limit is, of course, three miles, and we have certain bye-laws which are extra territorial. The actual position with regard to those is that a foreign boat can fish legally outside the three mile limit and within our bye-law limit. A French boat can do so. At the moment the bye-laws that existed prior to the 6th December, 1921, affect British vessels as they affected them formerly.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Might I ask the Minister to say whether British vessels can legally fish there?

Mr. LYNCH: That is what I say. At the moment British vessels are governed by our bye-laws as if they were Saorstát vessels. In other words, at present they are not treated as foreign vessels.

Mr. O'CONNELL: They ought to be.

Mr. LYNCH: It would hit ourselves. The British vessels would be very glad to be treated as foreign for that particular purpose. Deputy McBride referred to the delay in the publication of fishery reports by the Department of Agriculture. I myself was pressing for a long time for the issue of these reports, and I know that one of the causes for delay was the change in the Government and also a technical point as to the difficulty of presentation—a certain procedure about the presentation of the reports. Deputy Shaw referred to the hatcheries and their development. That is a question that is receiving the attention of the Ministry and certain proposals were put up with regard to those of the Inland Fisheries Committee. There is not very much use in going very far in the establishment of hatcheries until first of all we have secured protection. Even though I am glad that the amendment was brought forward, since it has resulted in such a useful debate, I feel that there is really no necessity for it, and that there is no necessity for inserting anything in the Governor-General's Address with regard to the encouragement and development of the fishing industry.

Mr. O'CONNELL: My main object, as I said in introducing this amendment, was to draw attention to the fact that this important matter seemed to have been forgotten when the Government was preparing its legislative programme. Now the Minister has satisfied me that, at least, it has not been forgotten, even though it was not mentioned in the Address and, while not wholly satisfied that everything is being done that might possibly be done, we will wait further to see the results. I ask, therefore, the leave of the Dáil to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

The main motion is now before the Dáil.

Mr. DAVIN: I am very glad to notice that Deputies generally have thought fit to ignore the suggestion of Deputy Nicholls in seconding the vote of thanks when he said: "I do not think that there is any need for dealing in detail with a subject like this." As we all know, and as Deputy Nicholls should know, it is very important that the Address of the Governor-General, which is not a personal matter but merely an expression of the opinion of the Government regarding their future policy, under the circumstances which prevail in this country and under which the Ministry has been returned to office, every aspect of that Address should be thoroughly discussed. As Deputy Captain Redmond said, it should be finally disposed of before any legislative measures outlined in that Address are introduced into this Dáil. One would imagine from the very short statement of Deputy Nicholls that he was returned to support the Government without knowing the programme that he was returned to support. Unlike every other country, or the governing party of every other country where normal conditions prevail, this Government has been returned without putting any definite legislative programme before the people. Therefore I think that is a very important reason why Deputy Nicholls, even as a member of the Government party, in seconding the vote of thanks, should have dealt in detail with the address of the Governor-General. The Governor-General in the Address refers to the recent Electoral Act passed in the last Dáil, whereby every person has a right to share in the setting up of the government of the country. I deny that the Electoral Act, which brought a certain register into operation, gave the people who are entitled to it the right to share in setting up the Government and participating in the administration as a whole.

I know of many instances where hundreds of voters' names appeared on the first print of the register, and when the final register was produced those names were omitted without any explanation being given to the parties who had a right to have their names on that register. I am very glad the Minister for Local Government indicated a few days ago that it was the intention of the Ministry to set matters right on that point. One fails to understand, however, why in the recent election a very large section of the community failed to exercise the franchise. It is quite true that in other countries a certain section of the community failed to exercise the right which they have in the setting up of the administrative machinery. To me it appears that the people who in the recent election refused to take their share in the election of the Government were, to a certain extent, ignoring Parliamentary institutions.

If such was the case I should say people should be compelled to go to the polling stations and register their opinions in the ballot boxes under the penalty of a fine. Those who refused to acknowledge their duty in the setting up of the Government of their choice should be penalised. The Address goes on to state that time and opportunity in the past year did not permit of any but temporary provision being made for the Civic Guard and Military forces and states that it is the intention of the Government in the Dáil to introduce measures giving a permanent form to the Civic Guard and Military Forces. I cannot fail to notice the manner in which the Civic Guard have conducted themselves under the very trying conditions in which they were working as compared with the general conduct of the military. Might I express the hope in the new re-organisation foreshadowed by the Minister for Defence that only those who have conducted themselves in a proper way will find a place in the new Army organisation, and that any officers or men who have by their misconduct thrown discredit and dishonour on the Army and the Government will find themselves in the ranks of the demobilised.

I think it is eminently desirable that it should be made quite clear to those who compose the army that this army, which is paid by the whole of the people to protect the people, is not conducted on the amateur lines of the army which had only the support of a section of the people previous to the Treaty being signed. The method of demobilisation indicated by the Minister for Defence is generally satisfactory. It goes further than the statement made in this Dáil two or three months ago when he said it would be quite possible to reduce the army to 30,000 within the year. He has now stated it will be possible to reduce the army to 20,000. May I express the hope, especially in view of the great amount of unemployment, that demobilisation will be gradual, and will, as far as possible, only take place in accordance with the requirements of the labour market. It might be far better under conditions existing at the moment to have 5,000 or 10,000 men in the army under discipline than to have them going out on the unemployment dole and misconducting themselves in a manner in which they could not be dealt with as if they were in the army. I do not want to go very much further into the question of army discipline. It is rather a delicate matter, but I think the Government will realise that the overbearing attitude of many army officers resulted in the last election in a considerable number of people voting anti-Government not so much because they were anti-Treaty but because of the overbearing attitude of the servants of the Government. I want to draw the attention of the Minister for Defence to the practice of military officers going about in civilian attire. This should be discouraged, and in any other country is not practised to the extent to which it is here. There is also the question of the non-payment of old outstanding accounts. I happen to be one of the members who frequently receive communications from constituents of mine who are still owed old accounts dating back to 1922. I see no reason why those old accounts should be outstanding and why Deputies in this Dáil should be called upon to go to Portobello Barracks frequently to ascertain why such and such an account, which has been outstanding for two years, has not been paid. The Minister for Finance, in a statement to the Dáil, said that many of those accounts were fraudulent. That may be so in some instances, but it is a remarkable thing to find fraudulent accounts or overcharged ones certified by local officers as being correct. I hope he will give this his attention so far as the years 1921 and 1922 are concerned.

The Address claimed that the Government intend, have, and will, continue to take effective steps to deal with all those who challenge its authority. So far as I am concerned, I have always been quite prepared to support the Government in any effective steps they might take, so long as they were constitutional, which they might deem necessary to deal with those who challenge the authority of the people's Government by force of arms, and I am quite sure that every Deputy is prepared to give every possible support to the Government to see that armed robbery, which has recently been such a menace to the citizens of the State, shall be put down, and put down in the strongest possible manner. I realise that while this armed robbery goes on it makes it very difficult indeed for the State to come forward and ask the people to lend them money, so that it may carry on the ordinary work and machinery of Government. In my opinion, the extent to which it was going on until recently helped to reduce the credit of the State and to bring down its borrowing powers when it is necessary, as at present, for the State to look to the people for the money required to carry on.

We have had a very interesting debate on that aspect of the Address dealing with the question of high prices, high profits, and high wages, and, mark you, the Governor-General says: "High prices, high profits, and high wages can no longer be sustained by a country whose economic life has agriculture as its base and foundation." I deny that high prices, high profits, and high wages exist in the country's main industry, agriculture, and so far as that aspect of the Address is concerned, it does not exactly picture the situation as we find it today. So far as I can gather, representing, as I do, an area that depends to a large extent upon the prices which it receives for its agricultural produce, profits to the producer have gone down in many cases below pre-war figures, but notwithstanding that there is no reduction whatsoever to the consumer. I was deeply interested in the speeches of the merchants, made from the Government benches, speeches largely, perhaps wholly, directed to the question of high wages, without making any attempt whatever to justify the profiteering going on in the community in which they themselves were associated. So far as I can see the producer, on the one hand, and the consumer on the other, are being fleeced, and it is quite possible that if the producers were better organised and the consumers were organised through the co-operative movement they would eliminate that very dangerous section, the profiteering section, which, in my opinion, is the principal cause of the industrial upheavals in recent months. The Government set up a Commission on Prices that sat for a considerable period. Deputies have been furnished with the Report and Recommendations of that Commission, but up to the present we have had no indication from the Government, except this very vague thing from the Governor-General, as to what the Government intends to do to deal with the question of profiteering. It may appear strange to say so, but we have to face the facts, and so far as Dublin is concerned, in my opinion the greater part of the trouble is due to the high prices of beer and stout. Deputies may laugh and may appear to think that is not correct, but beer and porter or stout is looked upon, and is, in fact, a food to a certain class of worker, and while the prices stand at their present high level, I think that the Government is not justified in failing to deal with the question. I have figures to show the profiteering going on in that particular trade. At the present price the gross profit on the sale of one barrel—32 gallons—of draught porter is £3 5s. 0d., draught stout, £5 3s. 0d.; bottled stout consumed on the premises, £9 6s. 7d.; bottled stout consumed off the premises, £5 10s. 5d. The nett profit on the sale of one barrel of each of the above per week would show, in fifty-two weeks, a gross profit of £1,189 10s. 0d. If five barrels of each per week were sold the total profit for the year would be £5,947 10s. The corresponding figures for 1914 were: profit on one barrel a week of draught porter for fifty-two weeks, £277 11s. 0d., as against £1,189 10s. 0d., and the profit on five barrels of each per week for fifty-two weeks was £1,387 15s. 0d., as against £5,947 10s. 0d. I would like to hear from some Minister what has been done or what they intend to do to deal with the question of profiteering in the licensed trade. If they deny that it exists, then we know where we stand. But if they admit it exists to the extent of the figures I have given, I would be glad to hear what they intend to do.

In the wages disputes during the last six or twelve months the Government have thrown the weight of their influence and support on the side of the employers to bring down what they said were the high wages, while at the same time they have made no attempt to deal with the profiteering. Deputy Egan referred to what he called the standard of luxury, and indicated that the large increase in the number of picture houses in Dublin, compared with the time when he was a boy, was due to the high wages which the workers are spending in the very foolish manner of patronising picture houses. He did not exactly say that he would rather see the workers remain at home, after a hard day's work, in the slums in rooms for which they paid 10/- or 12/- a week, or go into the nearest public-house and pay the high prices I have indicated for porter. I do not happen to be a patron of picture houses myself, but it would be very interesting to know from Deputy Egan what liberty or what pleasure he will allow the ordinary worker who has worked hard for eight hours on the Dublin quays, or at some other business. He referred also, and naturally we have had a good many references of the same kind, to the domestic differences supposed to exist in the ranks of the Labour movement, and indicated pretty clearly that the industrial disputes were created by these alleged differences. It would be rather an unusual experience, not alone in the family circle, but in the wider sections of the community, among labourers, manufacturers or employers, to find that everybody, in the days in which we are living, were united. It is quite true that certain individuals who took very little part in the building up

[Mr. Davin.] of the Labour movement, and have recently issued a challenge—a challenge which to me, and I am only speaking as an individual, meant the setting up of a dictatorship within the Labour movement. As a Labour Party, recognising that the governing principle and the foundation of our movement is that the rule of the majority should prevail, it was up to those of us who stood by the principle of majority rule to stand up to the challenge, and if workers or people associated with the Labour movement, and they are very few, thought fit to support such a claim as that, a claim that definitely meant the setting up of a dictatorship, and if the country suffered as a result of the struggle that went on, not in the Labour Party, but in one particular union, then I think that whatever has been done to defeat that challenge was in the interests of the country and, no doubt, also in the interest of the Labour movement.

There seems to be an impression in the minds of many speakers, particularly those from the Farmers' and Government benches, from the employers' side, that the only people who pay taxes in this country are the farmers and merchants. It is quite clear that so far as the taxes of the merchant are concerned they are in all cases passed on to the consumer, so that that aspect of the case does not impress one who finds himself in the position of the ordinary consumer. There was a very lengthy discussion on the question of finance and high salaries, and the Minister for Agriculture, in dealing with the question of high salaries in the Government service, said: "The Dáil is entitled to know that the salaries we pay are what we can afford to pay." Looking through the Estimates, which we scanned very closely in the early part of the year, and which we dealt with at considerable length, one finds it hard to understand why there should be any necessity for three individuals in the Governor-General's establishment drawing £2,800 per annum, and salaries of £1,100, £1,000 and £700, while at the same time the Minister for Agriculture comes along and says there must be a cut in the teachers' salaries, which are not a quarter of what these individuals' salaries are. In fact, the item of £2,800 for A.D.C.'s to the Governor-General represents, roughly, the average salary of ten teachers, or the payment at the maximum figure of 107 old age pensioners. I would be very much interested to see on what grounds the Minister for Agriculture would justify that item, and there are others like it in the Estimates which we passed some time ago. The Minister for Agriculture also indicated that the cost of living could be reduced only by some superhuman effort on the part of Deputy Johnson. He did not tell us how he thought Deputy Johnson could do that, but there are ways which I would suggest to the Minister for Agriculture by which he himself could help to bring down the cost of living. We are well aware that the high internal transport rates are placing a very unfair burden on the charge of the commodity to the home consumer, and on the other hand, that the low rates from British towns, either inland or sea borne to the Irish port gives a decided preference by their low rates, the British articles being dumped into the home market as against our produce. I would like to give one or two figures to bring it home as clearly as I can to the minds of the Deputies how it works out in practice. Some time ago I was speaking to a constituent of mine who is a very large egg exporter, and he told me that he was gradually losing his trade in the British market on account of the very high internal freight charges. I made inquiries, and looked up some of the rate books to see how the position affected him. I took the cost of eggs from Port Laoghaise to Dublin, a distance of 57 miles, and found it was 9d. per ton per mile; the rate for eggs from Port Laoghaise to London, 385 miles, works out at 3½d. per mile. The rate from Dublin to London, 334 miles, is 2½d. per ton per mile, showing that the home consumer is having an unfair burden placed on him by the high internal rates prevailing as against the charges from Dublin to the British markets. The rate for butter from Ballybrophy to Dublin, 72 miles, is 7d. per ton per mile. From Dublin to London, 2½d. per ton per mile, and from Ballybrophy to London, 400 miles, the rate is 3d. per ton per mile. Bacon from Roscrea to Dublin, 83 miles, is 6½d. per ton per mile, and from Dublin to London it is 2½d., and from Roscrea to London it is 2¾d.

Within the Ministry for Agriculture there is a department which used to function previous to the setting up of the Treaty, whereby people who were affected by these very high rates on agricultural produce could seek assistance, and bring their grievances before the Railway Rates Tribunal. To that extent public funds were at the disposal of people who suffered in this way, and in many cases they succeeded in having the high rates on agricultural produce reduced. Deputy Gorey would say, no doubt, that the high internal rates are due to the higher wages of the railway workers in Ireland. I will tell Deputy Gorey in advance that if he can produce evidence in support of that I will be agreeably surprised. The general conditions of railway men in Ireland and England are the same, with the exception that railway men in Ireland are paid a lower rate for Sunday and overtime work, and 2,000 Irish railway men, who work the very small companies, work 10 per cent. below the average rate for other railway men in Ireland and England. It is not a question of the higher rate of wages, in this case, and it must be a question of bad organisation in Irish railways. It is for the Minister for Agriculture, and those behind him, to justify that system, or to say in what way they intend to have it remedied. I have quoted rates, from my own constituency, for agricultural produce, and it is a constituency that was a large exporting area so far as these commodities are concerned. The rates quoted may appear high, but as many people know, for the last two years the railway goods service was very bad, so far as export is concerned, and in many instances these commodities had to be forwarded by passenger train, where the rates are 100 per cent. higher than those I have quoted. A significant thing in connection with this question of high internal railway rates is that the Northern companies, and companies serving the border in or around the Six Counties area, have reduced their rates to a considerable extent. Some time ago a Commission dealing with this question went very closely into the existing railway rates, and an official of the Department of Agriculture in his evidence said that the railway companies, such as the Great Northern, the Midland (Northern Counties), the Belfast and County Down, Dundalk, Newry and Greenore, the Derry and Lough Swilly, the Sligo and Leitrim and Northern Counties, the Cavan and Leitrim, the Clogher Valley, Castlederg and Victoria Bridge, etc., having a total road distance 1,303 miles, of which 530 miles are in Saorstát Éireann—I merely draw attention to this aspect of the railway rates, so that the Northern companies, which it cannot be said are in a different position to those in the Southern area, have reduced their rates from 150 per cent., pre war, to 100 per cent., as well as abolishing many of the flat rates.

The result of that is that the people in Mayo, Sligo, Cavan and Leitrim who forward traffic are getting a natural inducement to send their traffic through Belfast port. That is probably one of the reasons why the railway companies in the Six County area have agreed to this reduction. The official attached to the Department of Agriculture was asked whether any representations were made to the Southern railway companies to bring about similar reductions. He stated representations had been made, and that the companies declined to agree to any of the reductions that were given by the Northern companies. The financial position of the Southern railways was pleaded as the reason why they could not adopt these reductions. The official further stated: "At the present time none can challenge the reasonableness"—and this is a very important matter for the Minister to explain—"of the rates originally imposed by the Minister of Transport on the 1st September, 1920. Under the Act it was laid down that any increases directed by him were to be deemed to be reasonable. The present position is that until there is some repeal of the provisions of that Act, as far as Irish produce is concerned, these high rates of Sept., 1920, obtain, except in so far as the companies may voluntarily modify them as the Northern group did, but [Mr. Davin.] none can compel them to reduce them." That is the evidence of an official associated with the Minister for Agriculture, given at a recent Commission in connection with railway transport rates. The Minister taunted Deputy Johnson with having in a speech which he said lasted over an hour—and which got only three inches in the Press—

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. Hogan): That is not my fault.

Mr. DAVIN: He stated that the only suggestion Deputy Johnson made was that of a tariff on imported goods.

Mr. HOGAN: He made two suggestions—two wholly distinct suggestions. One was to increase taxation and the other was to put a tariff on imported goods.

Mr. DAVIN: I suggest that the Minister, by agreeing that the railways should be allowed to set up and continue to impose these high rates, by his own action imposes a tariff on our exports, and, on the other hand, by allowing the low railway rates on British imported goods to be continued, is associating himself with a tariff on our exports and with the giving of a decided preference to imported goods into this country. If the Minister is prepared to justify his association with such a policy as that, the Dáil would like to hear how it can be done. The result of the high rates on farm produce is that the land is being let out to an alarming degree in many areas, and that, in time, will create more unemployment. If things go on as they are going on at present, Ireland will have lost her large export trade, and in addition will become, as England is at present, a country relying largely upon imported articles.

There is another aspect of profiteering to which I would like to draw attention, and that is the failure of the Ministry of Home Affairs to deal with the question of weights and measures. Owing to the peculiar conditions under which we have been living in this country for the past four or five years there appears to have been no check on weights and measures. I had a complaint made to me two or three months ago by people in a certain town in my area that scales were being used for weighing live pigs which were far from being accurate. When the weight of certain pigs was afterwards tested on another scales it was found that the pigs were considerably heavier than the weight which was given to the owner when the pigs were weighed on the original scales. If there is any person in that area capable of dealing with that matter I would be very glad to give him information to enable him to institute a prosecution. It is a very important matter, and some explanation is due to the Dáil for the failure of whatever Ministry is responsible for dealing with it. Some months since I put down a question drawing attention to that particular aspect of profiteering, and, so far as I can see, nothing has since been done.

I want to refer very briefly to the failure of the Government to get any agreement on the question of future railway policy. The Minister for Industry and Commerce, on the 3rd January last, made a very long and, apparently, well-considered statement of Government policy on this matter in the Dáil. He indicated briefly that the Government had turned down the Railway Commission's report, and that they proposed to give to the Irish railway companies three months to make up their minds upon a scheme of grouping which would meet with the approval of the Government. He further stated that if at the end of a further three months, namely, the 1st July, a scheme of grouping which would meet with the approval of the Government was not brought forward by the railway companies that the Government would proceed to bring in a Bill to deal with the matter. On the 17th July last the question was discussed rather briefly in the Dáil on the Estimates, and we were informed by the Assistant Minister at the time that President Cosgrave was attending a conference in London with Sir James Craig on the question of the railways. We have had no indication whatsoever since the 17th July of what transpired at that Conference, or as to whether any progress had been made on the lines of the Government policy at the time. Sir James Craig, speaking at Belleek on the 13th October, said: "They had schemes in view to ease the situation with regard to the railways. The present railway system was not a good one. In the old days the railways worked their traffic from North to South, but in future there would be amalgamation and they would be worked from West to East and East to West." I want to ask the Minister whether that statement of Sir James Craig was made as a result of the conference which took place in London between Sir James Craig and President Cosgrave. We are now five months beyond the period that was allowed to the railway companies to bring in their agreed scheme of grouping, and I think it is in the interest of the Government, of the business community and of everybody who will be affected by whatever change will take place, that the Government should make an immediate statement as to the present position, and as to whether or not there is any likelihood of an agreement being arrived at between the companies concerned; also as to whether or not the Government have definitely made up their minds to go ahead on the lines of the policy indicated by the Minister on the 3rd January. In case such a decision has been come to I would like the Minister to give us the approximate date for the introduction of the Government's promised legislative proposals, and if he would also indicate whether the Government intend to deal only with the railway companies wholly within the Free State area or with all the railway lines that are within the Free State area.

Until some such statement is made on the lines I have indicated considerable unrest will prevail in railway, agricultural and commercial circles. Although the railway companies, to all outside appearances, have made no attempt, or as far as I know, have not come to the agreement that the Ministry wishes, still they are preparing the ground for the time when some scheme of unification, grouping, or nationalisation will take place. They are effecting economies in many directions and two railway companies recently gave notice of dismissal to members of their staff. That is a very serious position because I anticipate that in whatever scheme of grouping, unification, or nationalisation that is eventually passed through the Dáil, whatever railway staffs are found redundant will have to receive reasonable protection and compensation if dismissed. That is what happened in the grouping schemes passed in England where servants were displaced as a result of the combines legalised there. I think it is very bad policy on the part of any railway company, and especially on the part of a railway company that apparently does not think fit to fall in with the wishes of the Ministry, to prejudice the position of their officials in anticipation of anything that may take place in the near future. I hope the Ministry will drive it home to the companies concerned that such a policy will not be tolerated.

I want also to draw attention to the treatment that the Great Southern and Western Railway Company are meting out to many members of their staff who joined the Railway Maintenance and Protection Corps when it was established. I have received complaints from Cork and from other areas where men were demobilised from the Railway Maintenance and Protection Corps that when they went back to report to the railway company they were kept a considerable time walking about idle before being taken back. They went to the local station and reported to the stationmaster, agent, or superintendent that they were available for duty. The stationmaster, the agent, or superintendent wrote to Dublin, and headquarters in Dublin wrote to someone else. In that way men who have been demobilised have been kept out of employment for 3 or 4 weeks. I suggest that that is not in accordance with the spirit of the undertaking that was given by the company when the men joined that particular Corps. I trust the Minister will take the matter up and see that no undue delay of the kind takes place in reinstating men who offered their services when the outbreak occurred in June of last year.

I want also to ask the Minister if any assistance is given by the Transport Department associated with his Ministry towards the development of tourist traffic. It is well known that in pre-war days this country benefitted to the extent of four or five million pounds per annum from the large number of tourists who visited it. I suggest that no more useful work could be done by the Transport Department than encouraging, as far as possible, the development of tourist traffic. It is pretty well known by those who come into contact with travellers that the hotels in this country are very badly organised for tourist traffic. Tourists who come to Ireland do not get, in many ways, that attention and consideration that they receive in other countries. The Transport Department could do a lot of useful work by trying to organise hotel keepers and by assisting to develop a traffic that brought considerable revenue to the country previously.

On the question of the financial statement made by the Minister, Deputy Milroy indicated in a speech that he made, that there were other means of taxation. I am sorry he did not indicate what was in his mind when he made that statement, or say if he was in favour of the taxation of bachelors. From what one can see by looking around the Dáil, if the Minister were to introduce legislation for the taxation of bachelors there would be a considerable revenue from the Government benches alone.

Mr. P. HOGAN: Provided the bachelors had the money.

Mr. DAVIN: I also want to draw the attention of the Minister for Finance to two questions that I think deserve immediate attention. On the 10th October of last year dealing with the question of compensation to members of the R.I.C. who resigned, the Minister for Home Affairs said: "It is the intention of the Government to grant compensation to certain R.I.C. men who resigned or were dismissed in recent years because of their national sympathies. It is intended that such men will receive as generous treatment as if they had remained in the Force until the date of its disbandment. Legislation will be required to cover such compensation, and it is proposed to introduce appropriate measures as soon after the enactment of the Constitution as is practicable." That was 10th October, 1922, and I think it is very bad policy on the part of the Government to have delayed giving the compensation that was promised. Recently two cases came under my notice. One man came to me in this building a week ago from the area that the Minister represents, and told me he had not enough money to pay for his lodgings that night. I heard of another case where a man was dying in the poor-house, as it was called, in Cork. Honest men, and some of them were honest, who made sacrifices by resigning from the R.I.C. in response to the appeal that was made in July, 1918, do not deserve to be treated in that disgraceful manner. I suggest that the Sinn Féin organisation that made such promises, as it was entitled to do on behalf of the nation, is in honour bound to carry them out. I hope the Minister will be able to tell us that it is his intention to lay regulations on the Table that will enable him to pay the men in accordance with the promises that were made to them.

I also wish to refer to the question of compensation in connection with the Shaw Commission. In dealing with that matter some time ago the Minister stated: "The Commission which deals entirely with pre-Truce damage has made considerable progress in the issue of its awards, and the machinery set up by the Ministry of Finance has for some time been working at a rate which has overtaken arrears, and keeps pace with the making of awards by the Commission." I want to draw the particular attention of the Minister to the fact that that is not exactly the case. Two or three people in my area whose homes were burned in pre-Truce days for assisting a then united nation, are now being denied compensation, because they are supposed to be sympathetic with the Irregulars.

They are alleged to have sympathies in that direction. I cannot say whether that is correct or not, and I cannot say what is the information at the disposal of the Minister on that aspect of the case. In making inquiries into the matter I found that there are 50 such cases being held up by the Minister for Finance, or someone acting on his behalf in his Department. I consider that is a very bad policy on the part of the Minister to deny these people the compensation to which they are rightly entitled for damage done by the Black and Tans. I suggest that it is not one of the ways by which we can heal up old sores that are open in this country as a result of the dispute over the Treaty. I suggest it would be a good policy on the part of the Minister to pay such claims without any further delay.

There is another question dealt with in the Governor-General's Address, the housing question. That question has been very fully gone into by people who are more competent to deal with it than I am. I, therefore, only wish to make one point in connection with it. I happened to be around the Irish coal areas on a couple of occasions recently. One of the things that appear to affect the workers, particularly in the mining districts of Arigna and Wolfhill, is the lack of proper housing accommodation.

I hope the responsible Minister, when dealing with this question of housing, will make provision for the building of houses in mining areas. It would not take much to deal with that situation, but it would be one of the ways by which the coal resources of this country would be better developed. I think it is unfair to see miners having to walk six miles to their work, and working under the horrible conditions which we know exists in some of the Irish mining areas, and to have to walk home again six miles when the work of the day is over. I make that suggestion to the Ministers and hope that in dealing with the matter they will keep in mind the question of housing in mining areas.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE resumed the chair at this stage.

Mr. PETER DOYLE: Ni gádh dhom puinn a rádh anois tar éis an meid atá ráidhthe. In rising to support the motion of thanks to the Governor-General for his Address there are a few matters to which he referred on which I desire to offer some observations. On the many matters dealt with in that Address, I presume many Deputies may hold different opinions, as to which is the most important problem. To my mind, the unemployment problem is one of the most vital, and I am sure that any schemes introduced by the Government will receive every possible attention and support from all sections in the Dáil. Rather, I should say that anything that tends to give employment and reduce unemployment will receive attention and welcome. While dealing with the unemployment problem I do not suggest that if unemployment were even now normal that we would be at the end of our troubles and disputes as between capital and labour. I trust that in our deliberations in the future that some definite effort will be made to set up or formally establish an Industrial Arbitration Court with a view to dealing with industrial disputes. I am glad to know that the Governor-General has suggested that a larger provision is to be made for dealing with the housing question. Notwithstanding the number of houses that have been built throughout the country during the past couple of years there is still a considerable dearth of housing. In Dublin alone the Corporation have built 200 houses, but that has not diminished the great demand for housing accommodation, and there are thousands of people at the moment living under the most unchristian conditions possible.

The Governor-General makes a very important statement on the re-organisation of our railway systems. They have for a considerable time exercised the minds of the Ministers. Now I think that is about as important a problem as can be tackled, and I have no doubt that the Government have full scope for their activities in dealing with that matter. It may be rather a difficult subject to refer to here, but I feel that a little criticism will be very helpful in outlining any future scheme of management which may be in the minds of the Ministry. The manner in which the Irish railways have been managed in the past, particularly during the old regime, has, in my mind, been most unsatisfactory. The Irish railway management has been more detrimental to Irish industry and enterprise than any other cause of which I am aware. I am sure any change in the system of management that operated in the past will, I believe, be for the general interest and advancement of the country. The existing rates on merchandise require immediate revision. The fixing of Irish railway rates and charges in London has been a very serious impediment to progress in Ireland in the past, and has considerably hindered the development of Irish transport, including the utilisation of our canals.

I do not know at the moment if that is still in operation as regards the canals, but I know that until recently it has been so. I think it has had a detrimental effect on the canal transport service, which touches upon some areas where there are no railways. In any proposed extension of the Irish railway system the industrial centres must be catered for in such a manner as adequately to meet their needs and requirements. That remark is particularly directed to where industrial effort has failed as a consequence of neglect in the past. I do not think that it is necessary to remind Deputies that the original intention in the marking out of the railway system in Ireland was not in the interests of the nation, but simply in the interests of military services, and to meet requirements from a military point of view. Industries have in no case received the attention that they should have received. I desire to lay stress upon one important point in the matter of railway management and that is the importation of rolling stock. On this matter recently an explanation was submitted by one of our chief railway companies—the Great Southern and Western—by way of reply in one of the daily newspapers to a statement made to the Fiscal Inquiry Committee set up by the Government. The railway company claim that their works are the largest in Ireland, and they claim that the engines and other rolling stock exclusively manufactured at their works could not be surpassed in workmanship or anything else. I should have said they do not claim that, but I do claim it, and I think anyone who has any knowledge of the work turned out at Inchicore can form no other opinion than that it is nothing short of a scandal that rolling stock is imported into the country when it can be manufactured much better and more economically at Inchicore. That is what has been going on in the past. It is up to the Government to make some effort to stop it.

As a matter of comparison from an economic side, the Company state it has been their policy to manufacture everything in the nature of rolling stock that they require. It would be interesting to know what quantity of imported rolling stock and equipment has been ordered from Scotland and England within the last 10 or 12 years. A good deal of the rolling stock that is being used was ordered probably a year or two before it reached here. On the Dublin quays at the present moment one can see a large consignment of axle wheels and many other finished requirements for rolling stock. It is very unfair for the railway companies to say that such work cannot be done as cheaply and as well here. The Company admits that six large engines were imported about two years ago. I should like to point out that those engines have only been placed on traffic since the recent destruction of the railways and they have not proved very satisfactory as regards oil or coal consumption. They have already been put down for general overhauling and repairing. That is what I put forward as an argument in favour of the work that has occasionally been turned out at Inchicore. In the case of imported rolling stock there has been a greater cost for overhauling and repairing it, and that has added considerably to the expenses which come under the heading exclusively of overhead

8 o'clock. charges. Consequently the company put the proposition that owing to the cost of wages, which is generally what they fall back upon, this work could not be done in Ireland. A short time ago some 20 boilers were imported from England and they had some very serious defects. No provision was made for tube plates or steam pipes and the result was that they have to be overhauled and remedied at Inchicore Works at considerable cost. The same applies to other large stocks of engine parts that have like defects. Notwithstanding that the Company have resident Inspectors in stations in England, at substantial salaries, we have not been able to tell to what charge the outlay, in this respect, has been put to, whether put against the cost of the home product or not; it certainly is not shown against the imported article. Now the question is why should the Irish Railway Companies desire to purchase finished rolling stock in England at a greater cost than purchasing the raw material outside of England and manufacturing their own rolling stock at home would mean, because it is a fact that the cost of the raw material for home manufacture can be purchased at a lower figure outside England than it can be purchased in England. By that I would like to make it clear that there is evidently a ring in existence in England inside which the Irish Companies are compelled to buy the finished article notwithstanding the fact that if they manufactured their rolling-stock in Ireland they could import the raw material from outside England at probably half the cost they are paying through the ring in England and which shows, as I would say, that they are paying through the nose.

The argument in the article that I refer to is a matter that they dealt with some time ago, and it is that the principal cause is that the existing rate of wages paid to skilled and semi-skilled tradesmen here are so much in excess of those paid in Great Britain that it is a question whether we can continue to manufacture new rolling stock at Inchicore as cheaply as it can be imported. That article at the moment referred to the question of importing a number of coaches from England, and I am glad to say that since the publication of that article that whatever communication had taken place between the men and the Company the result was that the men are making the four or five coaches though it had been intended to import them from England. Now the Company have not explained why they made this change. I do not know whether the Minister for Industry and Commerce had anything to do with it or not, but the fact remains that the Company's case that they were paying £300 each more for the home article than for those imported has apparently fallen to the ground, and I hope that is the last we will hear of the importation of rolling stock by the Great Southern Railway. At the moment I do not wish to refer any further to that particular matter except to say that some of the material which I believe is at the North Wall is for the Cork and Passage Railway. I do not know what amount of plant they have down there for finishing raw material work for minor requirements, but I think some effort ought to be made by the Government to secure that all this money, which runs into huge sums annually, ought to be kept in Ireland and used for providing much needed employment. My main reason in bringing these matters before the Dáil is with that object in view. I do not stand here to take up a case, or to exploit a case on behalf of the men on the wages question, but I do believe that if there is any difference of opinion between the Companies and their men on the question of wages, by which it can be made possible to keep all this work at home, the men will do their part.

There is just another matter to which I may refer, and that is this: the Governor-General in his statement referred with gratitude to the services of the various arms of our National Defence. I feel that the best gratitude we could extend to those men who have borne the brunt of the unfortunate struggle in the trouble in the past is that a good honest effort ought to be made to provide them with employment on their disbandment from the Army.

Mr. A. BYRNE: And their insurance money.

Mr. DOYLE: I conclude these few observations by supporting the motion.

Mr. D'ALTON: The Governor-General's Address provides us with a very large field for debate. It has been used to a very great extent, and to an extent that I do not intend to follow myself. But I wish to refer to one portion of that Address in which the Governor-General deals with the question of unemployment and with the results that follow from it. The words of the Governor-General are:—

country. Developments are at present hampered by disagreements between employers and employees to the loss not only of those directly concerned but of the general community."

I think that at the present moment the question of unemployment and what it means for Ireland, and the question of the various disputes that have taken place between employers and employees is a matter that deserves the very greatest consideration from this Dáil. A strike or a lock-out is, to my mind, a war without guns. In its results, it is quite as injurious in its own way as war, and like war, it rarely justifies itself. If we hope for a development of industries in this country we must see that both employers and employees, capital and labour, meet together on the one solid ground, and that is to arrange between themselves that their joint efforts have got to be for the advancement of these industries, and to have these industries so carried on in the country that they will command the confidence of all. There is really little use in counting that those who have money in Ireland they will place it in Irish industries to develop factories in the country if they are to be met with, in twelve months' time, a strike of their workers employed in these factories. Neither can we expect that the workmen of this country are going to remain in Ireland if they are certain, in the first instance, of better wages in another country, and, above all, if they are certain that their employment is to be more constant elsewhere. Labour disputes are injurious to both parties, injurious to capital and to labour. We cannot expect either that those in foreign countries, in America or elsewhere, who may wish to start industries in this country, will come here unless they see some certainty or some security that not alone will they be able to earn a fair interest on the capital invested but that they have security in the industry when it is started.

The Minister for Industry and Commerce has been engaged several months in trying to arrange the various disputes that have taken place in this country. We have been confronted with one of them lately in the shipping dispute, and others of them are still unsettled. I ask, why is there not some result to be gained from the labours of the Minister and those who have been associated with him in bringing these disputes for the time being to a happy ending. If these disputes are not to recur within a period of six months or three months, or maybe a month, it is rather a pity that all these efforts have been made only to secure a temporary continuance of the trade of the country. We hope in Ireland that all the hidden wealth of this country will be developed, that her mines and her minerals will be got working, that existing industries will thrive and that new industries can be brought here. Surely if there is a difference between capital and labour to be everlastingly cropping up and coming before us, there will be no confidence; capital will not be invested, and labour will have no confidence in capital unless machinery is found by which these various disputes can be avoided, and until such time that in this country the lock-out on the one hand, or the strike on the other, will only be availed of when every other means has failed to bring the two sections together.

In Australia, in 1890, a big strike occurred when the ranchers and the graziers got into a war that practically destroyed most of New South Wales and New Zealand. They found that it was necessary to construct some kind of machinery by which the trade of the country was not going to be ruined and that financial loss was not going to be brought on the ranchers, and that the employers were not going to be driven to starvation or forced to go to other countries to earn a living. In 1894 they established their Conciliation and Arbitration Courts. There were various Acts of Parliament passed in Australia, New Zealand and New South Wales between 1895 and 1912 by which these Conciliation and Arbitration Courts were brought into conformity with what was necessary for the good of the country. These Courts secured what they desired, and what they were meant to secure, peace between capital and labour. Possibly they have not attained all that was expected of them, but this they did for Australia, and to a certain extent they have done the same in America; they prevented strikes that would otherwise have taken place, and they succeeded in making capital have confidence in the country, and also succeeded in bringing larger sums of money to be invested in Australia, New South Wales and New Zealand, both in land and in factories.

Now, I believe from what I have heard that there are many Conciliation Boards at present working in Ireland. Some are working on railways and a few are connected with creameries. If it were the spirit of the Dáil, as I believe it is of the people of the country, that strikes and lock-outs should be avoided and that women and little children should not be made to suffer hunger and poverty, it would be for us to adopt every available method, to use any machinery within our power to have those evils avoided. The hardships of a lock-out, when men are turned out of their employment, because employers have to compete with the manufacturers in other countries, could be avoided if these Conciliation Boards were set up. These grievances could be met by the formation of such boards as have been formed in other countries with representatives from both employers and employed in equal proportions. If such boards fail to compose the differences in their own particular district they should go before an arbitration court at which a member of the legal profession should be chairman, and whilst that court was sitting a strike or lock-out should be declared illegal with the consent of every member of the Dáil. That suggestion of mine does not interfere either with the right of men when forced to strike for a higher wage, or with the right of the employer to lock his men out, and to fight the matter out as they have already done. My idea is to see that these disputes that are ruining the industry of the country should be avoided, and that people who have money, say in foreign securities because they are afraid to invest it at home, could put it into Irish industries when they knew that such industries would not be upset within twelve months. I hope my views will fall on willing ears, and that Deputies will consider the matter in the same spirit in which I have brought it forward. If at a later stage representatives from each of the parties in this Dáil form into a small Committee and discuss the possibility of setting up these courts and recommend them to the country, I believe that every Deputy will have the support of all his constituents.

Mr. BAXTER: I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion put and agreed to.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRIVATE BILL PROCEDURE.

PADRAIC O MAILLE: I beg to move that the report of the Committee on Private Bill Procedure be referred back to the Committee for further consideration.

Motion put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: I beg to move the adjournment of the Dáil until 3 o'clock to-morrow.

QUESTION ON ADJOURNMENT.

BURIAL OF HUNGER STRIKER.

Mr. T. MURPHY: I gave notice that I would raise the question of the alleged refusal of the Government to hand over the body of the hunger striker who died yesterday morning to his relatives for burial. In any remarks I am going to make here I do not wish to aggravate the situation. I think that the decision of the Government, if the reports in the newspapers are true, is an extraordinary one, and I think it would be found that, so far as the opinion of the people of the country is concerned, the decision is not a wise one. The decision arranging that this man's body should be retained by the prison authorities to be buried within the precincts of the prison amounts almost to this, that this man, who has been an untried prisoner, and who has been in prison for twelve months, is to be treated as if he was an ordinary murderer. I do not think that that is wise, and I believe that every Deputy here and everybody in the country will agree that the decision of the Government to permit the meetings of the Republican Party to be held, to permit the Republican publications to appear, and not to interfere with the Republican propaganda, is a wise one. I believe if the Government are prepared to reconsider this question, and if we have a statement to-night to the effect that they are willing to hand over the remains, it will have a very reassuring effect throughout the country. I do not intend to elaborate this matter any further, but I think that we who have the reputation of being very generous to our dead and of giving them decent funerals will be establishing a bad precedent if we deny our opponents the right to a Christian burial. In the County Cork the mother of the hunger striker is living. She is an old woman on the verge of the grave, and it would be very sad if this man's body were not allowed to go back to be buried amongst his own people.

Mr. JOHNSON: I would like to support the views expressed by Deputy Murphy. I think it is an unwise policy that, it is stated, has been decided upon. I hope it has not been decided upon by the Government. I think it would reflect badly upon their good-sense and general policy. On the lowest grounds, I think there would be very much more advantage taken to the detriment of the Government's good name by the refusal to let the body of an untried prisoner be taken home than could be taken even by the most elaborate demonstration, the fear of which is, presumably, the reason why the Government is said to have come to the decision not to allow the body of this prisoner to be sent home.

I think the case made by Deputy Murphy that he is an untried prisoner and that we have no right to consider him in the light of a criminal is sufficient to justify the demand that he makes that the body of his constituent should be returned to his home for burial. I do not think that there is any need for me to elaborate further. I simply add my earnest plea to his that the Government would reconsider the decision they have come to and hand over the body of Denis Barry to his relatives.

General MULCAHY: Much as the Government regret having to take such a decision as this, the fact is that having all the circumstances in mind and having carefully considered the matter the Government have decided that in the case of any of the prisoners dying on hunger strike they will not hand over the body to the friends at this particular stage for burial. It is not a question of refusing a man Christian burial or burying him as an ordinary criminal. The remains will get proper and reverential burial but inside premises that are official premises. If later, when the circumstances are such that advantage cannot be taken of a funeral demonstration to prejudice the safety of the State or to jeopardise further the lives of men who are still hunger-striking in prison, the friends of Barry or of any other person who may die in this wretched hunger-strike desire it, facilities will be granted to have the body of any such person transferred from the burial ground at present provided by the Government to any burial ground his friends or family may wish. The Government have to emphasise again the fact, that just now as at any other time during the last twelve months or more when the safety of the State is prejudiced and endangered, it is their duty to safeguard the State. Every type of pressure that can be brought on men to throw their lives away in a useless protest, in a protest about nothing that can be achieved, is being brought to bear on men many of whom are generous men, generous as regards honour and general intentions but nevertheless a danger to the State, and the most unscrupulous pressure is being brought on them to sacrifice their lives in this particular way, and day by day, and week by week this, that, and the other inducement is held out by people outside who are unscrupulous in the matter, that if the men inside hold out another day or week this, that and the other thing will be achieved. The men inside were simply filled with dismay for having to adopt the situation that they had been forced into and they feel that instead of being ordered to continue the strike, the hunger-strike should be called off by those outside. Instead of that, this type of pressure is being brought to bear on them. In the circumstances the Government have decided not to put into the hands of those people who are working up this pressure the additional opportunities of funeral demonstrations that would have the result of sacrificing additional lives inside, and perhaps additional lives outside.

The Dáil adjourned at 8.30 until Thursday, 22nd November, at 3 p.m.

CEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS. ORAL ANSWERS.

ESTABLISHMENT OF WAR COMPENSATION COURTS.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Finance whether he is now in a position to make an announcement regarding the setting up in Dublin of a branch of the War Compensation Court to deal with Claims for Compensation arising from actions of the British Army and R.I.C. during the period 1920-21, which claims do not come under the terms of reference of the Shaw Commission, and if he is in a position to make a statement as to the progress of the negotiations with the British Government on this subject; further, to ask whether, in view of the anxiety of many Motor Traders and others who have lost vast sums from the above-mentioned causes during that period, he will consider the desirability of a public announcement as to the probability or otherwise of compensation being obtained.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. E. Blythe): Negotiations with the British Government on this subject have reached an advanced stage. When the final arrangements have been made for the establishment of a Dublin Branch of the War Compensation Court a public announcement will be made without delay.

SPIRITS IN BONDED WAREHOUSES.

Major BRYAN COOPER asked the Minister for Finance whether he will issue a monthly return showing the stocks of Irish, British, and Foreign spirits, and of wines (indicating country of origin), remaining in the bonded warehouses of the Free State on the last day of each month.

Mr. BLYTHE: Arrangements have already been made for the circulation of a monthly return showing the stocks of Saorstát and Foreign spirits, respectively, remaining in bond in Saorstát Eireann on the last day of each month, and I hope that the first of these returns will be in the Deputy's hands at an early date.

The existing records do not distinguish between British spirits and other foreign spirits, and I am afraid that it will not be possible to supply the figures in regard to British spirits requested by the Deputy.

The particulars desired by the Deputy as regards wines will be included in future issues of the monthly return.

Major COOPER: May I ask the Minister whether this return will also be available for the public? I gather that the Wine and Spirit Trade will attach some importance to obtaining this return.

Mr. BLYTHE: Oh, certainly.

LAND COMMISSION ADVANCES.

PADRAIG K. O HOGAIN asked the Minister for Agriculture when the prescribed form, mentioned in Section 38 of the Land Act, 1923, will be available for making application to the Land Commission for an advance, for the purpose of redeeming the rent in cases of fee farms or leases; whether, where proceedings are instituted for recovery of the entire compounded arrears of rent, and where 75 per cent. of total arrears are offered by the tenant, proceedings will be stayed until such time as the prescribed form can be obtained.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. P. Hogan): The Rules under Section 38 of the Land Act, 1923, governing applications for advances for the purposes of redeeming certain fee farm and other rents, will shortly be ready and will then be published without delay.

The second part of the Question

assumes that there is doubt as to the amount of the arrears which will be payable by tenants who intend availing themselves of the provisions of this Section. That is not so. Cases coming under Section 38 are unaffected by the Clauses of the Act relating to compounded arrears of rent or payment in lieu of rent, and the full amount of the arrears due is payable. There is, accordingly, nothing to be gained by the withholding of fee farm rents or by the staying of proceedings, pending the issue of the Rules in question. A large proportion of the landlords of the country hold their lands under long leases or fee farm grants. Hence the impossibility of treating either lessees or fee farm grantees as tenants.

LEGAL PRACTITIONERS' ACCOMMODATION IN GREEN STREET COURTHOUSE.

Major BRYAN COOPER asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether he is aware of the inconvenience caused to legal practitioners attending Green Street Courthouse by the encroachment of witnesses, police, and spectators on the very limited space available, and whether he will consider the issuing of instructions that the space allotted to the legal profession be reserved for them exclusively.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. K. O'Higgins): No complaints with regard to the inconvenience referred to have been made, and it is thought that the accommodation is adequate and the allocation of space satisfactory. If, however, the Deputy has reason to believe that the inconvenience exists, and will let me have particulars, I will see that the matter is further investigated.

Major COOPER: Will the Minister go and look for himself? I did so before I put down this question.

PROTECTION OF GAME AND WILD FOWL.

Mr. P. W. SHAW asked the Minister for Home Affairs if he will introduce legislation for the protection of game and wild fowl, as owing to the fact that pheasant and partridge have been shot and poached during the close season they are rapidly becoming extinct in this country.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I have no information that the existing laws for the protection of game and wild fowl are insufficient. I will, however, see that these laws are strictly enforced, and if it is found that they are not adequate for the purpose, I will consider the question of further legislation.

Mr. SHAW: Arising out of that answer, I beg to state that they are absolutely out of date altogether.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy cannot make a statement.

Mr. WOLFE: I desire to ask the Minister if he is aware a large number of people in the country, with a 10/- licence, are constantly engaged shooting game, and a still larger number are shooting game without any licence. In view of the fact that the three guinea game licence has become a dead letter, will he consider the advisability of revising the scale of charges from top to toe for the purpose of augmenting the Exchequer?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I am not aware of the state of affairs alleged to exist by the Deputy. I am prepared to draw the special attention of the police to the matter of licences, both ordinary licences and game licences.

KILLENAULE DISTRICT TELEGRAPHS.

Mr. L. J. D'ALTON asked the Postmaster-General whether he will take steps to expedite the necessary repairs to the telegraphic wires in the Killenaule district.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. J. J. Walsh): The telegraphic circuits between Callan and other offices, including Killenaule, were very extensively damaged during the late troubles, but temporary repairs were effected and communication restored in June last. Temporary interruptions of service have since occurred due to the state of the lines, and the work of effecting permanent repairs will be undertaken as soon as possible. Until, however, the main lines serving important centres have been attended to it is not practicable to restore to a normal condition the single wire lines to outlying places.

I am informed that the circuit to Killenale is at present working satisfactorily.

PRIVATE NOTICE QUESTION.

JEWISH CITIZENS MURDERED IN DUBLIN.

DOMHNAL MacCARTHAIGH asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether he has any information to give relative the recent murders of citizens of the Saorstát of the Jewish faith in the streets of Dublin; whether any special precautions have been taken to protect Jewish citizens from further attacks.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Sectarian crime has not within living memory manifested itself in Dublin, and I do not believe that we are now faced with anything so horrible. I incline rather to the view that a perverted mentality wreaking a private vengeance has deliberately sought to give the crime that complexion. Investigations are proceeding energetically, and the view of the Ministry is that successful detection of crime is the most effective protection against future crime that can be afforded to all citizens.

If any individual citizen, of whatever class, creed, or party, has reason to believe that he is specially menaced, the best efforts will be made to afford him adequate protection. I feel sure that I am voicing the view of the country and of the Dáil when I say that the persecution of any religious community is utterly abhorrent and detestable, and that it is a common hope that these two crimes, so tragic and terrible in themselves, will not be found to have their roots in any general conspiracy against the community to which the deceased gentlemen belonged. That community has never been persecuted here, and all decent citizens would view with disgust, and would join in denouncing, any departure from that record.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. JOHNSON: I desire to raise a matter of privilege, the privilege of the Dáil in their relations to the Executive Council. I am referring to the 21st Annual Report of the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction recently issued, or, shall I say, recently published? Though the report is dated 1922, on the front page and on the cover, it is signed 22nd February, 1923. The point that I wish to raise has reference to the method of presentation of this report. Hitherto the reports, signed by the Vice-President of the Department, were submitted, through the Chief Secretary, to the Lord Lieutenant, and thereafter published. But there has been a change, as perhaps the Deputies will realise, in the administration both of the Department and the Government of the country. The recent report is signed, not by the Vice-President of the Department, but by the Minister for Agriculture. It is addressed to His Excellency, the Governor-General, and it is submitted to the President and Members of the Executive Council, in a letter signed by P. Hogan, Minister, in the following words:—

"I submit herewith the Annual Report of the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction for the year 1921. The Report should be presented to the Oireachtas in accordance with 62 and 63 Victoria, chap. 60, section 26."

That letter to the President and the members of the Executive Council signed by the Minister for Agriculture is acknowledged by the Secretary to the Executive Council as follows:—

"Minister for Agriculture,—

"A Chara.—I am directed by the Executive Council to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 24th instant, transmitting copy of the Annual Report of the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction for the year 1921."

I refer to the Constitution, and I find in Article 54 that "The Executive Council shall be collectively responsible for all matters concerning the Departments of State administered by the Members of the Executive Council," and Article 56 says: "Every Minister who is not a member of the Executive Council shall be the responsible and of the Department or Departments under his charge, and shall be individually responsible to Dáil Eireann alone for the administration of the Department or Departments of which he is the head." Now, this is not an enormous crime, but I want to draw attention to the fact that it is a mistake, and, I think, it is a mistake that should not be allowed to be repeated. The Minister is directly appointed to take charge of the Ministry of Agriculture and be responsible to Dáil Eireann alone. I submit that he ought, therefore, to have submitted his report to Dáil Eireann alone, and not even to the Governor-General. The Governor-General certainly would require a copy. Dáil Eireann is the body to whom this Report should be submitted. My principal reason for bringing this forward is that I want to guard against what I think is a tendency in the wrong direction, that is, to make Ministers who are not members of the Executive Council subordinate to the Executive Council. When the Minister for Agriculture, who is responsible to Dáil Eireann alone, according to the Constitution, submits his Report to the President and Members of the Executive Council, asking them inferentially to present this Report to the Oireachtas, it is the wrong way about. The Dáil, I submit, should be the recipient of the Reports, and the Members of the Executive Council and the President should, as a matter of course, have a copy. I have raised it, because I want, as I say, to guard against what I think is an unfortunate tendency and a misunderstanding, and a forgetting of the relations of the Dáil and the Ministry and those Ministers who are not Members of the Executive Council, and their relations also to the Executive Council. I think it is important rather as a sign than anything else, and I would submit that it is not in accordance with the intention of the Constitution, and not in accordance with the duty of the Minister.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE

(Mr. Hogan): I agree with Deputy Johnson that the procedure adopted in this case is a mistake. I do not think we need go into the question now as to what the proper procedure for presenting reports to the Dáil should be, but I agree that the procedure adopted in this case, and for which I am responsible, is a mistake. I also agree with him that the relation between the External Ministers and the Executive Council should be kept, at least, clear and defined. As he himself said, the procedure discussed here is not in itself going to subordinate in any way the External Ministers to the Executive Council, but the precedent is wrong; that is so, and I agree it is necessary to be careful that these precedents should not be made. I think we can discuss, afterwards, what the proper procedure should be.

BUSINESS OF THE DAIL.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Before we enter on the business, I want to remind the Dáil that the debate upon the motion of thanks to the Governor-General for his Address was adjourned yesterday and should be taken up as first business to-day, and that, I understand, is the intention. Subsequently, on the Order Paper there are five Bills down for Second Reading, that is, Numbers 2, 5, 6, 7, and 8. It has been suggested to me that it might be convenient to take all the Second Readings before entering upon the Committee Stage of the Civil Service Regulation (No. 2) Bill, or the Report Stage of the Courts of Justice Bill. But that arrangement, if it is agreed upon, would want to be made before we enter upon the business.

Agreed.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: May I ask if we can be given any idea as to the nature of the business that will be before us to-morrow and whether we shall meet in the ordinary course of events as is usual at 12 o'clock noon.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. O'Higgins): On the question whether we meet in the ordinary way on Friday, the suggestion has been made that we should meet to-morrow at 3 o'clock to enable Deputies to attend the funeral of the late Mr. Derham, T.D. That is a matter that we are prepared to leave to the Dáil as a whole. As to the question of the business, I think it is unlikely that we

 was set through the whole of our programme for to-day, but at the moment I cannot say what other business will be before the Dáil to-morrow.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGINS: The reason I ask was that the President yesterday intimated that the Minister for Finance would make a statement to-morrow, and I wondered would it be possible for the Minister for Finance, if here, to make his statement immediately after questions to-morrow and before we proceed with the other business?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The statement will be made to-morrow, either by the Minister for Finance or some substitute for him, immediately after question time.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Are we to assume that the hour of meeting, which was changed to 12 o'clock on Fridays, to suit the convenience of Deputies, will be 3 o'clock to-morrow, and that the adjournment will be taken at 8.30, as usual, and that the statement, either by the Minister for Finance or on behalf of the Minister for Finance, will be taken immediately after questions? With regard to the other business, it is not very likely that the Courts of Justice Bill (Report Stage) will be finished to-day. I think there are 48 Amendments, which will be hardly got through to-day. The other business is the Local Authorities Indemnity Bill and the First Reading of a Railway Bill, which should appear on the memoranda, but does not.

Mr. GOREY: We have no objection whatever to the meeting of the Dáil at 3 o'clock, but a good many Deputies arranged to get away at 4.45, and I think they will find it difficult to cancel these arrangements. We want to facilitate the Government in every way, and we will agree to meet at 3 o'clock, but to carry on till 8.30 would not fit in with our arrangements.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The suggestion must not be regarded in any real sense as a Government suggestion. It comes from private members. If any alternative arrangement is made, whether by pairing or otherwise, it would suit quite well. The matter is one for private members, and we are not pressing it in any way.

Mr. GOREY: We fall in entirely with the idea of meeting at 3 o'clock, but would it not be possible to adjourn at 4 o'clock?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is, after an hour.

Mr. GOREY: Yes. It may seem ridiculous, but it would fit in with our arrangements.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I think we might leave this over until this evening, and in the meantime there can be a discussion between the various parties themselves.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The suggestion is that Deputies might meet and discuss the matter between themselves with a view to finding facilities. There are some Deputies who will not find it possible to be here in time for the opening of the sitting, and possibly would prefer not to be here at all to-morrow.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S ADDRESS (MOTION FOR RESOLUTION OF THANKS).

Debate resumed on Motion "That the Dáil returns thanks to the Governor-General for his Address, and approves of the legislative programme of the Government, as outlined therein." (Mr. James Burke.)

Mr. BAXTER: In the Address under discussion, which we are to assume represents to the Dáil the policy of the Ministry, we are told by the Governor-General that high prices and high profits can no longer be sustained. I think I will be speaking what is in the minds of Deputies on this side of the Dáil, and in the minds of our farmers in the country, when I say that for the farmers in Ireland to-day there are no such things as high prices or high profits. For many of our commodities there are hardly any prices at all.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. Hogan): On a point of explanation, I do not think the Governor-General said that there were high prices or high profits in agriculture, or even suggested that. If he suggested anything, he suggested the contrary.

Mr. BAXTER: I am glad the Ministry puts a different construction on what appears to me to be meant by these words. We can only read what is in the Address. The Governor-General, in his Address, said: "High prices, high profits, and high wages can no longer be sustained by a country whose economic life has agriculture as its base and foundation."

Mr. HOGAN: I do not like the use of that word "meant." It is not a question of whether the Governor-General meant it, but the fact is that he never said it.

Mr. BAXTER: I can only read what is in the Governor-General's printed Address. When he speaks of high prices and high profits, I think I have the liberty to assume that we can read these words as applying to agriculture. It seems to me that the words apply all round. If the Governor-General meant that his words did not apply to agriculture, he has not said so, and, therefore, we can only assume that they do apply to agriculture. If he did not intend anything like that, I think he should have made the point clearer. As I was saying, there are no such things to-day as high prices or high profits for the Irish farmer, but, on the contrary, there are any amount of losses. I think a share of the responsibility for these losses must be left at the door of the Administration. For the last three or four months, the trade in the agricultural industry has been practically at a standstill. The channels of trade were closed against the farmers of Ireland. During the time that these channels of trade were closed, covering a period of two or three months, our ports were shut up, so that we could hardly send anything out of the country, unless we could manage to get it away by Belfast. During all that time the Irish farmer was expected to pay his rates and his rents, his Land Commission annuities and his income tax. There was no relief from these burdens, as far as the farmers were concerned. I believe there has been a failure on the part of the Ministry as far as we are concerned in this matter.

I am sorry that Deputy Davin is not in the House at the moment, but I heard him suggest yesterday that some time ago negotiations might have taken place which would eventually work out in bringing a great flow of trade to the North and to the port of Belfast in particular. I am sorry the Deputy is not here, but I would like to tell him that I do not know of anything that conduced more to bring a flow of trade to the port of Belfast than the fact that, for several months, the ports in Southern Ireland were shut down, and that for several months the farmers in our Southern counties were not able to get anything practically out of the country.

Mr. JOHNSON: Whom do you make responsible for that?

Mr. BAXTER: In our county town we have had for several weeks and months past as many as seven engines waiting on a Sunday morning to take the produce of farmers in the West and in the Midlands to the port of Belfast. It was not a bad thing for our Southern and Western farmers that it was possible to get some of their produce through to the port of Belfast. Indeed, but for this fact agriculture would have suffered even much more than it has already suffered. Deputy Johnson asks me, whom do I make responsible for that? I presume the Deputy himself will tell the Dáil that he and his party were in no way responsible for the closing down of the ports. If the Deputy tells the Dáil that, it will be for us to look around and see who was responsible. It seems to me, however, that the failure of those engaged working on the docks and engaged in the trade of the country in the South to come to any arrangement, caused this grievous loss to the farmers of the country, and that it is a matter for sincere regret.

I just want to remind Deputy Davin that if produce could be brought to the port of Belfast and if a flow of trade was brought to that port, the Labour Party in Southern Ireland would have to examine their consciences and see what part they were playing, and had

[Mr. Baxter.] played, in bringing trade to that port. Deputy Johnson, I am sure, would tell me that they were not paid sufficient wages, and that the workers would not work for what was not a living wage.

Mr. JOHNSON: They were satisfied to go on.

Mr. BAXTER: I will be partly in agreement with the Labour Deputies when they tell us that because of the high cost of living they are not able to get as much for the wages they are paid as they might get. I think I must find fault with the administration, as no effort has been made to reduce the cost of living. I think that has been during the past twelve months, is at present, and must always be, in this country, the root cause of whatever economic troubles we may have to suffer from here. I think as long as the Administration passes over this and does not recognise this root cause of our trouble, we will have a recurrence of these troubles perpetually. There is no doubt that the cost of living to-day is exceedingly high. It is much higher than it ought to be. I may be asked, what is the remedy? I think all parties in the country can, working together, find a remedy. I would say that it is up to the Labour Party, above any other party, to seek a remedy. They certainly suffer more, or at least as much, and complain perhaps more, than any other party, because of what they are suffering from the high cost of living. It is true, when we sell an article of produce in one of our country towns at eighteen pence, that it costs in a poulterer's in Dublin 6/-. That is nothing less than a public scandal. I think where anything like that is going on it is up to the Administration to see what they can do to effect a change. I would suggest to the Labour Party very seriously that if they get together a few of the men in their organisation with business capacity, and if they spend some of the money that has to be spent when strikes occur, in capitalising a concern, I think they would be able to build up in the city of Dublin a food depot, with branches of that depot, that would supply the workers with food at a smaller figure than they are paying to-day.

They could purchase directly from the producers in the country. It seems to me that that is the first step towards reducing the cost of living.

We have unquestionably in this country too many people living between the producers and the consumers and passing on what the producers can supply to the people who are consuming. We have enough people living like that to-day to serve a nation of thirty millions. I am sorry to say that they are doing this badly, but they are making certain to pay themselves well. I think if the Labour Party took that step it would be up to the farmers to take some steps to meet the consumers, and it would be up to both parties to bring pressure on the Administration to assist them, and the Administration could assist them. That is the first step towards reducing the cost of living, and I would commend it to the Labour Party. For the Administration, perhaps, it is a difficult matter to make a suggestion. We know that there are vested interests, very influential interests, working as the middlemen in this country to-day, and I am sure the Administration will be very chary about tackling these interests. It is possible that the Minister for Finance may be looking to many of these to assist him now when floating his loan. We know, for other reasons, the Administration in other countries is generally slow to tackle vested interests, but I am afraid, unless an effort is made, we will have this recurrence of economic unrest one year after another, and, unless a bold step is taken by the Administration towards reducing the cost of living by introducing legislation, if necessary, any other section in this country cannot hope to effect very much.

I said a moment ago that the Ministry, particularly the Ministry of Agriculture, despite the fact that our trade channels were closed against us, expect us particularly to pay our land purchase annuities. I would like to tell the Minister for Agriculture that, whatever opinion he himself may have about the Land Bill that was passed during the last Dáil, I think I am voicing the opinions of the farmers when I say that that part of the Land Bill which applies to unpurchased tenants is very unsatisfactory. I go further and say it is well for the landlords of Ireland that the present Administration was returned, for if the Farmers' Party and the Labour Party had come into this Dáil in stronger numbers there is every possibility there would be an Amending Bill to the present Act that would have been more fair to the unpurchased tenants than the Bill that went through the last Dáil. We have been asked for one year's arrears, less 5/- in the £, and the Minister for Agriculture may think, because that one year's arrears came in quickly, that the Bill is acceptable and that the people are satisfied with it. If he is, he is making a mistake. That year's arrears came in quickly because many of us advised the unpurchased tenants up and down the country that they would have to pay one year's arrears at any time. We would have been prepared to go off and pay one year's arrears. They knew that, and when the Bill went through we advised them to pay it. That is why they came in so quickly. But the remainder will not come in so quickly, because it is not to be had in the country. We are asked for half a year's arrears. I am expressing it mildly when I say there is consternation among the farmers who have been asked to pay this half year's annuity. I want to urge on the Minister for Agriculture the fact that for the unpurchased tenant who did owe three years' arrears the position is very serious. I presume under the Bill the tenants will be paying at the same time their annuities or interest in lieu of rent and paying their arrears of rent as well. The Minister for Agriculture ought to know that to-day, money is not to be got in the country or got from the farmers, and I would suggest to the Minister for Agriculture that he will be very well advised to see that the Land Commission will not press in the immediate future for the payment of the remainder of the arrears of rent. If there is pressure put on, the Land Commission will, in thousands of cases, have to go to the courts and the bailiffs will come on the land and in some cases the land will have to be sold in the courts. I do not think that will be good from the economic point of view for the country as a whole. I suggest to the Minister he will be very well advised to consider what steps he will take, if he would anticipate taking any extreme steps in this matter.

Yesterday there was a question raised as to the position of the Minister for External Affairs and the continuance of that Ministry; also a point or two was made as to the position of the representatives of this country abroad. We are given to understand that something like £37,000 is being spent on representatives of this country in other countries. I would like to know, when Consuls were being sent out from Ireland or representatives to Berlin, Rotterdam, Paris, Geneva, and New York, if the Minister for Agriculture had anything to say as to the type of man that was sent out to represent this country in those foreign places. The reason I put that question is, we all agree that agriculture is the one industry from which we are able to export anything worth mentioning from Ireland at all. Our main exports are from the agricultural industry. What we send abroad and sell abroad we take from the land. I do not think this country can ever be built up either by great statesmen or great politicians or great soldiers unless we have got at the same time good workers in trade and commerce. Whatever may be said for having representatives abroad, it seems to me that if those men are to do anything for the country at all they will do it, not by paying tribute at a foreign Court, but they will do it if they go there from this country, understanding the real position of the foundations of this State, going there as trade representatives of this country, knowing what we have got to sell, going there to try to make markets for us for what we have got to sell, and as well capable of understanding our industry at home and understanding the same industry abroad, capable of advising the Minister for Agriculture at home as to the position in foreign countries, what we can send to the people of those countries, and to advise us as well what is the nature of the product our competitors are sending to the markets of the world.

I do not think any man can do very much for Ireland in a foreign country unless he understands everything about agriculture in Ireland, and as much as it is possible for him to learn about agriculture in the country where he is a representative. I regret the fact, if it is a fact, that Ireland has no representative in Denmark. Of all our competitors none is doing more to retard Ireland's progress and prosperity than Denmark; Denmark is the most dangerous and most able competitor of our small farmers. She has practically beaten us in the world's markets in every article of produce that we have to sell, and she is the country that our farmers need to watch. We cannot all go there to do so and to see how things are done, but if this State sends out any representatives at all Denmark is one of the countries where we should have a man, understanding the industry there and at home and advising us of the nature of the competition we may expect. I commend that point very strongly to the Minister for Agriculture, and I hope to hear something about it from him.

I regret the fact that no mention was made in the Governor-General's Address as to the operation of the Boundary Commission. I do not know if the absence of any reference to this matter goes to show that nothing will be done in the immediate future. I hope not. A fortnight ago we were given to understand here that something would soon be done. It is some months, I think, since we were notified of the fact that our representative on the Boundary Commission was appointed and that the whole case was ready as far as the Saorstát was concerned. I think it is time that that Article of the Treaty had begun to operate and that the Ministry was showing to the people of the Saorstát, and to the people in the North-East and elsewhere, that they were really in earnest in seeing that the Clause would be made operative. I do not know if it is intended that there shall be a conference on this matter. If there is, let it be; but, if not, let the Administration say so and let steps be taken to make the Clause operative; otherwise let them tell the country that it is not to operate.

I have also to regret the fact that no mention is made in the Address as to when the financial position between Ireland and England will be straightened out, when we will be in a position to see where we stand under the Financial Clauses of the Treaty. It is a terribly serious matter. To-morrow a statement is to be made, and we will know the nature of the Loan the Minister for Finance is to float. I think that before we can expect investors to put money into any loan we should know where we stand with regard to the Financial Clauses of the Treaty. We should know what we owe England, or what England owes us, and I am afraid that no matter what statement the Minister for Finance may make regarding our internal position it will not be anything like a full statement until we know where we stand with regard to England, and what we owe England. Then we will know whether we are a bankrupt State or whether we are in a strong financial position.

I come to another point in the Address that I regret is not in accordance with my personal point of view. A few days ago we were given to understand, during the discussion on the question of economy, that there were to be cuts all round. I expected that next day we were to hear of further cuts. The Bill under discussion the following day and yesterday did not give us any reason to believe that further cuts were to be discussed. The Governor-General suggested that there should be all round economy. I do not think that any Deputy disagreed with that statement, which voiced the opinions of the Ministers, but I expect and would hope that an example would be given by the Governor-General himself, and I think it would have been much better if, instead of starting the cuts very low down indeed, the start had been made at the top, from the Governor-General down. I think I am stating a fact when I say that the Governor-General and his establishment is costing £37,000 in the year. I say that that is doubtful, and the Governor-General is not worth the money. It is too much for this poor State in its present financial position to contribute towards the upkeep of one individual and one household, and that is where the start in cuts ought to have been made. It is not too late, and I think it would be well for the Ministry to make an effort there, and make it very soon, and I suggest they should not stop there.

Let them come all the way down through the Ministers, through the Dáil and Seanad, and let them wield the axe on the salaries of all, because I think if we are to be consistent when we preach economy, we must give an example of it. It is easy to cut down other people's salaries. Many people can be very brave when that has to be done who will not be so courageous when it comes to cutting down their own. I think that is a point of view the Ministry should consider, and it will not be an unpopular action to take. In no other way, I think, can economies be effected. We have prisons with many prisoners costing the country many thousands, and a huge army costing at least five times more than the country can afford to pay for an Army, or as the Army ought to cost. We are told that the Army was essential for the maintenance of peace and order. It seems to me that peace and order have been restored, and that there is room for cutting down in the Army, and cutting down immediately. I suggest to the Ministry that if they would put into operation the advice that has been given pretty frequently, and even the advice given to them the other day by the head of the Irish Church, to release the prisoners, and let them go home to their peaceful avocations, no step they can take would go farther in cutting down expenditure. I know that at the moment this is not a popular question to raise in the Dáil.

Mr. HOGAN: It is.

Mr. BAXTER: I am glad to hear the Minister remark that the question of releasing the prisoners is a popular question in the Dáil, and I am very pleased indeed that he has come round to that point of view.

Mr. HOGAN: It is not mine.

Mr. BAXTER: We were told two or three days ago, at least, the President told me when I raised this matter the other evening.

that the question of the release of the prisoners did not depend on whether or not there was to be a resumption of civil war. I take it that the civil war was responsible for these seven or eight thousand prisoners being confined. I cannot see why, if the civil war has come to an end, and I believe it has come to an end, and that the Ministry itself is satisfied it has, that there is any reason for maintaining an army to keep these men in prison, some of them, perhaps, before many days to die. I can understand keeping men in prison when they have been charged, and put on their trial and convicted of some crime, but if it is to be the order of this new State that an individual can be flung into prison—and I know many of these men from my own county who are in prison, and I know their offences are very trivial, if any offence at all, and if they are to be kept in prison indefinitely, because as has been often and truly said some officer in control for some petty reason of his own, felt that a certain man should be confined, and if these men are to be confined indefinitely without any charge or trial, it is not a good foundation on which to build up a new and democratic State. I heard the Minister for Defence tell us yesterday evening there are brave and generous men in prison, and some of these men have gone very far on the road to another world. I do not think that the Dáil, and I said it here the other evening, should remain silent, when we have reached the stage that the civil conflict has come to an end, and when the accredited leader of the Republican party told us clearly and unmistakably it is at an end, and that there is no intention of resuming it. I cannot see, for the life of me, any reason in the Minister's action in keeping these men in prison any longer. I think the Government would be very well advised to take into account, as I have said, the point of view expressed by the head of the Irish Church, and release these men against whom there is no charge, and who have not been tried, and send them home. I make that suggestion, and let the Administration say whether they intend keeping the men or sending them home.

[Mr. Baxter.]

If they make their position clear on that matter, let the other party then take the responsibility, if there is a responsibility on them—and there is a responsibility on both sides to this conflict—let the other party take the responsibility then for what may take place if the Government are prepared to tell the country that they are going to release the prisoners before a certain date. This has to be done some time. It may as well be done in two months or in one month as in two years. The prisoners will have to be released some day, and the country will have to see what will happen when they come out. There is the same danger from them coming out in three weeks or a month as there is in six or twelve months. I think that the Minister for Finance would be doing a good deal to help forward the project he has before him in the floating of a Loan if he could bring back to the country a spirit of peace. I think it is in the hands of the Government to bring about that spirit of peace. It is in their hands, because they are in a strong position. If we like to say it, they are in the position of dictators. A little statesmanship has to be shown. Statesmanship is even better in the end than dictatorship, and the Government, by an act of statesmanship, can do much to bring peace to the country. They can, too, enhance their reputation, and they can win confidence from some of the people in this country who, up to the present, have not much confidence in them. If an act of statesmanship can help to restore peace and bring union to Ireland, the responsibility is on the shoulders of the administration of the day to show us that act of statesmanship.

Mr. K. O'HIGGINS: Speaking as one of the dictators who answer daily here to the representatives of the people for the policy pursued in this country, and for the administration of the affairs of this country, speaking as one of the dictators who hold no power, and could hold no power for half an hour, without the support of the majority of the representatives of the people, I want to deal very briefly with some points raised by Deputy Baxter towards the conclusion of his speech.

Peace and order, Deputy Baxter tells us, have been restored. We are glad to have that tribute from Deputy Baxter to the efforts that we have made and are still making towards the restoration of peace and order. Peace and order have been restored to an extent and in certain areas, and they have not been restored by mealy-mouthedness. Peace and order have been restored by men who faced facts; by men who did not mistake blackguardism for misguided patriotism; by men who, verbally and mentally, called a spade a spade. Deputy Baxter, as an agriculturist, ought to try to call a spade a spade. He invites us to say what we intend to do with the prisoners. Let me remind Deputy Baxter that when this hunger-strike started the Minister for Defence was signing release orders at the rate of about 100 per day, and let me ask Deputy Baxter whether it is not conceivable that it was that very fact that brought about the hunger strike. There was a process of selection going on, a process of judicious selection. Men were being returned home at the rate of 700 or 800 or 900 a week, and then, with a little preliminary propaganda with regard to prison conditions, you had the hunger strike. Why? Was it because 1,000 or 2,000 or 3,000 felt that the selection was going to be too judicious, that the dupes would be returned home, and that there might be some little delay before those on whom the real responsibility lies would return home? Was it the all or none mentality? Why was it that when men were being released at the rate of about 100 per day you had this hunger strike, this freedom-or-the-grave campaign?

Peace and order have been restored, says Deputy Baxter. I am prepared to go with any Deputy through the police reports for the various counties and ask them honestly, as between man and man, whether those reports reflect an ideal or even a normal situation in many counties. I invite Deputies from West Cork, from Leitrim, from Offaly, from Tipperary and from Rosecommon, to say whether they would put their hands on their hearts and endorse the dictum of Deputy Baxter that peace and order have been restored. Peace and order are in process of being restored, and are in process of being restored because the Government has faced odium, has faced the odium of irresponsible people, has faced the taunts of irresponsible people and has acted with a certain strength and a certain definiteness of purpose. I can assure Deputy Baxter and other Deputies interested that the Government will continue to pursue that course very much regardless of the superficial jibes and taunts of people who either wholly fail to appreciate our national position or who are utterly reckless about the sentiments they express.

We cannot afford to gamble. We have no right to gamble. We have no right to take risks because they are not our own risks, because they are not personal to ourselves. We cannot afford to throw our bread upon the waters in the vague hope that it will return to us after many days. We threw our bread on the waters in the early months of last year, and on a flimsy undertaking we armed men who were against the Treaty, sent them into strong places throughout the country, and agreed to treat them as soldiers of the nation, if they would respect the nation and respect their own people, if they would say that they would not use their power to prevent the free expression of the people's will at an election, nor turn their arms against any Government that would come into existence as a result of such election. We threw our bread upon the waters and it returned to us, not after many days, but in a very short time, and we will throw our bread upon the waters no more. These prisoners will be released, gradually released, with a very careful watchful eye to the general situation in the country, released with a very full advertence to the activities and the general attitude of those who have been already released. This hunger strike will not be the means of releasing any man one day sooner than we think it safe to release him. It has already been the means of holding up for a month releases that were proceeding at the rate of 700 or 800 a week. Let them go home, said Deputy Baxter, to their peaceful avocations! Their peaceful avocations of burning the homes of their own people, wrecking the railways and the bridges of the country, cutting the very arteries of the Irish nation!

Deputy Baxter complained, in the opening portion of his address, that for a month the channels of trade were closed against farmers. Was it for a month or was it for close on two years that people have been doing their damndest to close the channels of trade against farmers and against every other section of the community? Mallow Bridge, every railway, every road bridge in the country was menaced, menaced by the most criminal, the most wanton, and the most utterly degraded conspiracy that ever menaced the political and economic life of any nation. It is not out of any desire to throw stones or use hard words against any section of our people that I speak like this, but so that facts may be faced, so that we may realise that there cannot be two Governments or two armies here, so that we may realise the truth embodied in one of the opening Articles of our Constitution, that "all power of government and authority, legislative, executive, and judicial in Ireland, are derived from the people of Ireland." Let them go home to their peaceful avocations, said Deputy Baxter, while the country is flooded with proclamations under the heading "Government of the Irish Republic"; while Mr. Aiken signs himself "Chief of the General Staff." What General Staff? From whom does he hold his commission or his authority? There are not going to be two Governments nor two armies here. Peace and order will be fully restored by the methods that have led to a measure of peace and order in the country now. The prisoners have not, we are told, been charged, put on trial, or convicted. Does Deputy Baxter think that the judicial machinery of any country would stand the strain of charging, and of the trial and conviction of the 13,000 men who were called out to wage this wanton criminal campaign against their own people? He says we must assume their innocence because they have not been charged, tried and convicted. Assume the innocence of people caught in arms or caught in the act of burning the homes of their fellow-citizens!

[Mr. K. O'Higgins.]

We will deal with the situation that surrounds us in the country according to the light God gave us and according to our own appreciation of our responsibilities to the citizens of the country, but we will not be rushed or stampeded by people who get up and talk vague sentimentality about our bravest and best, and about letting them go home to their peaceful avocations. Economy is on many lips at the moment and there are many suggestions, some sound, some utterly far-fetched and unsound, but the economy that points to gambling with the situation in the country, that urges us to take the risk of a renewal of the campaign that already has cost the country upwards of 100 millions, is something we cannot understand and that we have no intention whatever of adopting.

The accredited leaders, we are told, tell us the thing is at an end. The accredited leaders have told us many things within the last few years. Let them tell us one thing. Let them tell us that they abandon any claim to style themselves a rival Government; that they abandon any claim to maintain a rival army to the Army that is the people's Army and that is responsible to the people through this Parliament. Let the accredited leaders tell us they regard themselves as a political party like any other political party in the State, and that they are prepared to convince the minds rather than to coerce the bodies of their fellow-citizens. Arms are sown from one end of Ireland to the other. Why are they sown? To be used against whom? If there is recognition that the people are the source of authority here, why are those arms sown?

If Mr. De Valera or Mr. Aiken or Mr. Rutledge and their friends can secure a mandate from their fellow-citizens, they will be entitled to all the military and financial resources of this country; the man who attempts to oppose them will be a rebel against lawful authority here, and I have no doubt these people would know how to deal with him. Why then are those arms secreted from one end of Ireland to the other? To shoot crows, perhaps, that are eating Deputy Baxter's corn.

Mr. HOGAN (Minister for Agriculture): I do not think there is room for any misunderstanding as to what the Governor-General said about high wages, high profits and high prices, and there is no use pretending there is. I assure the Farmers' Party and Deputy Baxter I have not just discovered from him or anybody else that wages, prices and profits in agriculture are lower. It was with full advertence to that fact we drafted the Governor-General's speech, and there is no doubt whatever as to what he said and what he meant. He dealt with agriculture in one section and with industry in another. Dealing with agriculture he referred to the depression which has overtaken agriculture generally in Europe, and then he went on to explain the measures necessary to combat the depression in agriculture in this country. Dealing with industry, he spoke of high profits, high wages, and high prices being impossible in an agricultural country. We talked now about De Valera. I do not believe anybody else except De Valera could possibly have mis-read or misinterpreted that section. He could do it.

It is quite impossible to deal with this extremely grave question piecemeal. I know, and we all know, that agriculture is depressed, and we know this country above all places cannot afford to have agriculture depressed. The agricultural industry is vital to this country. I believe, as Deputy Baxter has stated, that realising the seriousness of that position, we must all do our part—the Government and the various parties—and I think the situation from the agricultural point of view is serious enough to justify me in saying that we can do a certain amount, but all men of good-will in all parties in the country must come half way to meet us. There is no use bluffing; there is no use in telling you what we can do if we do not mean to do it. The situation, though quite hopeful, is too serious for that. It is essentially a situation that needs the co-operation of all parties and all men of good-will in the country. With such co-operation it can be solved quickly and expeditiously; it can never be solved by the Government alone.

What is the position of agriculture? I am sorry to have to go into this matter at some length. This matter has been criticised from many different points of view. We can never get any real understanding of the position if we approach it in piece-meal fashion. When Deputy Davin, who made an excellent contribution to the debate, speaks, I know perfectly well he will talk about the railways. Yesterday, after telling us a lot of truth about the railway position, he ended by saying: "The result of high freights for agricultural produce is to put the farmer out of production." That is dealing with the case piece-meal. If there were nothing else but high freights it would be easy to solve the problem. There is no use in picking out one item—an item that suits the particular point of view of one party. There is no use in concentrating on that, no matter how important it may be, and blaming it for the general situation. When Deputy Heffernan or Deputy Baxter rise, I know perfectly well that one-quarter of their contribution to the debate will be on the general agricultural position, and three-quarters of it will relate to Land Commission annuities or payment in lieu of rent. We cannot approach the question that way. We must diagnose the case properly before we can even begin a cure.

The position in a nut-shell is that the farmers' prices at the present time are between 40 and 50 per cent. on an average over pre-war. It is hard to get the exact figure, but that is the average. I speak of the price of the produce which the farmer produces. Remember that the farmer produces 75 per cent. of the real wealth exported from the country. I will stand for that figure as accurate and as a minimum. Remember also that the index figure for his price is between 40 and 50 per cent. It is stated that farming is not paying and that farmers are producing at a loss. I will be quite frank about that. That may be the position with large farmers at this particular moment. It is not the position with the small farmers. Nobody can say that I have stated that the farmers are making a huge profit. I want to assure Deputies that I have not said that. What I am saying is that as far as the bulk of the farmers of the country are concerned, taking in the whole year, they are not producing at a loss. They are not producing at anything like the profit they should receive, but they are not producing at a loss.

Mr. JOHNSON: Would the Minister be able to tell us what, in his estimation, is the portion of the 75 per cent. which is produced by the small farmer—the farmer under 50 acres?

Mr. HOGAN: I would have only to guess at that. I should say it would be at least 50 per cent. I want to be safe. Consider the position of the average farmer, his overhead expenses, rents, rates, labour, freights, fertilisers, food-stuffs and seeds. He gets something between 40 and 50 per cent. over pre-war for what he produces. His rates are about one hundred and fifty per cent. increased.

Mr. WILSON: Three hundred per cent.

Mr. HOGAN: On an average. We can never get at remedies unless we diagnose the case. I understand that that is the average. His freights are increased about the same amount. You can pick out freights that are increased far more but on the average—

Mr. WILSON: On a point of order—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Is Deputy Wilson sure that it is a point of order?

Mr. WILSON: A gentleman representing the Department of Agriculture, before the Agricultural Commission, stated that agricultural produce freights on the Dublin and S. E. Railway was increased 475 per cent. above pre-war.

Mr. HOGAN: Agricultural produce on the D. and S. E. Railway was 475 per cent. increased—

Mr. WILSON: It is the evidence of your own servant.

Mr. HOGAN: I make a statement here. It is not going to be the last meeting of the Dáil. I am making a statement after having given the matter a considerable amount of thought. If we are dealing with various items we must get a bird's eye view of the position. On the average the freights are 150 per cent. increased. Labour is increased between 70 and 80 per cent. That is the average. Fertilisers and feeding stuffs have increased between 50 and 60 per cent. It is hard to get the averages for each, having regard to the fact that Basic Slag, which is used very largely by the farmer, is increased much more than 60 or 70 per cent. We find in any case that 60 or 70 per cent. would be about the average increase under this head. So you have the position in a nut-shell. His prices are about 40 to 50 per cent. over pre-war. His overhead expenses now are increased by 150 per cent., 60 per cent. and something like 80 per cent. Now examine that. These figures do not inevitably show that the farmer is producing at a loss. Examine them for a moment. Take rates. The average rate on land is little less than 7/- in the £ per acre. It is a little less than 7/- in the £, and hence the average rate paid on agricultural land in Ireland is about 7/- per annum per acre, taking the average valuation at £1 per acre, which is a bit high. That is not going to kill the farmer, and it is not killing the farmer. There are exceptions. There is the Co. Waterford and the Co. Dublin. But the Co. Waterford and the Co. Dublin do not matter, in making the calculation, because we have to look at the country as a whole. I say the rates are not killing the farmer. He has a genuine grievance that rates are 150 per cent. above pre-war. But it is not the rate question that is doing the harm. It is not the amount of the rates in an average Council that is doing the harm. His greater grievance is the wasteful and inefficient way in which the money is spent. That is a far greater grievance too than the 7/- per annum per acre. But that is not killing the farmer.

We are asked what we are going to do about the rates. There is a Bill being introduced, practically immediately, I understand, by the Local Government Department. That will give far greater control to the Government, not only over the total rate but over the spending of each item of the rate all over Ireland than the Department has now. In addition the abolition of the local bodies, like District Councils, will have the effect of throwing the onus directly on the County Council. It will be far easier to control when the small local bodies are, so to speak, agents for the County Council. There will be a tightening of the grip; and these measures will give the Local Government Department control over the amount of the rate, control over the various items of expenditure, and also put the onus on larger bodies which are more likely to be efficient as they will be elected from larger areas. These measures undoubtedly ought to deal with the rate question.

The agricultural labourer cannot be expected to lose more. The agricultural labourer has done his part, and a little more than his part. If Labour in the other industries of the country, in the industries that are living on the farmer, to the extent of 75 per cent. of the total production, the distributive and non-productive industries, would do half as much as the farmer and his labourer, the situation would be saved.

Mr. GOREY: They are not needed. They are drones. They are not industries.

Mr. HOGAN: Then you have the question of fertilisers, feeding stuffs and manures. They are high. They are under the figure of 80 per cent. on an average, 80 per cent. being the index figure. Sixty would be the index figure for them. Finally we have the question of freights. Now, Deputy Davin dealt with this question to a great extent yesterday. He asked when was the reconstruction of the railways of the country to be dealt with, and complained that it was taking a very long time to deal with. I agree that that is a question which cannot brook very much more delay. But Deputy Davin and the other Deputies in the Dáil know the difficulties. It is not a question, as everybody who has thought about it or who knows anything about it knows, of taking the railways of Ireland and putting a ring round Ireland and considering the railways within that ring. You all know that the railways of Ireland take the produce of Ireland out of the country. You all know that there are reactions in regard to the English railways. I am sure that Deputy Davin knows that there are very grave difficulties, and that it is not a simple question but a complex question, and that it may result in very serious differences between the railways of Ireland and the railways of England. I do hope that if these differences ever come to a head, as possibly they may, whatever little inconvenience or loss may be suffered momentarily in any endeavours which we may make to make our own settlement of our own railway question, that we will get the support of Deputy Davin and the other Deputies in the Dáil in taking up that attitude.

Now, these are the overhead expenses of the farmer; these are the prices, and what he must buy to produce; but much more important are the prices of what he must pay to live—the prices of tea, sugar, coal, stout and the rest. That is where the shoe really pinches. These are the problems. Bring down the rates and freights and bring down the price of manures, seeds, agricultural implements, tea, sugar, coal, meat; in one word, I am looking at it from the farmer's point of view, the cost of living, and that is what it comes to. The greatest relief the farmer can get, I agree with Deputy Baxter, would be to reduce the cost of living. I have left out rents. I will deal with that question of rents separately. I will only say now that if you were to wipe out rents—not merely to give a reduction of 25 or 55 or 65 per cent., but to wipe out rents entirely—you would give far less relief to the farmers than the relief that would be given by a 5 points drop in the cost of living. Some people have the habit of concentrating on non-essentials. This is a very difficult and a very complex subject, and this habit of concentrating on one point of it, of which you know something about, or upon non-essentials saves us from thought and leads nowhere. You have to face the situation as a whole. Deputy Baxter was right in saying that the essential thing for the farmer at the moment, and for the country as a whole, is to bring down the cost of living. Who is keeping up the cost of living? Not the farmer; he is looking on listlessly.

Mr. WILSON: And helplessly!

Mr. HOGAN: Not helplessly!

Mr. NAGLE: Hopelessly?

Mr. HOGAN: Well, I will not pursue that any further; but who is keeping up the cost of living? I have given the figures for the farmer, who is producing 75 per cent. of the real wealth of the country, and I have invited Deputy Good, or any other Deputy, to find a way out of the dilemma which I am putting up. You have the farmer with his index figure at 40. I do not know what the index figure of the prices retailed to the consumer are by the various distributing businesses of the country, but it must be 80. I do not know any index figure of the retail non-productive and distributing trades. I do not know what it is, but it is something between 150 and 200. Therefore you have the farmers of the country producing 75 per cent. of the wealth of the country, and I include the agricultural labourer. I will not state his index figure. I put the farmers at 40, and possibly I may put the labourers at 80. You have on the other side at least 80 for the employer and between 150 and 200 for the employees. That is keeping up the cost of living.

Now, undoubtedly the farmer will go out of production. That is certain—slowly, of course—but if he goes out of production it will prove a disaster for farming. But the small farmer can live, and will live, and most of the farmers in the country are small farmers. It will be a disaster all the same, and it will be a real disaster for our friends who are causing all the trouble and who are living on the farmer. The employer and the labourer here in Dublin will learn for the first time if they insist on killing the goose that lays the golden egg that they have been living on the farmer, who produces 75 per cent. of the wealth of the country. There will be nothing to distribute; no profits to be made, no wages to be earned. That is the situation. It is a national danger, and it is up to both employers and labourers, through their organisations here in Dublin, to face it. They are on their trial before the country. They are killing the main producer in the country, and they are on their trial not only as business men, but as patriots. If they united they could bring down the cost of living. I make them a present of this—it is an extremely difficult thing for the Government to try to do it. Anyone who likes can call that weakness, but I say it is an extremely difficult thing for any Government to interfere in trade or in trying to rule prices; but the situation is so serious that if both the employers and the employed in the distributing and the non-productive trades of the country insist on fleecing the farmer, I see no other alternative except to come to the Government and ask them to fix low prices.

It does not matter, so far as the farmer is concerned, how the cost of living is brought down. It does not matter if you attack the very high prices of agricultural machinery which he buys in order to produce; it does not matter if you attack the question by dealing with tea or sugar which he buys in order to live, or if you attack it from the point of view of bringing down the price of stout, which he does not want so much as the dock labourer, or clothing, which is absolutely necessary for the labourer here in Dublin. The real necessity of the moment is to bring down the cost of living. If that diagnosis is correct I ask the employer and the trade unionist here in Dublin, are they prepared to help and meet the farmers of the country, instead of sitting still and looking at each other across a table to see who will begin first? They are on their trial now, and the situation is urgent and serious, and if they are not prepared to come half way to meet us we must go more than half way to meet them. We see no other way out of it, although it is an extremely hard thing for any Government to do. You can approach the question of bringing down the cost of living from another angle. As I said a moment ago in reference to the County Dublin farmers, there were exceptions as far as the rate was concerned, and as far as the agricultural labourer was concerned. Their rate is much higher than that of any other farmers in Ireland.

Mr. WILSON: Or in England.

Mr. HOGAN: Yes, the rate paid by the County Dublin farmers is higher than that paid by any other farmers in Ireland, or, as Deputy Wilson said, in England. On the other hand, of course, it has to be remembered that the County Dublin farmer has great advantages. He is near his market. Milk is coming into the city of Dublin from the farmers of Louth and Meath at 1s. per gallon, ex Amiens Street. The price may have increased lately to 1s. 1d. or 1s. 2d. per gallon, but the milk is sold, retail, in Dublin, at 2s. 6d. and 2s. 8d. per gallon. That is the position you have to consider. Milk, as I say, was coming in last week ex Amiens Street at 1s. per gallon, and the retailers had not even to pay the carriage on it, but they sold it in Dublin at 2s. 6d. and 2s. 8d. per gallon. What, I ask, are the County Dublin farmers doing? There is a small fortune there for them. I take that as one item. If the farmers wake up from the listless lethargy that is over farming, and over most other industries in the country, they have the situation in their hands. I am glad to say there are some farmers waking up to the possibilities in that direction, as, for instance, Mr. Fahy, who did not get into the Dáil at the last election, but who is justifying his existence at the moment down in the County Cork. He is going on the right lines, and is now marketing his own produce.

Take the question of milk. Farmers around Dublin could sell and distribute milk in the city and make a big profit on it at 1s. 6d. per gallon. The consumer in Dublin could then get milk at 1s. 8d. per gallon, leaving the County Dublin farmer, or any other farmer who wished to get into the business, a well off man. I ask the County Dublin farmers why they do not do that. They answer, "Labour." They say that if they bought 30 or 40 cows to provide the city with a supply of milk they would have no one to milk the cows. They say they are now paying 43s. a week to their agricultural labourers, which is a rate higher than that paid in any other part of Ireland, or in England, to agricultural labourers. They say also that if they sold 100 cattle and bought 25 cows, the labourer would turn around and say "This is a different class of work," and that he would have to get a wage of £3 or £4 a week, the same as the Dublin cow-keepers are paying. I do not know whether that is so or not; I do not know whether these are labour difficulties or not, but I believe there are faults on both sides. I do know that on this question, if labour and the farmers are standing in the way of an understanding being arrived at between them that they are doing a bad turn, not only to the farmers but to the whole country, and in particular to the Dublin consumers, composed mainly of poor people. Bring down the cost of milk in Dublin, and I say the farmers and the labourers can do it, to 1s. 6d. per gallon, and what will the cost of living fall to? I could pick out other ways of increasing the farmers' price which at the same time would bring down the cost of living. I agree that that cannot be done without good will, and with a facing of facts from the labourer on the one side, and the farmer on the other.

If they agree with me that this is a correct diagnosis of the position, and that this high cost of living is actually killing the country, surely it would be possible, with a little bit of intelligence and good will on both sides, to have the situation tackled on these lines. That is, in respect of these two items. I could mention others; I could mention other directions in which farmers, business men and labour, knowing anything at all of the country, could help to bring down the cost of living. We cannot do it here, but you are forcing us to do something which is essentially the work of the citizens themselves. We could go in and run a business; we may have to do it yet, and we may have to take over the milk trade. Possibly we may have to go and distribute milk in Dublin, if this thing goes on much longer, but we should not be asked to do it. You could do it for yourselves. We are prepared to go half-way to meet you and to give you all the assistance that we can. If the farmers will wake up we will co-operate with them, and the same applies to labour, but if they do not they are forcing us to do something which may achieve an immediate object, but which will have reactions that are not healthy. That is the situation as I see it. There is no use in concentrating on freights or talking about rents.

As regards rents, Deputy Baxter complains that we are expecting them to pay their Land Commission annuities. In saying that he said he was voicing the opinions of the farmers of the country, and in doing that I thought I heard a catch in his voice that seemed to remind me of a member of the old Irish Parliamentary Party talking about the land for the people 20 years ago. He said he was voicing the opinions of the farmers of the country and that they were not going to pay these annuities or rents, that in fact they were going to bring in an amending Bill, or were thinking about it. That is humbug. There was not a single farmer candidate who got up and told that to the electorate two months ago.

Mr. BAXTER: On a point of order I did.

Mr. HOGAN: If that is so, I withdraw and apologise, but I may say this that I took the trouble to go through a file of newspapers containing speeches delivered during the late election campaign, and I also got the official programme of the Farmers' Party, and neither in these speeches nor in that programme did I find a single suggestion that the Land Bill was even to be amended. In taking up that attitude the Farmers' candidates acted very wisely. If I may say so, I read the speeches that appeared in the "Independent" newspaper delivered by Deputy Baxter, and I must confess that I missed the point he now makes. I am quite willing, at the same time, to accept what the Deputy has stated. I also read the speeches delivered by Deputy Heffernan in Tipperary, and I noticed that any reference in them to an amending Land Bill was conspicuous by its absence.

Mr. GOREY: Did you read mine?

Mr. HOGAN: I did.

Mr. GOREY: Did you find any references to an amending Land Bill in them?

Mr. HOGAN: No.

Mr. GOREY: Then you must not have read them.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Order.

Mr. HOGAN: Not a single member.

[Mr. Hogan.] of the Farmers' Party made this an issue at the election. They did not even say a word about an amending Land Bill, but now, two months after the election, we have Deputy Baxter, with this catch in his voice, coming forward and saying that he is voicing the opinions of the farmers of the country and that they are not going to pay annuities or rent.

Mr. BAXTER: I did say that, and was put in on that issue.

Mr. HOGAN: All I can say is that you managed to hide it very successfully.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: During my speeches I referred to an amending Land Bill, and the remarks I made were reported in other of the Dublin newspapers. The Minister says that he only read the speeches in the "Independent." I just wish to make that point clear. I do not think the Minister is in order in making that statement because all the speeches did not appear in the "Independent."

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Minister said he read the speeches in a particular newspaper, and did not find the reference in it. The Minister is entitled to say that he read a particular newspaper and did not see a particular thing in it. The Minister is quite in order in saying that.

Mr. GOREY: Everybody knows that the newspapers did not publish all the speeches delivered at the recent elections.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The papers are not a point of order.

Mr. HOGAN: We find now that all three, the "Freeman's Journal," the "Independent" and the "Irish Times" were the mouthpiece of one particular Party. I did not know where the strength came from before, but now we have it all. As they had the whole Press, the Farmers' Party should have got in first, but that was a mistake of theirs. Of the three candidates who went up at the last election, stating in their official programme that they proposed, not to repeal, but to amend the Land Act, not one of them got a sufficient number of votes to qualify them to get a refund of their deposits. There was not the slightest suggestion in the official programme of the Farmers' Party about amending the Land Bill. I have only got to say this—that there were no references as regards an amending Land Bill, except there may have been some made in out of the way villages which were not reported in the Press. References as regards an amending Land Bill were conspicuous by their absence in the speeches delivered during the elections by members of the Farmers' Party. Now they come here, two months after the event, talking about amending the Land Bill. As regards rents, these are less than 10 per cent. of the annual outlay of the average farmer; I should say they are even less than 10 per cent. They always get 90 per cent. in the time occupied with speeches which we hear delivered here, but in reality rents are less than 10 per cent. in the annual outlay of the average farmer.

We have dealt with rents. We have given a reduction of from 25 per cent. to 35 per cent. in rents, and 5 o'clock. that leaves a payment under that head of from 25 per cent. to 35 per cent. below pre-war. That is the problem that has got all the attention from Deputy Baxter, Deputy Heffernan, and other Deputies who think they are living twenty years back.

Mr. BAXTER: Not all.

Mr. HOGAN: Concentrate on the other 90 per cent. of the farmers' outlay. Do not be trying to humbug the country on the land question. I will not ask you to reduce that outlay 25 per cent. or 30 per cent. below pre-war but to 50 per cent. above pre-war, and you will be doing something. Five points reduction in the cost of living would do more for the farmer than the abolition of all rents, and if you have any doubt about it get a piece of pencil and paper and work it out. That is all I have to say on the Land Bill. We will endeavour to deal with the cost of living question. I ask the support and co-operation of labour and capital as well as of the farmers. They can solve it easier than we, but we will go half way. If this is a correct diagnosis of the case, is not the country in danger from the present high prices? I say to employers "are you not cutting your own throat," and I say to labour, who are claiming something like 200 per cent. above pre-war in the distributive trades, "you are killing labour."

Mr. JOHNSON: Has the Minister made any calculation of the effect of the reduction of wages in the distributive trades on retail prices?

Mr. HOGAN: I do not suggest, and never have suggested, that you are going to make a tremendous difference by any measures taken to deal with one side of the problem. All I do say is, that both clearly are to blame. Clearly, you cannot justify, in the face of the index figures produced by the farmer and his labour, the wage at present paid to the distributive workers, just as you cannot justify the profit there must be which the distributor is getting at present. You must have co-operation on both sides, but if they do not co-operate and face the facts as they are, they are going to kill the country, and we cannot afford to let them. We must then come in and control prices. That is a difficult thing to do, but we must do it. We cannot allow a situation like this to go on. The farmer gets 36 per cent. over the pre-war level, and the retailer sells at something like 100 per cent., and the retailers, plus the retailers' labourers, are getting their undue proportion of that. Deputy Johnson suggested some time ago that the real solution is to increase wages and there will be more to spend with the increased purchasing power. When you realise that 75 per cent., or very nearly 75 per cent., of the labour of the country is in the distributive, retailed, non-productive trades and that they are living at present on an industry which is certainly very depressed, surely you will agree that increased wages, in that situation, of the distributor, at the expense of the producer, who is depressed, is absolute madness. There is no way out of it on those lines. There is only one way out of it, and that is for labour and capital to face the situation, to get the facts, and if they agree on the facts, to do the patriotic thing and, if I may say so, to do the business thing as well.

Vol. 5.

Mr. J. GOOD: I think the Deputies listened with the greatest interest to the remarks that have fallen from the Minister for Agriculture. I look upon it as being a practical and useful speech in the present situation. He has pointed out that the cost of living is the real trouble at present. Those of us who are engaged in connection with commerce will agree with him wholeheartedly in that. The cost of living is the real trouble, and it is to the cost of living that we ought to address ourselves if we want to get the matter put right. He has mentioned two items which, on the face of it, demand some explanation as to why the charges are so high at the moment. The question of milk has long been a topic in Dublin, and it needs a considerable amount of explanation as to why the price should be at its present high figure. It is a very important item in the cost of living. Another very important item in the cost of living is the question of meat and, in view of the present price of cattle, it is exceedingly difficult for an ordinary lay man to understand why the price of meat should be at its present figure. I think an explanation also is needed as to why the price of meat should be so high. These are two exceedingly important factors in the cost of living. There is a third important factor in the cost of living, and that is the question of rent. I think Deputy Johnson will agree with me when I say that in a city like Dublin and its suburbs, the question of rent is one of the most important factors in the cost of living. On that question of rent one might say a good deal at the moment. When I was speaking on the subject to an amendment a few days ago I pointed out that wages at the moment in the building industry, which produces the houses, were at an exceedingly high figure, and I pointed out what the result of that wage was on the production of houses. The figures, you remember, were in the case of tradesmen 150 per cent. over pre-war level, and in the case of labour 220 per cent. over pre-war level. When we were discussing this matter I was anxious to draw attention to a point mentioned by Deputy Johnson. You will remember when he was speaking on the subject on the Address of the Governor-General he drew attention to the case of Copenhagen, and much attention has been directed by Deputies to the remarks which fell from him on that occasion.

You will remember in Deputy Johnson's reference to Copenhagen, he did not give us pre-war figures. He only gave us present figures, and he said, "Taking the rate as we find it in Dublin pre-war, and taking the rates as we found them in Copenhagen to-day, I draw certain conclusions." That, to my mind, was an exceedingly erroneous basis to take. That is, to take the present rate in one country and to take the pre-war rate in another.

Mr. JOHNSON: I took both pre-war and present rates.

Mr. GOOD: I have had some enquiries made into the matter, and I have succeeded in getting the pre-war rates in Copenhagen. I have not got a report of the proceedings when Deputy Johnson made his remarks on the subject, but the Deputies will remember that he told us bricklayers receive a very considerable wage in Copenhagen. I think the wage he gave us was £5 5s. 7d. The information I have does not bear out that. Wages of bricklayers in Copenhagen at the moment are identical to what they are in Dublin, 1/10¹/₂d. per hour. The only difference in the gross amount between what bricklayers receive in Copenhagen and here is that the bricklayer works two hours more in the week in Copenhagen. They work 48 hours there in summer and 42 in winter. If you take the average of 46, a bricklayer gets two hours more per week there than in Dublin. If you take two of them working the same number of hours you get the same rate in Copenhagen as in Dublin. To make a comparison with the other trades on the same 46 hours basis, a carpenter gets £3 18s. 7d. in Copenhagen, and £4 7s. 4d. in Dublin, while the bricklayer gets the same money in Copenhagen as in Dublin. The Dublin carpenter gets 11/3 more on the 46-hour basis than the carpenter in Copenhagen. Coming to the question of labour, labour gets £3 9s. per week in Copenhagen, and on the same basis in Dublin £3 1s. 4d. The labourer gets 7/8 per week more in Copenhagen than in Dublin, the carpenter 11/3 less, and the bricklayer the same money. What is the effect of this, taking the pre-war rates? Every bricklayer in Copenhagen to-day has 95.6 increase in wage over the pre-war rate. The bricklayer in Dublin to-day has 150 per cent. over the pre-war rate. The labourer in Copenhagen has to-day 118.2 per cent. increase over pre-war rate. The labourer in Dublin has 220 per cent. over the pre-war rate. So that on those figures I am afraid if we have to take Copenhagen as a basis for the increase, that we have an amount of increase out of all proportion in Dublin. It may be said to us what is the effect of wages with regard to costs in the building industry; in other words, in the cost of houses. I pointed out the other day that wages in the average building are 50 per cent. of the total amount. One can see at a glance the very large and important effect that wages would have on the cost of building, and consequently on the rents of houses which would be let for occupation. Now, it has been pointed out by Deputy Johnson that we employers seem to take the most inopportune moment and the most objectionable way of enforcing our demands. Might I remind him, however, though that may be true of other industries, and I think it is very questionable, it is not true of the building industry. This question of high prices has been killing the building industry for a very considerable time. A great many would be inclined to say that the masters should have taken very much more drastic steps than they have to keep wages down and to provide employment for the unemployed at the moment in our cities. As regards the building industry, it cannot be alleged that the masters had taken those drastic steps, and the Minister has suggested there should be more co-operation between employers on the one hand and the employed, or trade unions, as representing the employed, on the other hand. With that I am in entire agreement, but the difficulty is to get that proposal carried out. In April last, attempts were made to bring about a conference between labour on the one hand and the employers on the other in the building industry, with the object of bringing down wages. Those proposals fell through, because labour would not consent to meet the employers. What is the alternative? You speak about both sides being anxious to meet and confer. I agree with the Minister that should be the line, but it is very difficult to get it carried out in Ireland. In the building industry on the other side, to which I have drawn attention, wages were on a higher level than they ever reached in Ireland, and they are down now to a very much lower level than they stand in our cities. A tradesman is paid in London to-day what is looked upon as a super rate of 1/7½d. per hour. The same tradesman here is paid 1/10½ an hour. Wages have been reduced from a higher level to a very much lower level on the other side, through friendly negotiations between the two parties, and all through those reductions there has not been any disturbance in the industry.

I cannot understand how they can bring about these reductions on the other side and how we cannot act on similar lines. If we have not been able to do it in the past, I think, in view of what our country has passed through, we should endeavour to see if we cannot do it in the future, and as far as I am concerned, speaking as an employer, if Deputy Johnson will undertake to speak to those whom he represents in connection with the building industry, I will undertake to speak to those on the masters' side of that industry and see if a conference cannot be brought about with the object of reducing these wages, admitted by all to be too high, and to avoid, if at all possible, some of the conflicts between capital and labour of which we have had too many during the last six months.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: One felt two difficulties—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Is Deputy Figgis going to speak on this question?

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Yes.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: He spoke before.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I spoke on the Financial Statement only.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: No. The Deputy asserted his right to speak on the main question, and he spoke on it.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I do not recall doing so, if that is your recollection. I think I only spoke once; that was on the Financial Statement.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I endeavoured to make myself clear on this point before, I think, on three occasions. The Minister for Finance made a statement on the Motion now before us. Deputy Figgis moved the adjournment of the debate and made a speech which was a speech on the motion. It would have been impossible for anybody to have made a speech on the Financial Statement. One can only speak on a motion or an amendment, as Deputy Figgis is well aware. At that time I asked Deputy Figgis whether he would give way to the mover of an amendment. He desired to speak on the main question, and he has spoken upon it.

Mr. GOREY: I think I will have to begin where I intended to leave off. The Minister for Agriculture has made a very interesting speech, as he always does, but he has a knack of saying only what suits his point of view and of leaving out the facts and figures that might tell against him. We are used to that class of speech from the Minister, and he has let us have one this evening. He has given us the index figure of farmers' produce—40 per cent.; he gave us the index figures of taxation, what I will call the index figures of subsistence, broadly, labour and freights, and he has made a statement on the assumption that these things, entitled the channels of export and import, were at our disposal. Were they? Have they been for the last two or three years, or for the last three or four months? (One would have imagined that the Minister for Agriculture was dealing with a normal position and that there was no interference with the business of agriculture. Had we facilities for export and [Mr. Gorey.] import? Had we facilities to our markets to which we export 75 per cent. of our produce? What did the Government do to secure these facilities? It may be said that it was only the Government's business to keep order, but did they keep order? I pay them the tribute of saying they did their best to keep order as far as they could, but order was not sufficient. Order is not all that this nation requires. We wanted the channels and the arteries of the nation kept open, and they were shut. The Minister's figures are absolutely useless in the absence of economic liberty. We have not economic liberty, and the Minister's statement was made on the assumption that we had. The agricultural industry in England is depressed; the agricultural industry of the world is depressed, but how much more depressed was the agricultural industry of this country, the country that could not get away a ton of its produce or one of its beasts for three or four months. They are here now, almost within a few days of Christmas, when the value of any decent beast has been reduced and it has deteriorated to the extent of £4, £5, or £6, by at least one hundredweight, no matter what food they got and regardless altogether of any deterioration in the market in the meantime. I am not talking at all about the amount of food they consumed during that period.

The Minister tells us that it is an extremely difficult thing to interfere with trade, to interfere with the distribution of milk and the sale of the other commodities for the subsistence of our people in the City, but the thing they could and should have done was to establish the means of keeping open the arteries of the nation. At the last moment the farmers and those interested in the cattle trade opened an artery for one particular item, but it should not have been left to any section of the community, and a small section at that, to do so. It should have been done by the Government. I will come back to this later, because I took notes. I suppose I will weary the Dáil, but I will risk that. Deputy Good gave us a very clear statement about pre-war and present day figures with regard to wages. One thing

Deputy Good and Deputy Johnson, and others who have talked on this question, have omitted. They have been very clear about their figures in regard to wages, but they never said a word about the work done for the wages, either here, in Copenhagen, in England or anywhere else.

Mr. JOHNSON : It cannot be measured.

Mr. GOREY : I am sorry Deputy Good did not tell us the output in Dublin and the output in Copenhagen. I am sorry he did not tell us the number of bricks usually laid in the trade in Dublin and the amount laid in Copenhagen, in England, and America, and the return that a bricklayers' labourer gives for the wage he receives. I think I could, if I wanted, express the real opinion of the provinces, and the provinces know a little about this question and what Dublin means to the rest of Ireland. The opinion held of those engaged in industries and the building and other trades in Dublin is that the industrial community of Dublin is largely a community of parasites living on the backs of the rest of the nation. A good many people suggest that Dublin ought to be handed over to the Six-counties, or taken away out of Ireland altogether. When Deputy Johnson was addressing the Dáil he made statements that I either did not understand, or if I did, I take considerable exception to them. He made a statement of which I must take some note, that "peace was hampered by disagreements." He also expressed sorrow that employers are hampering prosperity. I think the exact words were that "the active agents in promoting disagreements are not the men but the employers." The people I represent are largely employers. I do not think he intended to exempt them from coming under the heading "employers," and when he says we were largely "active agents in promoting disagreements" he stated what to my mind was not a fact, to put it very mildly—I could use another word but I refrain from doing so. He also pleads for a recognition of facts, and I think he was very eloquent on that. Now I pleaded for a recognition of facts, and I want to come down to the ground with Deputy Johnson. I will not go into the question as it affects Dublin or industry generally, but I will go into it as it affects agriculture. What facts has Deputy Johnson produced to justify his assertion that the farming employers were the active agents in promoting disagreements and hampering prosperity? What, I think, Deputy Johnson did when he asked for a recognition of facts was to ignore them himself, and I think he showed considerable wisdom in that. Here are some facts in connection with this question. The agricultural wage in Norfolk, Lincolnshire, and Cambridge, and the great agricultural centres of England, was arrived at last year after a strike by a recognition of facts by both parties, and that wage was fixed at 25/- a week. I could bring in other side lines if I choose. I could bring in the fact that the Irish labourers in the rural areas live in a cottage and have an acre of ground at one shilling, and perhaps less, a week.

Mr. GOREY: I know of no case where a half-acre is still in existence. This gentleman must not live in the country. I will not go into these small details, as I would be only wearying the Dáil, but does anybody want to contrast the resources of Norfolk and Cambridge and Lincolnshire, and the other great English agricultural districts, with the resources of this country? Do you want to contrast the size of the farms there and their size here? In England you have huge areas owned by one man; here you have small scraps where a man has to make his living and pay his way. Has that contrast been made, and has the contrast been made between the cost of transit in this country and the English centres of agriculture? Has any contrast been made of the proximity to markets? These are facts, and why have they been omitted? No contrast has been made of the output of work here and there. Everybody has been silent about these facts. Another most important fact was that one man here, with the assistance of a few select Bolshevik followers like himself, has for months held up the whole trade of our ports. That is a fact that has not been mentioned.

I wish to be candid with Deputy Johnson and his party. I do not blame Deputy Johnson in any form for the acts of this gentleman and those with him, and I do not hold him responsible for any acts committed by this man or his followers. One fact I cannot shut my eyes to, and there is no use in anyone on the Labour benches or anywhere else shutting their eyes to it, is that this country cannot afford a wage almost 50 per cent. greater than other countries. Wages in Co. Dublin, I understand, today are 43/- as compared with 25/- in Norfolk. I wish to say that I do not believe that the farmer or agricultural workman is getting his fair share. I know something of the facts the Minister for Agriculture has stated. I have always contended that the reason the wages of agricultural workers in the provinces are so small is that both farmer and labourer have been robbed, and have allowed themselves to be robbed, by interests engaged outside agriculture. To justify these wages this country should be making 50 per cent. greater profits than they could be making in Cambridgeshire, in the Garden of England, and we should be getting 50 per cent. more output. Has Deputy Johnson dealt with any of these facts? They will obtrude themselves whether we like them or not, and there are other facts that have to be dealt with also, whether we like them or not. There is no use in going up with our politicians and living in the clouds. The great non-productive occupation of Ireland at the present day is politics. I listened to the Governor-General's Address, and to Deputy Johnson's speech on it, and both struck me as having a great similarity—a lot of talk and very little said. I think the two speeches contained more platitudes than have been contained in any other two speeches. We know Deputy Johnson has the great knack of speaking a lot and saying very little.

Mr. JOHNSON: It takes a long time to reply to it at any rate.

Mr. GOREY: He said one thing, that "if we get more wages we will consider giving more output." Very good of him to consider it even.

The farmers have been held up as the great enemies of labour. They are [Mr. Gorey.] nothing of the sort. It has been well established that the farmers are making no profits at present. The farmer who has to pay wages is running his business at a loss. The only man with a semblance of safety or stability is the man who is running his farm with very little labour, or with his own labour. That can be proved to any person who wishes to see the facts and figures. Nobody would dream of contrasting the income that is derived from farming at present with that of a primary teacher, or the average railwayman, or even the dockworker. Agriculturalists would be delighted at the present time if they had an income of 15/- per day. We would be solvent.

Mr. JOHNSON: We would be delighted if you had.

Mr. GOREY: We would not be threatened with bankruptcy. I might even mention the Civic Guard as our envy at the moment. That might be news to the Minister for Home Affairs.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Are you thinking of joining?

Mr. GOREY: I am a bit too old. There was a time that I would. Most of all we envy the nicely-placed Government official. He is in a very happy position with a nice income, very short hours, and very little to do. I will not say whether he does it well or ill. If he pleases his Department he will have to please me, for the moment. When we get hold of the Departments it will be a different matter. One thing that Deputy Johnson said I do not think I can subscribe to. He was talking about men selling their produce in the best market, and of a labourer selling his labour in the best market. I quite agree that we should have all those best markets which should be open to the labourer as well as to everybody else who has anything to sell. But I do not think it should be open to anybody to intimidate his fellow man by force or even by combination to force opinions upon him. This is a matter for the Minister for Home Affairs. I have often asked about this question of picketing. I have never been able to get an answer because something or other has intervened. I saw the Minister one day rising to give an answer, but he was stopped. I hope he will not be stopped now. We have no such thing as peaceful picketing practised. Picketing has been one of the greatest causes of disturbance in this country. If peaceful picketing is to be allowed, let it be peaceful picketing, and let us have it clearly defined. Let us know where peaceful picketing ends and intimidation begins. I have had some experience of strikes in the country, and I have been unable to distinguish this peaceful picketing. I do not think it exists at all. It is intimidation pure and simple, as it is carried out—gross intimidation. I do not think that Deputies on both Opposition Benches would attempt to contradict that. I do not think that any Government, especially a Government like ours, should allow any section of the community to paralyse the whole life of the nation. I think that the people of any nation having any regard for the things that are happening about them, would be foolish if they did not take to heart the lessons of those happenings. We have to compete in foreign markets with the people of other countries, and we had better recognise facts and keep our feet to the ground. It is a foolish gospel to preach that if we give more wages people will be able to buy more. It is foolish to preach that this country should isolate itself and take no notice of what is happening outside. We must take notice; we cannot be a world to ourselves. This is a country that is depending absolutely on outside trade. If we had not that outside trade we would not be here at all. We must take notice of what is happening in other countries and of how agricultural products are produced in other countries. We must take notice of wages, transit, output and other things that affect us. While we are living on this planet we must do as this planet does. If we do not, the only alternative is to go to a better one. If we want to retrieve our position, human effort must be as great in this country, if not greater, than in any other country. I agree with Deputy Johnson that there are too many people living on non-productive employments, or services, as he calls them. Politics is the most pernicious and the greatest non-productive occupation there is at present. I will not say it is a service—I think dis-service would be better. If we thought more about the things that matter and less about keeping our heads in the clouds, we would do better. We should not be flying kites like the politicians—ladies and gentlemen—who are making a very good living apparently by doing nothing except going round the country preaching and creating turmoil. Our farmers have to compete in a market where income tax is less than it is here—that is when we can get to that market. It is the duty of the Government to see that we do get there.

I want to draw the attention of the Ministry to this question. All the liabilities of the agricultural community are at present owing to the nation. We owe income tax, indirectly we owe local taxation, annuities, money in lieu of rent, arrears and other things. If the Government cannot give us free and open channels for our trade, what is the position? It is our duty to discharge all the liabilities that we owe to the State. Has the Government discharged its duty? Let us consider the duty of the State to the citizens. It is the duty of the State to secure personal and economic liberty. There is no use talking of personal liberty if we cannot have economic liberty. There is no use talking to a man about what he can do if he has an empty stomach. If the citizen must discharge his duties, the State must discharge its duty, and I suggest seriously to the Government, that if there are any more strikes, or any more attempts to get hold of the key industries of the country, such as the ports and the railways, it is their duty to set up a State organisation which could be done and manned within twenty-four hours.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Nationalisation?

Mr. GOREY: No, we will give our services voluntarily if the Government does its part. Commandeer the vessels and the railways and we will run them. The State has assumed the collection of these liabilities, and should therefore do its duty. The Minister for Agriculture has talked about all these things, but he omitted the great fact that as the arteries of the nation were not open to the farmer, who it was stated was getting forty per cent. more for his produce, he was getting nothing at all. There is no use telling that to people when eggs, fowl, cattle, butter and pigs were held up—even the poor man's pig was held up. I know fishermen engaged in the South of Ireland whose boxes of salmon were left on the quays at Waterford until the fish were rotten. These men had to cease fishing because a few dictators held up the life of the country, and because the Government did not do the right thing. That may amuse some Deputies, but the Government did not do the right thing.

There is another question that I wish to deal with—the question of the dole. I know nothing more degrading in our national life than the giving of the dole. The chronic type of man it has bred makes a most undesirable citizen. I prefer to see every man out of employment given constructive work on roads, reclamation, forestry, drainage—anything at all—and pay him the equivalent of the dole for useful work. It would prevent men from becoming demoralised and would make them realise that they were doing something for the money they got. If I were to repeat some of the stories of the methods adopted in the country to qualify for the dole, I would occupy the time of the Dáil for hours. There should be no such thing as a dole. It is a most degrading and demoralising thing, and in its place something should be done towards providing work of a constructive character, such as road making. If reconstructive work was provided it would help to reclaim a man who has become almost a degenerate. The man who was in receipt of the dole two or three years ago, it will be found, is still in receipt of it, and will continue to look for it. Machinery should be set up to deal with this question. We want work for money. Nobody with any spirit wants a continuance of the present system. How to deal with the chronic individual who will not work—and there is such a man—I do not know. It would take an Act of Parliament of forty or fifty sections to deal with that type. Railway rates have been mentioned and have been dealt with by Deputy Wilson. Contrast English and Irish railway rates, and what do you find? The trade of this country is hampered but not altogether by railway freights. I will give you a case in point. I bought five cattle recently in Tralee, which the Minister for Fisheries knows very well. I put the cattle on rail for Kilkenny, and when they reached Kilkenny I had to pay £6 8s. 7d. for the half-wagon. The actual result was that I owned four of the cattle, and that the railway company, or Deputy Davin's people owned the other animal.

Mr. HOGAN: Very cheap cattle!

Mr. GOREY: They were good Kerryes.

Mr. HOGAN: You had a good profit.

Mr. GOREY: Deputy Davin's people took one animal and I took the four others. That is what it amounted to.

The building trade has been referred to, but as Deputy Good dealt with it, and as I have already spoken on the subject, I will not pursue the matter. I want to talk about a question that concerns us in the country, and that is the maintenance of trunk roads. The trunk roads should be a State charge, and the sooner they are made one the better.

Twenty or thirty years ago the present system could be justified, but it cannot be justified now. The 6 o'clock. present system of locomotion and heavy motor traffic has revolutionised all that, and to do justice to the community all our trunk roads should be made by the State. I ask the Minister for Local Government to take a note of that. I do not know that he can act very well without the rest of the Cabinet, and in his absence I ask the rest of the Cabinet to take a note of it. I think, and all who think about the matter must agree with me, that our trunk roads should be made by the State and they ought to be made a State charge. Some Deputy referred to security for enterprise and security for brains. Is there any security for brains and enterprise in this country at the moment? Very little. I think that this country is remarkable at the moment for insecurity for brains and insecurity for enterprise. One thing I will say here, and I think I may say it to the people outside, and it is meant for the people outside, that the nation as a whole has got into the spending habit. I have got into that habit myself; I am sure we have all got into the same habit. The big monies of the war years have not yet gone out of our heads. During the war, when profits were high and money was plentiful, we got into the habit of thinking in terms of pounds where we used to think in terms of shillings before. We have not got out of that, either in public Departments or private life yet. Neither individually nor as a State have we got out of the habit. The sooner we go back and think in terms of "bobs" instead of pounds the better. I remember the time when a shilling represented a lot to me. Our people in their private capacity must get back into thinking in terms of shillings and pence, and get out of their heads thinking in pounds and in fivers. Things are changed, and I hope I will set an example myself. I do not intend to back any dogs this year.

There is one thing that struck me particularly in this debate on the Address, and that is, some references that were made to the cause of strikes. Deputy Johnson told us that the employers were active agents in promoting strikes, and Deputy Davin said it was the profiteers that caused them. Well, between the employers and the profiteers I will leave it to them; but it is very funny that there are two divergent views on the Labour benches on this matter. Now which is it? Which is it, the employers or the profiteers? Deputy Davin said Irish freights are high and that Irish freights are killing Irish trade. What is the cause of high freights? What is the cause that our Irish railway companies have those high freights? Is it not because their running expenses must be balanced by their freight charges?

Mr. JOHNSON: No.

Mr. GOREY: My answer is that their system is run at too high a cost. I do not care what that is due to, whether it is the Directors or whether it is to having too many men. See the different balance sheets of these railway companies. Do they show profits? Do they show a good business concern? Their balance sheets are there to peruse. There are too many high overhead charges on these railways. There is too much of the eight hours' day system in Ireland. Ireland cannot afford an eight hours' system on its railways. Again, we want to recognise facts and come to the bottom of things. I can understand an eight hours' system in England. I can understand it in big industrial centres here. But an eight hours' system applied down the provinces and down on rural lines is ridiculous. I do not think it could obtain in any country but this, a country that for the past few years has been remarkable for its madness. Deputy Davin is not right when he tells you it is the high freights charged by the railways. He has not put his finger on the evil. Our railway freights are caused by the eight hour system and the cost of labour. He did not tell us the cause of the high freights, but the sooner Deputies recognise that cause the better. If those railway companies cannot run their business on economic lines they must charge higher freights, they must put on higher passenger rates. This thing must be settled. Freights must come down and overhead charges must come down, and if they do not come down the railways cannot run. Now I think I occupied the Dáil long enough, and I want to finish, but when the Minister for Agriculture is making a speech again he ought to be mindful of all these facts and not be giving us some of the facts. When he talks about our obligations in the future and about what we owe to the State, and we do owe the State obligations, I hope he will be mindful of what the State owes us, and that we will have free transit, free markets, and free methods to get there.

Mr. THOMAS NAGLE: Deputy Gorey asked a request of Deputy Johnson. He wanted to know did Deputy Johnson include the farmers when he said the employers had done something to hamper the arrangements made. I do not know whether Deputy Johnson included the farmers or not, but I would be willing to include them in a statement of that kind. I know quite well that the action of the farmers of Ireland in the past has certainly hampered agreements, and certainly prevented agreements being arrived at.

Mr. GOREY: May I ask if they broke any bowls of farmers' separators?

Mr. NAGLE: We will deal with that later. Deputy Gorey now talks about the necessity for economising, and incidentally mentions that during the war years profits were high and money plentiful. Now in speaking of the fact that profits were high and money plentiful, the Chairman of the Farmers' Party makes an admission. I know of very many cases in the south of Ireland where there were some farmers who had large profits, and plenty of money, and who refused, until they were compelled by the British Courts and the R.I.C., to pay the then legal minimum wage that had been established by the Wages Board. I have one or two instances in my mind at the present time of which Deputy Gorey might know more about than I do. I remember attending a meeting of the farmers attached to the Mullinavat Branch of the Farmers' Union, and they admitted that they had not paid their labourers the minimum wage. They claimed that they did not intend to pay them, and that they would do their very best to avoid having to pay the legal minimum wage. Now that one instance alone is one of many, and it proves conclusively to me that the farmers as employers did something by their action then to prevent agreements being arrived at in the future. Because when men are forced to compel others to deal fairly with them, they are very chary of entering into agreements, knowing that the others would avail of every opportunity to break them.

Mr. GOREY: Did they break the agreement at Mullinavat?

Mr. NAGLE: They did, of course.

Mr. GOREY: They never did, and they never will.

Mr. NAGLE: The Deputy talks about output, and incidentally mentioned the eight hours day. If the farm labourers in the past did not give a good output, God alone knows who did, because, until comparatively recent years, farm labourers used to work from daylight until dark, and very often they worked during the dark hours. The wages they were paid in return for the long hours they worked were very low indeed. The labourer then would not require to imbibe very much of Guinness' stout, even at the old price, in order to get rid of all he would have to spend at the end of the week. Deputy Baxter talked about the closing of the ports, and he wanted to know who is to blame. He did not suggest that anyone was to blame. Deputy Gorey suggested that the workers were to blame because they went on strike. For the benefit of Deputy Baxter and Deputy Gorey, and others who think like them, let me explain the position of the workers then, and on all occasions, when they go on strike.

The workers who work for wages have a certain commodity to sell, just the same as the farmers have certain commodities to dispose of at fairs or markets. The workers have their labour powers and their abilities as workers. If they cannot get the price they demand at a particular time, and they refuse to sell, they refuse to sell by going on strike. It was suggested by farmer Deputies that the Government should compel them to work.

Mr. GOREY: Nothing of the sort.

Mr. NAGLE: If that were done by the Government, it would be equally sensible to ask the Government to compel farmers to sell cattle at whatever prices would be prevailing, rather than that they should bring back the cattle to their homes because they might be dissatisfied with the prices offered.

Mr. GOREY: On a point of personal explanation, I never suggested that the Government should take sides for or against any party. I suggested they should keep the ports and traffic channels open and let these people fight it out amongst themselves.

Mr. NAGLE: It amounts to practically the same thing. I was very interested in the statement of the Minister for Agriculture regarding the reasons for the bad conditions of the farming community at present. He pointed out certain things that can be done to improve those conditions. About two years ago, and for some time before that, I remember attending very many meetings of branches of the Farmers' Union in the South of Ireland, and at those meetings complaints were made about the small prices farmers were getting for potatoes, milk, oats, cattle and other things they had to sell. I suggested on a number of occasions that if they brought their commodities, which they sold for consumption in Ireland, and sold them direct to the consumers, they would be able to sell them at a smaller price than the consumers were then paying, and at the same time they would get a larger price than they themselves were getting. Then they would be able to pay the agricultural labourer more decently and have a larger profit themselves.

In practically all instances where we discussed those things, the farmers agreed it was a way out of some of their difficulties, but in no case, however, did they take practical steps to get out of those difficulties. One individual had a rather peculiar objection; he wanted to know if they adopted a system of co-operatively marketing the goods they produced, what would become of the poor shop-keepers. I told him I did not care what would become of the poor shopkeepers. I think the same attitude should be adopted here in Dublin. I quite agree with the suggestion of the Minister for Agriculture that milk should be sold direct in Dublin. I can understand that the farmers would get more than they get at present, and at the same time the people in the city would get a better quality of milk at a considerably reduced price. I go further and I say that all the fruit and vegetables and other things that are produced on the farms and sold to citizens in Dublin, Cork and elsewhere should be sold direct from a large store by a co-operative organisation of the farmers and farm labourers who produce those things.

Deputy Good mentioned something about wages in the building trades, and he compared Deputy Johnson's figures as between Copenhagen and Dublin. He admitted the wages in Copenhagen were about equal to the Dublin wages, and he pointed out that in Dublin there was a greater increase on the pre-war wage than there had been in Copenhagen. He argued from that that the wages in the Dublin building trades should now come down. Deputy Gorey suggested that the Minister for Agriculture presented the facts he had in a way to suit his own case. We all do things like that. Deputy Good argues that because the Dublin workers in the building trades have had a greater percentage of increase in wages than the workers in Copenhagen, they are now due for a reduction. I argue they are due for a continuance of their present wages, longer even than the Copenhagen workers, in order to make up for the comparatively smaller wages they had in pre-war days. Deputy Good agreed there should be more co-operation between employers and employees, and he stated that in April a request was made by the Dublin Master Builders' Association to get a conference with representatives of the workers in the building trades with the object of bringing down wages, and that the workers refused to go into the conference. The Deputy appears to think that that was wrong on their part. I think they were right and perfectly justified.

If the organised workers suggested to a group of employers that they wanted a conference to consider the question of increasing wages, if the employers thought they were in a good position to ignore the request, they would not have a conference. If Deputy Good and the members of the Master Builders' Association had asked a Conference to consider the whole question of the building trades and its relationship, say, to the production of houses for Dublin citizens; if they stated they were willing to allow some people, accountants or technical experts, to consult with representatives of both parties, and if they would be willing to consider the whole question regarding output and wages and profits as related to the present housing shortage, and to make some sacrifices, if necessary, on condition that the others would make sacrifices in the interests of housing the people of Dublin, then I have not the slightest doubt the men in the building trades would enter the conference. I have no doubt those men would have little respect for themselves if they openly walked into a conference to have their wages reduced without they or some one else getting some return. We have not heard very much about the price of building materials now as compared with 1914, although we heard a lot about wages in the building trades.

We do not know exactly what profits are made in the distribution of building materials. Some of the building contractors in Dublin and elsewhere are also financially interested in some of the firms that import building materials, and I can quite conceive, if I was in the same position, that I would not like the profits of these firms to be reduced, even though by reducing their profits I might make more as a building contractor. No doubt it would be the same to me so long as I made it in the aggregate. The Minister for Agriculture suggested that we should discuss all the points—not merely the points in which we are directly interested, but all the points, from the employers' side as well as our own. I think if the employers in the building trade want a reduction in wages they should be willing to put all their cards on the table and to submit their books to examination, together with a full account of their profits. Another Deputy talked about the wages paid to the building trade in Dublin and in Ireland and England, and in the different towns in Ireland, and he suggested that the building contractors in Dublin could not compete with building contractors elsewhere, simply because the building contractors elsewhere are paying a lesser rate of wages. I understand—of course, I am open to correction if I am wrong—that in the early part of 1921 Deputy Good carried out a fair-sized contract in Cork City, and that on that occasion the wages paid in Cork City were less than the wages paid to similar tradesmen in Dublin City. I used this as an argument on one occasion against a reduction of the building trade wages in Cork City. I pointed out it was not so much a difference in wages that existed as a difference in methods, and that Dublin firms had to pay more because of different methods, and therefore that you could not blame the wages in Dublin being higher than in Cork.

The Minister for Agriculture talked about the wages of distributive trades, and he said that most of the distributive workers and employers in the country were really a burden upon the agricultural community. Now, I have some figures here regarding the costs in the distributive trade, and in the first instance I would like to mention that, for every 100/- spent by the wage-earning family on household requirements, about 60/- is expended on goods not produced in Ireland. An average of about 5/6 is paid for rent, leaving about 34/6 as the amount expended on goods produced in Ireland. Of 60/- expended on goods imported, the wages paid for their transport and preparation (that is, bread from imported flour) and distribution, will account for not more than 20/-—probably considerably less. Of the 34/6 spent on goods produced in Ireland, almost wholly for food-stuffs—that is, beef, mutton, bacon, eggs, milk, potatoes—the wages paid to employed labour in their production and distribution will absorb not more than 10/-. The maximum amount spent as wages in Ireland for their production and distribution amounts to about 30/-. If the men employed in this work were to consent to work for nothing, if there had been discovered a mechanical automatic man who could live without food, and if the whole of the saving were handed over to the consumer in lower prices—an assumption not warranted by precedent—the goods which the working man's household now purchases at a cost of 100/- would be reduced only to 70/-. Suppose that it were possible to enforce a general all-round reduction in wages of 20 per cent., what would be the effect upon the working man's family budget? Hitherto the man who has been paid £4 a week in wages and has spent that £4 in the manner of the average family expenditure, as shown in the Cost of Living Report, 20 per cent. reduction would find his wages reduced by 16/-, that is, to 64/-.

ing in wages were handed on to the consumer by the lowering of the retail prices, 20 per cent. taken off wages would secure a reduction in prices of only six per cent.; that is one-fifth of thirty per cent. In other words, the goods which hitherto cost eighty shillings could then be obtained for 75/3. Unfortunately the workman who could hitherto purchase 80/- worth of goods with 80/- wages, would then have only 64/- in wages to purchase the 75/3 worth of goods. A reduction of money wages of 16/- leaves him worse off in real wages by 11/3. In other words, the purchasing power of his wages has fallen 14 per cent.

Now, that proves, to me, at any rate, that a reduction in wages will not give a reduction in proportion to the cost of living, and most of the employers who have been talking about a need for a reduction of wages recently are claiming that they must be reduced in order to reduce the cost of living. Now, the workers have resisted these wage cuts as much as they possibly can, and they intend to continue resisting these wage cuts. They do not claim they are not responsible for the conduct of the employers in this country. So long as the employers were able to carry on their industry and make their profits, they did so without consulting the workers, and were always willing to do so, and the workers claim now, when the employers find themselves in a tight place, they want the workers to come along and help them out, but the workers are not justified in making any sacrifices in helping them out. But I say this for the workers; if the whole question were thoroughly gone into, and it was decided by agreement between the propertied classes and the employers on the one side, and the non-propertied classes and the workers on the other, that a return should be given to the people of this country in proportion to the services they render in producing the necessities and the luxuries of life for the country, then I say that the working classes and those who are responsible for the organised working classes in this country, would be quite willing to abide by any agreement arrived at on those lines, but they are certainly not going to make any sacrifices in having a reduction of wages, so long as they see that that reduction is to go to swell the profits of any set of employers in this country. But, on the other hand, if it is to be a question of co-operation between all parties, with equal sacrifices and equal rewards in proportion for services rendered, then I say that the workers are willing to do anything that it is possible to do to bring about stable conditions in this country.

Mr. CONLAN: I agree with Deputy Gorey, when he says that the speech of the Minister for Agriculture was an interesting one. I think, however, it might have been more sympathetic. Another thing that struck me in the course of the debate was this: the remarkable exodus of the Government's supporters from the Government benches during the time when this most important subject was being debated, the most important subject which has come before the Dáil since it opened in the present Session. I understand that many of these supporters of the Government belong to the despised class known as the farmers, and whether they are trying to conceal their identity, or whether the cold chain of silence has been flung over them, and that they are, perforce, bound to remain inarticulate whilst a question so closely affecting their own interests is being debated, I do not know. Passing from that, I propose to give some figures in reply to those which we have had from the Minister of Agriculture. He stated that prices for agricultural produce, as compared with pre-war prices, were 40 per cent. in excess. I think that that was altogether an exaggerated estimate. I find from transactions, which I can vouch for as being made personally by myself, that in pre-war days the price of beef per cwt., live weight, was 35s.; at present the price for very prime qualities is 42s., and for secondary sorts the prices range from 35s. to 38s. Barley, pre-war, was 16s. per barrel, and at present the selling price is from 18s. to 20s.; oats, pre-war, realised about 12s. per barrel, and about the same price is being paid to-day; wool was 1s. per lb. before the war, and it is much the same price at present. At present milk is quoted at 10d. per gallon.

Mr. HOGAN: Could you give us the price for mutton?

Mr. CONLAN: I do not think I could give the exact figure for mutton, because it is not sold by weight, but the sheep are sold at so much a head, and it is difficult, without having access to market returns, to show what the price of mutton is. Probably mutton is something dearer than beef, in proportion.

Mr. HOGAN: Beef is 45 per cent. higher, and mutton 70 per cent.

Mr. CONLAN: I do not quite agree with the Minister in that figure.

Mr. GOREY: The Minister is a mutton farmer, and he knows.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Does Deputy Gorey suggest that the Minister is minding his own muttons?

Mr. CONLAN: There is practically no change in the price of milk as compared with pre-war. A neighbour of mine is delivering fresh milk, free on rail, at 9d. per gallon to the Lucan Dairy Company. What the Lucan Dairy people charge for the milk, when they retail it, I do not know; but probably, as the Minister for Agriculture said, they charge about 2s. 6d. per gallon. Horses have gone down in price about 100 per cent., and probably more. I heard of a farmer at a fair a couple of days ago who was offered only £1 for a fairly decent animal.

With regard to the steps suggested to be taken by the Minister for Agriculture to meet the situation with a view to reducing the cost of living, these steps might be effected near large centres such as Dublin, where the populace, and the poor people especially, are suffering so much from the extortion of prices at the instance of vendors and middlemen. But, taking the situation in the country at large, I do not think the steps proposed to be taken by the Minister would provide an effective remedy. I think the Minister will have to take more heroic measures. We see at present that the great Conservative Party in England is going to the polls on the question of Protection, and that it is offering the farmers in England eleven million pounds, or at the rate of £1 per acre for every acre of agricultural land. We have seen that the Government in Northern Ireland, in the Six Counties, is allocating £128,000 in aid of agricultural rates. Unfortunately, we have got nothing like that from our own Government, and, as everybody knows, the local rates especially are most oppressive. The Minister has put down the increase at 150 per cent. in the amount of rates. So far as I am aware, the figure is very much higher in certain counties. Certainly, in the County Kildare the rate is 9/6 in the pound, and the local rates fixed by the County Council have jumped up from £32,000 to £72,000 per annum.

With very large claims for income tax coming after that, it is easy to understand that in a season like the present, when the farmer has so much difficulty in disposing of his produce, even at the present depressed prices, how hard it is for him to meet his engagements, much harder than it has been for him at any period within the last 20 years. Men who are lucky enough to have some capital or money laid by have been living on their capital, but the unfortunate people who have no capital have gone back again to the old position they were in years ago of pulling the devil by the tail. I hope that the Government will consider this question carefully. It has been asserted, and admitted on all hands, that the industry of agriculture is practically the sole one that we have, and if that goes down the rest of the country goes down as a matter of course.

Sir JAMES CRAIG: This debate has dragged along to a very inordinate extent, but I do not propose to occupy the time of the Dáil very long. I desire, at the outset, to congratulate the Minister for Agriculture on the clear way in which he approached this subject. On the question of the cost of living, I think he went further than was indicated in the Governor-General's speech, because I gathered from that speech that the Government only meant to hold the ring, but the Minister in his speech to-day went further and suggested that the Government may have to step in. More than a year ago I gave some figures which corresponded almost exactly with the figures given by the Minister to-day. I stated at the time something about the prices of different articles. I also said that a Commission on Prices would not be very effective and would not do much good, and that turned out to be the case. A Commission on Prices was set up, and I can say that I spent more time in connection with the work of that Commission than I have ever spent on anything in my life. There was very little result from that Commission. I had hoped that, perhaps, the Commission on Prices Report would be discussed here at some time, so that some of us might be able to give an expression of opinion with regard to matters that cropped up during the sittings of the Commission. I regret to say that prices are practically the same to-day as what they were at the time that we discussed the appointment of that Commission.

There is one point that I want to lay particular stress on. It was alluded to by the Minister for Agriculture, and also by the Deputy here on my left. I refer to the price charged for milk. There is no doubt whatever that milk can be delivered at Amiens Street or Westland Row station at 1/- per gallon. That does not say that the poor farmer who produces it gets a 1/-; he only gets 9d. or 10d. per gallon after paying the cost of sending it on rail to Dublin. The point is that the milk is retailed in Dublin at 2/8 per gallon, or 8d. per quart in the majority of cases when distributed through the city. It was stated at the Commission on Prices that the cost of distribution was 2d. per quart. After the distributor of the milk pays 3d. per quart for the milk, and puts 2d. per quart on for its distribution, he still has more of a profit than the farmer who produces the milk. I hope, in particular, that this question of the milk supply will be taken up by the Government, because the Commission on Prices recommended that a second Commission should be appointed with power to compel people to give evidence, which we on the original Commission were not able to get. I would like just for a moment to refer to the question of porter and stout. It is an extraordinary thing to find that a half-pint of stout can be supplied in a glass for 6d., and that when that half-pint is put into a bottle and poured out into a glass, a person has to pay 8d. for it. Of course, in the meantime a cork has been put into the bottle, and I suppose the 2d. extra is charged for the price of the cork and the putting in of it. There were other figures put before us which I would be very pleased to put before the Dáil, but I do not desire to take up the time of Deputies with them at the moment.

I must say that the evidence given to us by the publicans was disgraceful, and the greater part of it was quite untrue. As regards the question of cabbage, I was particularly interested in that from the point of view of food, because it is most essential to the life of children that they should be supplied with fresh vegetables. Cabbage bought at ½d. a piece in the market, cost the consumer 2d. in the majority of cases. At all events we had evidence, and you could get evidence if you go to the market, that 60 dozen of cabbage for which the producer is paid from 15/- to 17/6., the consumer will pay from £8 to £10.

As regards coal, evidence was given of the extraordinarily extravagant price which the poor people have to pay for coal by buying it by the stone or sack. We could get no help from the coal merchants on that matter. Deputy Good has stated that these are matters which should be inquired into, but the people who represent the commercial interests would give us no help in the matter. One gentleman came and the only thing he stated was that there was no ring to keep up the present prices, but I do not think that anybody believed him. He would give no information as to the price of coal at the pit mouth or any information that would help us to find out whether there was an excessive profit on coal when it was distributed. I, therefore, have listened with great interest to the speech of the Minister for Agriculture and I hope the Government will not allow the matter to slide without further inquiry.

Mr. M. DOYLE: I was pleased to hear the expressions of the Minister for Agriculture regarding agriculture and the curtailing of profiteering which is going on at present. To my mind a lot of party bickering has been introduced into the debate within the last hour or two, and I do not think that this bickering will be conducive to carrying out the measures laid down by the Minister to try and combat profiteering and reduce the prices in the fashion he contemplated. I hope that this scheme of mutual consent and good will on all sides will be a success, but I have the gravest reasons to doubt it. The profiteers will not be as easily got into this scheme of mutual consent as the Minister believes. I do not see anything for it except the Government stepping in, as the Minister said they would do, if mutual goodwill proved a failure. The key industry of the country must not be let down, as the Minister said, not even if the Government should step in. It will be incumbent on the Government to step in because this mutual goodwill to which the Minister has alluded will not, in my opinion, ever materialise. We all know the royal time that everyone has had out of the products of farming for the past two or three years, except the farmer himself. Distribution of prices is one of the real grievances and causes of depression in agriculture at present. The farmer and agricultural labourer are not getting what will pay their way, or even what will pay their debts, out of the industry—they who are putting their sweat and toil into the production of these articles. Take the brewer—what is he reaping from the industry? He is reaping such profits that he does not know how to dispose of them. Take the man who follows him—the retailer in Dublin or the provinces. These people can afford to pay from £18,000 to £20,000 for retail houses. They are not doing that from a philanthropic point of view, but rather from a profitable point of view so as to make still more money out of the products of the farmer and the agricultural labourer. If we had these prices distributed fairly, as they should be, between the producer, the man who manufactured the product and who puts it on the market, and the other people we would be fairly well off and in a much better position than we are. I fear the Government must step in, as this mutual goodwill business will not do anything for us. The sooner the Minister for Agriculture sees his way to put into operation clause 14 of the Governor-General's speech and brings in legislation the better. This is the only ameliorative clause in the whole speech as far as agriculture is concerned. I will be pleased to see the Government and the Minister do that. If the mutual goodwill business is not a success they should bring this measure in at once.

Mr. CORISH: As this debate has been long drawn out, my contribution to it will be small. The Governor-General's speech deals with the question of unemployment. I think the Deputies who were members of the last Dáil will be familiar with the phrase of ex-Deputy Whelehan in introducing the late unemployment measure. I think it is agreed that the Unemployment Act was passed on the assumption that trade would have improved in the month of August. So far as I can see, the functions and implications of this Act prevent genuine workers from receiving unemployment benefit. I am not here to advocate the dole system or that any but bona fide workers should receive unemployment benefit. This is how the workers are affected by the present Act. A man would have to have twelve weeks employment during the last benefit year to entitle him to draw benefit. In the case of Wexford town I can tell how it operates. The Unemployment Act came into operation in 1912. From that period to 1920 the men in Pierce's foundry, which employs anything from 600 to 800, were working constantly, and had stamped cards for all that period. Now, because trade has been bad for the last two years, the majority of these men who are walking the streets, but who are genuine workers, are disqualified from drawing benefit under this Act. I would like to know from the Minister for Industry and Commerce if he intends to amend that Act so that genuine workers who cannot procure work would receive some relief.

In England and Northern Ireland at the moment, I understand, the dole system, as it was introduced in 1918, is still in existence. As a matter of fact, the Ministry of Labour in the Northern Government has done away with the gap system altogether, so the men in Northern Ireland draw continuous benefit. I know economy must be practised in the Free State, but everyone will admit that a genuine worker in time of stress should receive some consideration from the State, especially when he has contributed for at least 8 years. In the same paragraph in the Governor-General's speech the question of housing is mentioned, and I have listened with great attention to the speeches of Deputies Gorey and Good on this important question. I believe it is necessary that there should be a general understanding between the workers and the contractors of the Free State in order to solve this important matter in the building trade. I hope in the near future that the Government will endeavour to bring the different interests together, with a view to going into the whole thing, and approaching the question as an economic problem. This is the only way to get a great number of houses built in this country. I would ask for a statement from the Minister for Industry and Commerce, or a representative, as to what the intentions of the Government are regarding the genuine worker, and also the housing question.

SEÁN MAC GIBÉIN: O's rud é gur ab é seo an céad am a táim chun labhairt annso, tá súil agam ná thuitfidh ar chluasa bodhra. Tá cúpla focal lé rádh agam ar an dtalamh agus ar na boithre iarainn agus ní comeádfhad i bhfad sibh.

Such Deputies as have just preceded me have truly said that this debate has dragged its weary length along. I am not going to carry on that debate unduly. The many instructive speeches on the Governor-General's Address convey to me, at least, that all sections of the community must be willing to bear their fair share of the inevitable sacrifice if the large task of the desideratum of the economic equilibrium is to be restored and established. A Deputy from the Farmers' benches a few moments ago castigated unworthily and unnecessarily those who represent Cumann na nGaedheal and particularly farmer Deputies who sit in the Government benches. There are in Cumann na nGaedheal many farmers, and I happen to be one of these. While I subscribe to the National question as being of more importance than any class interest, I yield to no one in the interests of the community to which I belong.

I had intended referring at length and going into detail on many matters arising out of the Governor-General's Address, but it is unnecessary for me now, particularly after the summary of the Minister for Agriculture, and the speeches of the farmer Deputies. However, I wish briefly to refer to a few matters. His Excellency foreshadows in his speech to the Dáil legislative proposals dealing with agriculture, and with the re-organisation of our railway systems. I couple agriculture and railways because they are, or should be, closely linked. His Excellency invites our attention to the establishment of a national brand for butter of high standard, to the question of grading of eggs, and the improvement of breeds of cattle. These are all matters of interest. But, comparatively, they are, at the moment, trifles. I ask all parties in the Dáil to consider the present position of the farmer—I mean the working farmer—he who represents the stability, security, thrift, industry, and progress in the community. He is carrying on through the existing depression by drawing on little savings of the past, and notwithstanding the statement of the Minister for Agriculture I say the small farmer is in a more pitiful plight than the large one. He has nothing in the way of capital to draw on. His reserves are eaten up and are non-existent, and he is falling into the hands of the gombeen man. For him the rainy day, so to speak, has come, and as far as one can see it is likely to be, like the proverbial Scotch mist, of prolonged duration. Whatever may be said of farming, good, bad and indifferent, agriculture is our chief industry. For the past two years it has not been a paying proposition; and with the development of Canadian and other resources, it may not become a paying proposition for many a day. How are we to assist? Associated with this question of agriculture is the question of emigration. Well, there are hundreds of thousands of young persons in the country awaiting the opportunity of emigrating. Agriculture, with its present gloomy outlook, has no attraction for them. Gentlemen, is it not possible to make it more attractive, and at once? To this end, could not the Government begin at once by cheapening transport? We have one of the costliest systems of transport in the world. Our railways are controlled privately; they are out of the track of trade, and our principal port would appear to be controlled by reactionaries. This question of transit affects farming interests vitally.

A gentleman giving evidence before the Railway Commission in 1907 stated:

“Irish farmers, traders, 7 o'clock. and manufacturers are not only afflicted with rates that are exceptionally high, but they are also made to suffer from an iniquitous system of preferential rates, and the spectacle is daily presented of meat from America, dairy produce from Denmark, fruit and vegetables from France, and manufactured goods from Belgium and Germany, being dumped down in Irish markets at half, and sometimes less than a third of the freight charges our own manufacturers have to pay. It was, I believe, stated before the Railway Commission that goods are frequently shipped from the Eastern Seaboard to English and Scottish ports, and thence back to Ireland, for transit to inland towns, in order to get the benefit of through English rates.”

Does that condition of things continue to exist? Even if it continues in a modified form, how are Irish farmers to be compensated for this unfair trading disability? While indulging in no spirit of fault-finding with the Governor-General's Speech, I suggest that this question of transit, with its preferential through rates adverse to Irish farming interests, should be investigated thoroughly and at once, by men of broad vision, whose minds have not been narrowed by the practices associated with red-tape or official routine.

[Seán Mac Giobúin.]

Such vision would approach vested interests in the proper spirit and suggest measures for raising agricultural interests from the slough of despond in which they at present unfortunately lie.

Another matter arising by implication out of the Governor-General's Address is that of profiteering—a matter of supreme importance to the producer, the consumer and the community at large. The subject of profiteering is not so simple as it appears at first sight. To attack it is to win applause, but to attack it ignorantly is to prolong its existence. It touches economics and morality. It makes alike for wealth and poverty. There are profiteers and profiteers. There is the man who simply battens on the public; and the man who sells at what his own conscience tells him is a reasonable profit. It is clear, then that this subject of profiteering demands very straight thinking. In my opinion the first essential step is to denounce it definitely. It would take ten hours, not ten minutes, to deal adequately with so comprehensive a subject as profiteering. I must confine my remarks to a few broad aspects. There is a well-known motor car on the market. It is called the Dodge. People journeying up and down the country have noticed artful greengrocers flashing by in these luxurious conveyances. The green producer has, however, to be content with the ass and cart. Slightly altered, the old rhyme would go near to mirroring the position:—

“ There was an old prophecy found in a Dodge,
That Ireland would be ruled by an Ass and a Dodge,
Now, that old prophecy has come to pass,
The Profiteer is the Dodge, the Producer the Ass.”

I shall omit all reference to inflation and deflation of currency as they affect prices. I will not deal with the intricacies of credit. I shall content myself by stating that a few weeks ago I saw butter sold by farmers at 8d. and 10d. a lb. which was subsequently sold in Dublin shops at 2/- a lb. Eggs sold locally at 8d. a dozen were retailed at 2/1. Cabbages sold by the producer at 1d. per head were sold to slum dwellers at 5d. and 6d. a head. In one case that I know of personally a man sold cabbage to a shopkeeper, leaving him to fix the price, which he did after consultation with a neighbouring greengrocer, at 1d. a head, and it came to pass that the man who produced that had to purchase a head, and he bought back one of his own for 3d. I am aware of the existence of a multiplication of profits, commodities changing hands four or five times. I know something of the relatively high cost of rail transport. Incidentally, I might remark that the Postmaster-General might do something in the matter of cheapening food through a development of the Parcels Post system. But transport has nothing to do with an example of profiteering which I shall cite for you. A friend of mine smokes a brand of tobacco called “ Warlock.” The name may be a little suggestive, but the brand is good—suitable to the climate and to his palate. He has purchased this tobacco in different shops in the City of Dublin. It is 1/1 an ounce in Dame Street, 1/2 in Grafton Street, 10½d. in Drumecondra and 1/4 in Clontarf. Perhaps the sensitive nostrils of Clontarf may have decided to expunge from their respectable atmosphere; or maybe the historians of that classic locality—perhaps Deputy Figgis could give us some information about this—might have discovered that “ Warlock ” was used as poison-gas by the soldiers of Brian Boru; but whatever the reason, the Profiteering is ever the reason, the profiteering is from “ Warlock ” to Bar-stock. We have heard a good deal about Guinness's stout. A number of instructive figures were given in connection with beer and stout, as well as other matters, by Deputy Davin last evening, in his very interesting contribution to this debate. Deputy Davin, in his references to this specific matter, took in the barley-grower. I can congratulate him, and I say that his ideas, as well as his experience, with regard to his constituents and mine, coincide. A bottle of Guinness's stout can be purchased in any town in the South of Ireland for 6d. In Dublin it costs 8d. Why? Grocers' assistants are paid at a uniform trade union rate of wages. I have it on good authority that a trader in the City of Dublin paid £10,000 for a licensed house, and he cleared it in two years. He pays £45 in Income Tax, and I suppose he has a grievance that he should have to pay so much. I have not really touched the fringe of the subject. My intention was to throw out a few suggestive remarks. I think it would be a good thing to demonstrate to the public what are reasonable prices. And in this connection, I would suggest the formation of a Central Costings Committee—independent of Government—a Committee which would publish weekly in the public Press reasonable prices for the necessary commodities. As the work of such Committee developed, gross profiteering would, in my opinion, inevitably decline. This is a matter which might be taken up rather seriously. It was a great success in England, I believe. Perhaps Deputy Johnson would see the import of that suggestion.

The economic fabric threatens to topple over. The country may find itself amongst the ruins. The apparent apathy of the people may be short-lived; and we must not forget that we are really the servants of the people, not of the few who happen to be socially or financially or politically important at the moment, but of the whole people. I have no patience with men who rely on formula, or who seek to take advantage of the prevailing apathy. There are burning questions awaiting solution, and if we are to paint the optimistic picture of the Governor-General's imagination we must tackle them honestly, efficiently and above all, justly and immediately.

Mrs. COLLINS O'DRISCOLL: I am quite sure that none of the Deputies wish this debate to develop into something like Tennyson's brook, which is going on for ever. Therefore my contribution to the debate is to move that the Motion before the Dáil be now put.

Professor MAGENNIS: On a point of order, was not the Motion moved by a Minister, and can a private Deputy move that the question be now put?

Mr. C. M. BYRNE: It was not moved by a Minister.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: No, it was not moved by a Minister.

Mr. P. McKENNA: I will not delay the Dáil very long, but there are a few points I wish to draw attention to, one of which is the delay in the payment of claims for compensation for malicious injuries. This is causing great inconvenience. Pre-Truce cases with decrees for the destruction of property, or perhaps for the loss of a bread-winner, are still unsettled, and I have had a letter to-day from a constituent of mine who is a member of the Dáil and whose father's place was burned down. A number of cases around him have been settled, and I would not like that any victimisation would take place in cases like that. I would like the Minister for Home Affairs to see into such cases. I am one of those who, as far as the future of the country is concerned, am a pessimist until we have political and industrial peace restored, and I was surprised and disappointed at the firm attitude taken by the Minister for Home Affairs.

I have never been a believer in the rule of the gun, and consequently I can appeal to both sides in this dispute more confidently. I would appeal to the old Republican Party to look at the stricken and paralysed condition of the country, and I appeal to the responsible leaders to give an assurance to the people that so far as they are concerned the rifle and the revolver are for ever banished from Irish life. I would further appeal to the Government to release all the men who will not be tried for crime. Most undoubtedly the 44 men elected to the Dáil should be allowed to meet and discuss the new situation that has arisen as a result of the elections. I think that is only fair, but I do not like to see members of the Government adopting a very aggressive and stern attitude as they are in this particular case. We have had experience of the history of our country. We are a peculiar people; we are led but will not be driven. We saw that in the past. It was tried by Cromwell and Greenwood, and are we going to adopt

[Mr. P. McKenna.] these tactics here again? It is all very fine talking about burnings and that sort of thing, but we must have some commonsense, and recognise the fact that young boys were sworn by their leaders, both political and religious, as Republicans. We are told that these people now up in arms against the State are post-Truce men. Well, who set the example? After all the seed was sown, and now we are reaping the whirlwind. For that reason we must recognise the fact that a good deal of allowance must be made for young men who got into this movement in the belief that they were about to achieve a Republic, without partition. I honestly believe that these men are as good Irishmen as any in this assembly, or in any part of the country, but they have been blindly led.

If we could arrive at some settlement and stop this internecine strife, we might have peace and progress. It is a sad state of affairs that in a country like this you have no big man to step out, Churchman or layman, to make these warring sections shake hands and work for the future development of the country. In the past, as the Minister for Defence said some time ago in the Dáil, we had some big men to look up to, but evidently now we have nobody, and it is a war to the death. It is very hard oftentimes to speak in measured tones when you see men in the country who should live in peace and friendship instead filled with bitterness, and with sarcasm spoken by people who were brothers a few days ago, and who would now tear each other like wild beasts if they got at each other in battle. That must be put down, and we must try, if we want to advance our material interests, to act like other countries. We are the laughing stock of the world, and nobody will deny that. There is no use speaking in a sotto voce kind of voice, but we must speak out boldly. The majority of the people are disgusted with this business. I have a fair knowledge of the country, and a good bureau of information in the people I am interested in who go through the country, and they are fed up with both sides. For that reason some steps should be taken to end this trouble. Seven months ago these people said they were not going to fight any more, and if they resume this war, no one will sympathise with them. I believe in stable Government and security for property, and anything that a good Government believes in, but I do not believe in iron rule and the iron fist in dealing with men with peculiar characteristics as a race, separate and distinct from all other nations. The British got out and were glad to do so, but we are going on with their old tactics. I have been approached by different parties. I have been approached by the other side and I have told them I believe in constitutional policy, and if they are prepared to act constitutionally, they are as well entitled to preach Republicanism from the hilltops as I am to preach Free Stateism or farmerism.

With reference to the talk about using the axe, there is an item in the Estimates for the Stationery Office which appears to be very high, a sum of £205,000. There is a charge of 10/- for that Estimate in the Publishers Office. The people of the country are all shareholders in the Nation's fortunes, and this book of a couple of hundred pages, about the same size as an ordinary Railway Guide, which you can buy for a few pence, is charged 10/- for to the ordinary citizen. Is it to prevent them seeing the affairs that are the concern of the country that this big price is put on this book? I think whoever is responsible in that Department should have put it within easy reach of the people at a low figure. Yesterday the President took to task some Deputy who had the temerity to protest against the heavy cost of the army, and who gave a comparison of the cost of the army here and in other countries.

I am one of the Deputies who have been so greatly daring as to express in words what is in the minds of thousands of people. Our army is costing, according to the Estimates, £10,600,000, or £3 for every man, woman and child in the Free State. That is a huge sum, and it may be academic to compare it with the cost of armies in other countries, but here is a concrete case. It is costing more than double the rental and annuities for the whole Free State. So far as I am concerned, I do not see what we want with a huge army. I would like to see the Government aim at producing such a state of affairs that we could do with a small army. What do we want with artillery and aeroplanes, or anything like that, in a small country such as ours? If we need an Army, our military leaders must not go around in Rolls-Royce luxury as they have been. As regards railway freights, that is a very important matter for the live-stock trade and those of the farming community. I am surprised that some action was not taken sooner by the Government in this matter. They have delayed too long, and a good deal of traffic has been diverted through the North of Ireland from the port of Dublin and other ports. The North of Ireland reduced their rates, and got through bookings, and were the first to do so via the port of Belfast.

I approached Ministers here about having through bookings resumed. As a matter of fact, they were about doing it in England when the Treaty was signed. We would have had through bookings long ago if we had to deal with the people on the other side, because I got a question asked by Captain Redmond in the House of Commons regarding through bookings and reduction of freights, and the reply was that a conference was at that time about to sit representative of railway and shipping interests with a view to having these through bookings resumed. But nothing has been done to reduce the high freights in this country. It is very hard for us to compete with Continental countries so long as we have to pay these excessive rates. I wonder are the Government aware that in England, since 1920, the reduction in railway rates and dock dues amounts to £46,000,000. In that country freights and other charges are down to about 50 per cent. over pre-war. I do not see how we are to compete with Continental countries unless this question is taken in hands immediately.

I do not wish to say anything further than that I hope some assistance will be given to the bringing about of peace. It is the desire of everyone in this country to see it brought about. I am sure it is the wish of the Deputies on these benches, even though they are opposed to these men.

I would like to see both parties shaking hands. It is all very well for some Deputies to laugh and sneer, but there are a lot of people crying. It was a sad day for this nation to see the poor sights that we have now to witness day after day. Remember my words; unless peace comes about you will see more of the life blood of the country poured out. That will be worse. We have had enough of that and want no more. We want peace, prosperity and happiness which should reign in any country that has the grace of God about it.

Mr. MILROY: I believe I spoke on an amendment already. I would not have intervened now only that I believe it was the intention that the speech we have listened to should be the last one this evening. I do not think it should be the last one.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:
The Deputy has spoken already.

Mr. MILROY: On the amendment but not on the general question.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:
On the general question.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I move "That the question be now put."

Agreed.

COMMITTEE ON FINANCE. MONEY RESOLUTION.

Chun críche aon Aehta a rithfar sa tSiosón so chun forálacha huana do dhéanamh chun ceapa agus seirbhís daoine i Stát Sheirbhís Rialtais Shaorstáit Éireann do regealáil agus chun cóluacht Coimisinéirí do bhunú chun scrúdú agus deimhniú do dhéanamh ar cháilíochta daoine a tairgfar chun a gceaptha, go bhfuil sé oiriúnach a údarú go n-íocfar amach as airgead a sholathróidh an tOireachtas luach saothair na gCoimisinéirí agus a n-oifigeach agus pé costaisí eile fé n-a raghaidh na Coimisinéirí chun an tAcht so do chur in éifeacht.

That for the purpose of any Act of the present Session to make permanent provision for the regulation of the appointment and service of persons in the Civil Service of the Government of Saorstát Éireann, and the establishment of a body of Commissioners to enquire into and certify the qualifications of persons proposed to be appointed, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of moneys provided by the Oireachtas of the remuneration of the Commissioners and their officers, and such other expenses of carrying such Act into effect as may be incurred by the Commissioners.

Mr. BLYTHE: I move this resolution. The necessary message has been received from the Governor-General. That was necessary in this case. I think that no point of any importance arises. The expenditure on the Civil Service Commission will be very small indeed.

Motion put and agreed to.

THE DAIL RESUMES.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The resolution is now reported to the Dáil.

Question: "That the Dáil agrees with the Committee in the said resolution," put and agreed to.

INTERPRETATION BILL, 1923. SECOND STAGE.

Mr. KEVIN O'HIGGINS: On the question of the Second Reading of the Interpretation Bill, 1923, if there was a feeling that it would be likely to run on into another sitting, it might be desirable to take some of the other Bills that are more likely to be non-contentious, such as the Gaming Bill, or the Local Elections Postponement (Amendment) Bill.

Mr. JOHNSON: Perhaps the Minister would give the Dáil an indication, while on the Interpretation Bill, on the point that this is the kind of Bill which ought be referred to a Special Committee for consideration in Committee? That is to say, that its consideration should be by a Special Committee rather than by a Committee of the whole Dáil. It is a Bill of very great importance, of course. It seems to raise a great many points of difficulty and detail, which could be more effectively—with greater enlightenment to some of the Deputies—and more usefully discussed in a small Committee than in a Committee of the whole Dáil. I ask the Minister if he would be prepared to meet that proposition, as otherwise it may require a longer discussion on Second Reading.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: We would be quite prepared to agree to submit the Bill to a Special Committee.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Shall we take the Second Reading now?

Mr. JOHNSON: Agreed, as far as I am concerned.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move the Second Reading of this Interpretation Bill, 1923. It is in the nature of what might be called a draftsman's dictionary, and with these people who draft documents, it is a familiar practice to have definitions which can be conveniently used for the purpose of having certainty in the use of terms.

It enables phrases to be used subsequently with the dictionary or vocabulary of the Act always defining the expressions used. In England they have a series of these Interpretation Acts. The latest was the Act of 1889. That Act is now somewhat out of date. In addition to it, we ourselves have added to the vocabulary words that need definition for the purposes of our own legislation.

Following the precedent that we have already adopted, we have made a single comprehensive Bill covering all the terms that are likely to be of frequent occurrence. The type of expressions that we find in a Bill of this kind are expressions that are usually contained, and likely to occur, in different kinds of Bills and are likely to be of frequent use. It also disposes of other matters which have frequently given rise to questions in the Courts such as when a power to make Rules is conferred, whether that gives power to repeal Rules and make a new set as may be required by the circumstances afterwards. It is now recognised that there should be a provision of that kind in order to shorten the drafting of provisions enabling Rules to be made. Deputies already have an outline of the Bill before them and they will have seen the assortment of terms that are proposed to be defined. There is no question of principle involved in having a Bill of the kind, save the principle of a valuable dictionary. Any other matter that would arise out of the Bill is a matter for a Committee.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I second the motion.

Question: "That the Interpretation Bill, 1923, be read a Second Time," put and agreed to.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Under the Standing Orders the Bill must be referred to a Special Committee.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Must the Members or the personnel of the Committee be named?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Not under new arrangements.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I move that the

[Mr. O'Higgins.]
Bill be referred to a Special Committee.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I second.

Motion put and agreed to.

GAMING BILL, 1923—SECOND STAGE.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: This Bill is short and very simple, and I trust that its introduction raises no false hopes. It does not legalise gambling, and it does not enable a person to sue for recovery of gambling debts. It has simply one effect, and that is to repeal Section 2 of the Gaming Act of 1835. Under that Section an action could be taken to recover money paid by cheque on foot of a gambling transaction, and in an action which went, I think, to the House of Lords, it was held that an executor was bound to take such action for the recovery of monies paid by cheque by the deceased person on foot of a gambling transaction. That created a very serious and awkward position for executors, and it must be remembered that it was not a one-sided provision. The book-makers or the executors of book-makers could take—and the executors were bound to take—action for the recovery of monies paid on foot of a gambling transaction.

The single effect of this Bill is that when a person has lost and paid in a gambling transaction, an action will not lie for recovery. It does not exclude the right of pleading the Gaming Act. It does not put it in the power of any person to sue in the Court for the recovery of money won in a gambling transaction; but it does remove that anomaly by which, after the transaction is closed and after the money is paid over, the person who actually paid, or his executor, could sue for its recovery. That is the single effect of the Bill and I think it will be generally agreed that a law which puts the onus on the executor of the deceased person to sue for the recovery of all monies paid by him in the course of his life on foot of gambling transactions, is a provision that ought properly to be repealed. This short simple Bill repeals that provision.

Mr. GOREY: Would it be in order to propose an amendment to this Bill legalising gambling?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is a question for the Committee Stage.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: On the Committee Stage, yes.

Mr. JOHNSON: Would the Minister tell us what would be the effect on gambling if this Bill did not pass? I realise the strength of his argument; but as one unversed in these matters I am curious to know whether, if this Bill were not passed, the effect would be to limit very materially any gambling except ready money gambling.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: To an extent it might have that effect, but it is very likely that people would continue to pay by cheque and receive cheques in payment believing that action for the recovery of the money would not follow. In any case the law as it stands puts on the executors the active duty of proceeding to sue for the recovery of monies paid by the deceased person. It is felt that is a hardship—quite apart from the possible effects in future of this short piece of legislation—that ought to be removed, and removed instantly. If the Deputy cares to press his point of view in order to bring about ready-money gambling, that of course is a point of view he is entitled to press.

Captain REDMOND: As far as I am concerned, I desire to give this Bill my absolute blessing. It is the first time I have found myself in complete agreement with the Government, so far, in the introduction of any of their measures. This Bill, so far as I understand, does away with a legal anomaly, and if it were not proposed we would be in the position of "as you were," namely, that where transactions took place between two citizens whereby cheques passed, being a formal insignia of honourable transactions, as the law now stands these transactions could be, and in some cases, as the Minister for Home Affairs has stated, would have to be the subject of proceedings. Therefore, I think it a very just and a very proper measure, and also a very equitable one, and I congratulate the Government upon its introduction.

Question—"That the Bill be now read a second time"—put and agreed to.

Committee Stage ordered for Wednesday next.

FISHERIES BILL, 1923—SECOND STAGE.

AIRE UM IASGACH (Fionán O Loingsigh): Sé brí an Bhille ná léasú do dheanamh ar shean-reachtanna tré mhéadú do dheanamh ar na pionóis a ghabhann le ciontaí áirithe a bhaineann le h-iascach bradáin agus breac abha agus iase eile, go mór-mór, ciontaí a dintear sa tsaosúr coisethe.

Ní chruthnuíonn an Bille aon chiontaí nua; gach aon rud atá curtha síos sa Bhille mar chiontaí tá sé ina chiontaí cheana féin fé sua sean-reachtanna. Fé mar atá ráidhte agam, níl-uainn ach na pionóis a ghabhann leis na ciontaí sin do mhéadú, agus tá muinín agam go mbeidh an Dáil ar aon aigne liom gur gádh an meid sin do dhéanamh. Ciontaí i gcóinnibh an Iascaigh Náisiúnta iseadh bradáin agus brie abha agus a seith agus a maghar do mharbhú, agus ní in a chóinnibh sin amháin, ach fós i gcóinnibh gach éinne atá ag brath ortha in aon tsí.

Deir lucht colúfochta go scéithean an bradáin míle ubh in aghaidh gach phuint dá mhéachaint féin. Se sin le rádh gur féidir do bhradáin deich bpúnt deich míle bradáin do thabhairt. Tá súil agam go n-aontófar le forálacha an Bhille seo, agus tá súil agam fós go dtiocfaidh de bharr na forálacha do chur i bhfeidhm go mbainfear go mór ó fhuadar na bhfoghluithe éise le linn an tsaosúir scéithe seo, agus go mbeidh feabhas mór ar iascach na tíre agus go dtiocfaidh saibheas mór don Stát dá bharr san le linn na h-ath-bhlíana.

When moving the first reading of this Bill I said that I felt it was more or less non-contentious; in the fact that it is the result of a demand from every part of the country, because of the depredations caused by the illegal poaching of fish in season and out of season. The purport of the Bill is to amend the existing statutes by increasing the penalties for certain offences in connection with salmon, trout and other fish, and, especially, in connection with offences committed during the annual close season. Every offence that is mentioned in the Bill is, under existing statutes, already an offence. In this way we merely propose to increase penalties for these offences and I feel that the Dáil will agree with me that this course is necessary—

Captain REDMOND: On a point of order may I call your attention, a Chinn Comhairle, to the fact that there is a Deputy reading a newspaper in the Dáil.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It certainly should not be done.

Mr. LYNCH: I said I felt that the Dáil would agree with me that this Bill is necessary because I think that anybody who knows anything about the matter will agree that the destruction of salmon and trout, and their eggs and fry, during the annual close season is something that is very harmful to the national fisheries, and not only to them but to everybody who is dependent, directly or indirectly for their livelihood, on the national fisheries.

What might be considered the only departure in the Bill, except as regards increases in the way 8 o'clock. of penalties, is that we have instituted a minimum penalty for all these offences that are mentioned in the Bill. This is an innovation, but we feel that it is a very necessary innovation, and many Deputies in their speeches here on fishery matters have convinced us more and more that it is necessary, because of the fact that it has been the course in the past with persons when charged and found guilty of breaches of the existing fishery laws to be let off with a nominal fine, if fined at all, and if a fine was imposed it was remitted. We propose in this Bill that there should be a minimum fine varying for classes of particular offences, and I think that will meet with the approval of the Dáil. The fines that were imposed in the past were absolutely no deterrent; they were in fact a joke. In that respect, especially as regards the more grave type of offence, we suggest that there

[Mr. Lynch.] should be imprisonment with or without the option of a fine, particularly for offences committed during the close season. This is not entirely new, because as regards some of the offences mentioned in the Bill there was an alternative of imprisonment already, especially with regard to the use of dynamite.

The only criticism that I saw of the Bill in the Press, after its first Reading, was the fact that we had omitted, so it was alleged, to insert poisoning as an offence. We felt that the penalties that are already there, under the existing Statutes, are sufficient as far as poisoning is concerned, and we are deliberately omitting the bringing in of poisoning now because of the fact that we might cut across things that we do not want to cut across, such as the tarring of roads by County Councils. The deleterious matter from the roads might go in and poison the fish in rivers. We do not want to come up against that now, and anyhow we felt that the poisoning is dealt with more effectively than ever it was before under Section 8 of the present Bill. It was not at any time the actual poisoner, so much as the person that instigated the poisoning, that reaped the benefit of it. It is extremely difficult to get the person who puts the poison in the stream, but it is not so difficult to catch the person who reaps the result and takes the dead fish from the stream. We cater for that under Section 8 of the Bill, and I think it will be more effective than any former provision. I said before that I hoped for general agreement on the provisions of the Bill, as it has been brought forward as the result of complaints from all over the country as to the wholesale destruction of salmon during the spawning season, especially last year. The consensus of opinion in the communications received by us, and from deputations received by us, was that the existing penalties were too small. I hope the result of enforcing the provisions of this Bill will be to deter considerably the poacher during the present spawning season, and that our inland fisheries will, as a result, show considerable improvement in the next year, and that there will be a consequent improvement in the amount of wealth that is to be gained from the development of the industry.

Mr. BURKE: I beg to second.

Mr. JOHNSON: When I read this Bill a short time ago I took a note of certain phrases in the various clauses proposing penalties, and I asked myself the question whether the statement on minimum penalties was a new principle. I think I recollected something of the kind in the Public Safety Act, and I think I opposed it then. When the Minister, in introducing the Bill, told us that it was an innovation, my doubts as to the wisdom of it were confirmed. I think it is a bad principle, whether it is an innovation or not, to compel a magistrate or a judge to impose a minimum penalty, no matter what the circumstances may be. The prisoner is found guilty of an offence, and no matter what the circumstances may be mitigating the heinousness of the offence, there is a minimum penalty provided, and whether that is in connection with fisheries or any other set or class of crimes, I think it is a bad principle. You give certain authority to a justice, and you have the right to assume that that justice or judge, as the case may be, is able to weigh up the character of the offence better than we here, legislating in advance, are capable of doing. If we cannot trust the justice to administer the law with due regard to the protection of the public, then we should not appoint justices giving them any discretion. We are practically asked in this Bill to condemn offenders to certain penalties quite irrespective of the circumstances surrounding the offences. I do not know anything about the history of the penal laws, but when the Minister said it is an innovation I am more than satisfied that it is a bad innovation and ought not to be accepted.

District Justices will probably be the people who will try offenders under this Act, and surely we can trust to their discretion as to the penalty. We are not henceforward dealing with the casual magistrate, and you have a right to trust the discretion of the Judges in these matters. You have an increased maximum penalty, and you have thereby indicated what the view of the Oireachtas is with regard to the evils against which we are legislating. I think it is a bad principle to introduce into legislation dealing with any offences—that you wish to impose a minimum penalty. I think it was pointed out in the discussion on the Public Safety Bill that where a person was guilty of murder there is no discretion. I think it was also pointed out that that was the only exception, and I would urge upon the Ministers the undesirability of persisting in this proposal of imposing a minimum penalty. The making of the maximum as high as you like, would be worth considering, but I do not think that it is a good plan to impose upon a Justice or a Judge a minimum, allowing him no discretion whatever, no matter what the circumstances surrounding the offence may be. On that ground I will oppose the Bill in all its stages.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL: May I say a word on the question which is just being discussed? The position as regards minimum penalties is this. It is not quite accurate to say that this is an innovation, because up to a certain period in English penal legislation it was the practice to insert minimum penalties. That was departed from, except in a certain class of cases, after a particular period in the eighties, and there are certain classes of penal legislation in which the principle of the minimum penalty has been consistently followed. One, for instance, is in revenue cases and another is in this very branch of fishery law. It is no innovation to have a minimum penalty in this Bill, because all existing Acts dealing with offences of this class prescribe minimum penalties. Looking at the groups of Acts in which minimum penalties have been prescribed, they are probably the type of Act in which the people are rather indulgent. The use, for instance, of a used postage stamp is one of the offences for which there is a minimum penalty. In the same way, some people have an extraordinary grádh for poachers and poached salmon, and the principle of minimum penalties has been preserved in fishing legislation.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: I would like to support Deputy Johnson in the statement he has made with regard to the enforcement of a minimum penalty. I fear there are grave dangers in connection with such an Act being passed. I can foresee that there are possibilities of what might amount to grave miscarriages of justice taking place. We all recognise in the past the crime of poaching has been regarded rather as an honourable than a dishonourable thing, and we also recognise the necessity which has arisen to protect our fisheries. At the same time I do not think that those conditions would warrant us passing an Act which might result in grave unfairness to some people who might be prosecuted under the Act. I can foresee that it is possible that some very young person, not acquainted with the law, might be caught in the act of poaching and might be brought before a District Justice who had no option but to fine him, say, £10 as a minimum penalty, or else let him go free. In all probability such a young man would not be in possession of the amount of the fine on him, and in the alternative might have to go to prison. I think it would be undesirable if young people, who unfortunately have come to regard poaching as a sport, should get into this unfortunate position. I am also of opinion that where the law attempts to enforce too high a penalty it indicates, to some extent, the weakness of the executive arm of the law in catching criminals. I think these penalties would scarcely be necessary if we could be quite sure that the police force, or those responsible for detecting crime, as regards the poaching of rivers, would be keen and watchful in their duties and that it would be almost impossible for anyone to carry on poaching with impunity. If we could rely on these men to do their duty, and if we knew that any person who attempted poaching would run a great risk of being caught, and that the law would be enforced to the fullest extent, I do not think it would be necessary to have minimum penalties or penalties in this Bill as high as they are.

Mr. LYNCH: As the Attorney-General pointed out, I was not quite correct when I spoke of the minimum penalty provided for in this Bill as being an innovation. There is a minimum penalty already, a nominal one for Section II. of the Bill, under the existing Statutes as 10/-. The original penalty fixed for the offence by the Act of '42 was not exceeding £10 with the forfeiture of the fish and boat. The Irish Fishery Act of '48 had a minimum fine of 10/-. There is a minimum penalty in connection with poisoning of £5 under the existing Statute. There is a minimum penalty of £2 for the use of illegal nets in weirs under the existing Statute. Perhaps we have made it apply more than it has been made to apply heretofore, but I still feel, in spite of what Deputy Johnson has said, that there is a good case for it.

Mr. JOHNSON: Is there not a minimum term of imprisonment in connection with these Acts?

Mr. LYNCH: There is—in connection with poisoning, two months. I do not know whether it is not exceeding or less than two months.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: A very important distinction.

Mr. LYNCH: Deputy Johnson says we are tying the hands of the Magistrates, and I do not agree with him. I think the Magistrates have always the option of making recommendations for the remission of any fine that may be imposed. It is not either, strictly speaking, condemning him to inflict penalties irrespective of circumstances. After all, there is a difference between minimum and maximum penalties. He can inflict in accordance with circumstances, and if the circumstances are such that they should be lower than the minimum penalty he can make his recommendations for something even lower than that. With regard to Deputy Heffernan's point, at the moment I must say I am not at all inclined to give way on this question of a minimum penalty. I am prepared to consider before the next stage the reduction of the present minimum and maximum penalties in the Bill. That is all I can promise at the moment.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: The Minister spoke of a Magistrate being of opinion that some penalty should be imposed less than the minimum penalty enforceable in the Bill if and when it becomes a Bill. He seems to infer that the Magistrate would communicate this to somebody who would have a choice as to whether a lower penalty might be imposed. It would appear that the Magistrate would appeal to the Minister to know from the Minister whether the Act recommended by the Ministry and adopted by the Ministry should or should not be enforced as adopted.

Mr. LYNCH: I am sure Deputy Figgis is not half as much in doubt as he pretends to be. If a murderer is found guilty by a jury a judge has practically no option but to condemn that man to death. He may make certain recommendations that a sentence may be commuted. Presumably the same procedure would be followed here.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: When is the next stage?

Mr. LYNCH: Next Thursday.

Mr. GOREY: I think this is a Bill that interests a good many Deputies, and the time for handing in amendments is too short. I suggest to the Minister, if he has all this cut and dry, and if he is not adamant on the subject, to extend the time sufficiently to give us a chance to get the Bill amended.

Mr. LYNCH: I would be prepared to do so, but the Deputy will see that the close season is now near, and the very object of the Bill will be lost if we delay it much longer. It has already been held over for a long time.

Mr. GOREY: The Minister has already the machinery to run the old Acts, and there is no necessity for this except as regards the question of fines. It does not impose new penalties for breaches of the law.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Suppose we take the Committee Stage next Tuesday week?

Agreed.

CEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS.

ORAL ANSWERS.

CO. CLARE COMPENSATION AWARDS.

PADRAIG O hOGAIN (An Clár) asked the Minister for Finance whether he is aware that considerable dissatisfaction is expressed by the residents of Miltown-Malbay, Lahinch, and Ennistymon, in respect of the awards made to them in respect of the destruction of their property by British Forces in September, 1920, that it is claimed that awards were made without any evidence being heard from the applicants, and that the Commission actually refused to hear their evidence; whether, in consideration of the awards made by the County Court Judge at Ennis, and the absence of the applicants' evidence at the Commission, further inquiry will be made.

MINISTER for FISHERIES (Mr. F. Lynch, replying for Minister for Finance): The Compensation (Ireland) Commission is an independent tribunal set up by agreement between the British Government and the Government of Saorstát Éireann, and is not, therefore, under the control of the Minister for Finance.

The Minister is aware that in individual cases claimants have expressed dissatisfaction with the awards of the Commission, but there is no reason to believe that their awards are otherwise than fair and reasonable. There is no appeal against a decision made by the Commission, and no further inquiry is, therefore, possible in the cases alluded to by the Deputy.

POSSESSION OF KILRUSH PREMISES.

PADRAIG O hOGAIN (An Clár) asked the Minister for Finance whether he is aware that on July 29th, 1922, National troops took over possession of the premises of the Irish Transport Union, Kilrush, and that they are still in possession of the place; whether a claim for compensation has been received by the Ministry of Finance respecting damage, etc., caused; and whether, in view of the serious inconvenience and loss sustained by the Branch, he will cause damages to be assessed at once and the place handed over to the officials.

Mr. LYNCH (for Minister for Finance): I would refer the Deputy to the answer given on the 12th July last by the Minister for Defence to Deputy O'Brien in reply to a similar question. I understand that the premises are still in military occupation. The question of their evacuation is a matter for the Minister for Defence. Any claim for damage as a result of the occupation will be dealt with as soon as possible after evacuation has taken place.

Mr. HOGAN: Is the Minister aware that the Transport Union is paying rent for the hall in question, although the military are in occupation of it?

Mr. LYNCH: I am not aware of that, but I will bring the matter to the notice of the Minister for Finance.

Mr. BAXTER: Am I to understand from the answer of the Minister that no rent will be paid for such a place during its occupation by the military?

Mr. LYNCH: I presume that rent will be paid.

Mr. BAXTER: Before its evacuation?

Mr. LYNCH: I would not be able to answer now on that point, but I will bring it to the notice of the Minister for Finance.

APPOINTMENTS TO PRISON SERVICE.

Major BRYAN COOPER asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether the new regulations governing appointments to the permanent Prisons Service are such as to debar practically all the temporary warders now serving; whether the great majority of these temporary warders volunteered to join the National Army last year and were requested to remain at their posts; and whether, in view of the valuable experience they have gained, he will consider the desirability of making them eligible for the permanent service, subject to their passing a medical test.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. K. O'Higgins): The regulations governing appointments to the permanent Prisons Service do not debar temporary warders who are within the prescribed limits of age (i.e., 20 to 30 years). Before appointment to the permanent service candidates will be required to satisfy the Civil Service Commissioners that their character and health are satisfactory, and that they are sufficiently educated in certain prescribed subjects. In the cases of persons who have practical experience of a trade, or who have served with the National Forces, the maximum limit of age is extended to 35 years. I am not prepared to authorise a similar extension for all temporary warders. In July, 1922, a number of temporary warders volunteered for service in the Army, but it was not convenient to release these men from the Prisons Service.

Major BRYAN COOPER: Will the Minister consider the desirability of allowing the extension of the age limit applicable for men who served in the Army to apply also to men who volunteered for service in the Army, but who were not allowed to go because their services were required in the prison?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The alterations in the regulations were made to enable the men who served with the National Forces to be employed up to 35 years of age. The suggestion underlying the question was that because some temporary warders volunteered for service in the Army and were not released no age limit should apply to any temporary warder for appointment to the permanent service. That is something that we are not prepared to concede. The records of the Department show that not more than 29 volunteered on the 22nd of July, and of these eight were over the age of 40.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFIT.

TOMÁS DE NOGLA asked the Minister for Industry and Commerce if his attention has been called to the large number of unemployed persons who have been disqualified from receiving Unemployment Insurance Benefit under Section 8 (4) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1923, on the ground that twelve contributions have not been paid during the current insurance year, and whether he is aware of the hardship suffered by many people as a result of this provision, and if he intends to amend the law in this respect?

Mr. LYNCH (for Minister for Industry and Commerce): A certain number of persons are, no doubt, disqualified from receiving unemployment benefit under Section 8 (4) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, but the benefit year, which only began on 17th October last, has been too short a period in operation for any statistics to be available as to the number of such persons.

It is not intended to revert to a system of benefit not supported by contributions, which would appear, to be the only amendment of the present law relating to unemployment insurance that would afford the relief contemplated by the Deputy.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF.

DOMHNALL O MUIRGHEASA asked the Minister for Industry and Commerce when he proposes to initiate measures for the relief of the present critical situation in regard to unemployment, and whether such measures will include amendment of the Unemployed Insurance Act, 1923, so as to make good the inadequacy of the normal insurance system, consequent on the fact that the revival of trade anti-participated by Ministers during the passing of the Act in May last has not taken place.

Mr. LYNCH (for Minister for Industry and Commerce): The intentions of the Government in regard to assisting unemployment were indicated generally in the course of the statement made by the Minister for Finance in the Dáil on the 2nd November, when it was explained that the initiation of any measures of housing or road expenditure would be contingent upon the Government being satisfied that a reasonable adjustment had been reached both of prices and wages. It is hoped that the proposals then referred to will be fully elaborated at a very early date. It is not intended to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1923, by reverting to any system of benefit not supported by contributions.

Mr. JOHNSON: Are we to understand that people in the road-making or building industries will not be able to look for any better prospect than they have, say, at present?

Mr. LYNCH: The answer states that the initiation of any measures of housing or road expenditure would be contingent upon the Government being satisfied that reasonable adjustments had been reached both of prices and of wages.

Mr. JOHNSON: That only deals with the roads and houses.

PUBLIC LIGHTING AND CLEANING OF KILLESTER.

Major BRYAN COOPER asked the Minister for Local Government whether he is aware that the village of Killester, with over 1,000 inhabitants, lacks both street lighting and any means of emptying dustbins; and whether he will press on the North Dublin Rural District Council the desirability of providing these facilities for the inhabitants.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. Burke): The North Dublin Rural District Council have decided to make provision for the public lighting of Killester, and are at present engaged in going into the incidental details.

As regards scavenging, representations have already been made to the Council as to the need of facilities for refuse removal in this area. A proposal for the purpose will come up for discussion at the next meeting of the Council on the 28th instant. The progress of the case will be followed, and any action that may seem to be necessary will be taken.

RELIEF OF DISTRESS.

TADHG O MURCHADHA asked the Minister for Local Government whether he is aware that in the allocation of grants for the relief of distress, no grant was given to the Castletown-Bere District Council; whether, in view of the large number of unemployed persons in that district, the claims of the district to a portion of any monies to be given for the relief of distress will in future be considered.

Mr. BURKE: A sum of £2,975 was voted by the Dáil Distress Committee to the Castletown Bere Rural District Council. A scheme was submitted and approved for the expenditure of this amount. Owing to irregular activities in the area, it was found impossible to carry out the approved works during the financial year in which the money was voted. There is therefore no money at present available for the relief of distress in this district. Should a fund become available in the future the claims of this district will have due consideration.

OLD AGE PENSIONS.

CLARE CLAIMS.

PADRAIG O HOGAIN asked the Minister for Local Government why an Old Age Pension award made in respect of Mrs. Winifred Hehir, of 1 Corkally Lane, Ennis, by the Co. Clare Pension Committee, has been disallowed by his Department, and whether, considering the nature of the evidence adduced to substantiate the claim, the re-opening of the case is a matter worthy of consideration.

Mr. BURKE: A claim from Mrs. Winifred Hehir for the old age pension was disallowed on the 30th January, 1923, and her case has not since come up on appeal. A previous pension claim from her was disallowed on the 19th April, 1917. The baptismal certificate of the claimant was not produced. No record of her marriage could be traced in the General Register Office, Dublin, and her name was not included in the return of her family at the Census of March, 1851. It does not appear from the official papers that any evidence of age was put forward in this case. The 'Co. Clare Pension Committee stated that they were satisfied on appearance. It is open to the claimant to make a fresh claim if she is in a position to furnish definite evidence of age.

Mr. HOGAN: What does the Minister exactly mean by definite evidence of age?

Mr. BURKE: Legal evidence, I should say. It would require to be substantiated by an affidavit.

SEUMAS MAC COSGAIR asked the Minister for Local Government whether, having regard to the destruction of Census Records in the Four Courts and the consequent impossibility of obtaining certificates of the ages of numerous claimants for old age pensions, sworn evidence of ages will in future be accepted by the Pensions Committees and the Local Government Board; whether the destruction referred to deprived such persons of their rights under the Old Age Pensions Acts.

Mr. BURKE: I would refer the Deputy to the reply given to Deputy McGoldrick in answer to his question of the 27th March last in regard to proof of age of claimants for the old age pension. I shall give the Deputy a copy of that reply.

It is the practice when a birth or baptismal certificate cannot be procured, and the Census records are not available, to consider, in conjunction with the other facts of the case, affidavits from persons of standing who have known the claimant for a sufficiently long time, and who testify as to his age from knowledge based on definite past events. The affidavits should give in detail the grounds for the opinions expressed and statements made therein, and should set forth relevant facts bearing on the life history of the claimant, such as date of marriage of his parents, and his own position amongst the children, especially as compared with a brother or sister whose age had been established.

As mentioned in the reply to Deputy McGoldrick, it is obvious that an affidavit would not of itself suffice to establish age, and would require verification.

PADRAIG O HOGAIN (An Clár) asked the Minister for Local Government why an old age pension award, made by the Clare Pension Committee, in respect of John Shannon, Lough Doolin, Ennistymon, has been disallowed by his Department, notwithstanding the fact that proof of his having attained the age of 70 years was available.

Mr. BURKE: The decision of the 21st July last of the Clare Pension Committee allowing the old age pension of 10/- a week in this case was reversed on the appeal of the Pension Officer.

The baptismal certificate of the claimant was not produced, and his age at marriage, on the 31st January, 1882, was then recorded as 25 years.

A sister of the claimant was baptised on the 30th July, 1855, and his brother furnished an affidavit dated 7th September, 1923, in which he stated that he was an old age pensioner and would be 73 years old in October, 1923; that his brother John was the next born in the family after deponent and before the sister, and that he had heard old people say there was a period of two years between his age and that of the claimant.

It was decided, on the 13th September last, that the evidence put forward in the case did not warrant a decision that the claimant had attained the statutory age, and the pension claim was disallowed.

Mr. HOGAN: Was not a definite substantiation of the age furnished on that occasion?

Mr. BURKE: The evidence is very conflicting. It is a border line case that it is not very easy to decide. On the [Mr. Burke.] whole, we think that the balance of evidence was against the claim. The Deputy can see the evidence if he likes.

CO. CORK FISHING FACILITIES.

TADHG O MURCHADHA asked the Minister for Fisheries whether a memorial from the fishermen of Goleen and Crookhaven districts (Co. Cork) was forwarded to him some time ago, supported by a recommendation from Rev. F. O'Sullivan, P.P., Goleen, praying for the construction of slips at Dunkeely, Goleen, and other places in the district, in order that fishermen may have better facilities for carrying on their work; whether an inspector visited the district, and, if so, what his recommendations were, and whether it is proposed to give effect to such recommendations.

Mr. LYNCH: I received a memorial of the nature referred to; and had an inspection made of the various places mentioned in it. The report subsequently furnished to me indicated that at some of those places the existing facilities were capable of improvement. Owing, however, to the Government's decision to restrict expenditure to matters urgently necessary, I was compelled to hold over the consideration of outlay upon the projects mentioned in the memorial, until such time as the general financial position shall have improved; and the fishing industry shows some signs of revival.

Mr. MURPHY: Is the Minister aware that a scheme such as is suggested in this question was approved of by the C. D. Board, under the old regime, and that it has been held up for the last four or five years? Will the Minister give consideration to the matter in the immediate future?

Mr. LYNCH: I am aware that that is so, and I will raise the matter again.

CHARGES AGAINST MEATH PRISONERS.

Mr. DAVID HALL asked the Minister for Defence whether, in view of his reply to Question No. 22 of 14th November, 1923, he will state if John Clarke, James Caffrey, and Patrick Matthews, of Wilkinstown, Navan, Co. Meath, were furnished with a charge sheet prior to the charges against them being investigated by Military Tribunal on the 11th July, 1923; whether the proceedings of the said Military Tribunal were made public; whether the prisoners were present in Court during the alleged trial, and if the findings and sentence of the Court were made known to them; and whether the said prisoners got due notice of their trial, so that they could prepare their defence, and procure legal assistance.

MINISTER for DEFENCE (General Mulcahy):

When arrested the prisoners were charged with armed robbery and signed statements admitting their guilt. The accused had then five months within which to prepare their defence, and to obtain any assistance they required. If necessary, an officer would have been assigned to defend them. On being charged before the Military Tribunal, none of the accused asked for an adjournment or for assistance in their defence, but pleaded guilty, all making a full confession of the charge, pleading drink as an excuse.

Owing to the large number of cases to be dealt with, it has not been possible up to the present to promulgate in a formal manner the sentences passed in these cases. This will, however, be done before they come up for review before the Board of Commissioners which is at present being set up under the Provisions of the Indemnity Act, 1923.

SOLDIERS' DEPENDENTS ALLOWANCE.

Mr. DAVID HALL asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that dependents allowance to Mrs. Jane Kiernan, Carrowstown, Ballivor, Co. Meath, granted and paid to her in respect of her son, Private Peter Kiernan, No. 1383, C. Coy., 58th Batt., Military Barracks, Dundalk, was stopped last June, and that since then no allowance was paid; whether any reason can be given why allowance has not been paid since that time; and whether inquiries will be made with a view to expediting payment of arrears of dependents allowance due to Mrs. Jane Kiernan, and the continuance of same during the service of her son in the National Army.

General MULCAHY: The issue of dependents' allowance, which was assessed at 7/- per week to Mrs. Kiernan in respect of her son, Private Peter Kiernan, was stopped on the 7th July last in consequence of the fact that up to that date payment had inadvertently been made at the rate of 14/- per week from the 17th March last. The amount overpaid, £8 1s., will be cleared on the 15th proximo, and future fortnightly payments at the rate of 14/- will be made thereafter so long as the allowance is issuable in her case.

KILCULLEN SOLDIER'S WOUND PENSION.

AODH O CULACHAIN asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that Private Patrick Doyle, of Dillon's Avenue, Kileullen, Co. Kildare, who was discharged medically unfit, at Wellington Barracks, on 2nd February, 1923, is still suffering from the effects of gunshot wounds received in action on the 5th October, 1922, at Ballineen, Co. Cork, and has been unable to work for the past nine months; whether instructions will be given to expedite payment of wound pension to this man in view of the circumstances mentioned.

General MULCAHY: Consideration of the claim made by Patrick Doyle, of Dillon's Avenue, Kileullen, Co. Kildare, for compensation in respect of a wound, is being expedited.

PAYMENT OF ARMY ACCOUNTS.

Mr. CONOR HOGAN asked the Minister for Defence if payment will be expedited to Mr. William Meehan, Ennis, of that item of his claim for £102 5s., for motor hire, which is outstanding since April, 1922.

General MULCAHY: I understand that consideration of Mr. Meehan's claim referred to has been held up in connection with the investigation of another transaction. Instructions have been issued to have it dealt with separately. It is anticipated that payment will be made shortly.

SEAMUS MAC COSGAIR asked the Minister for Defence if he can state why Thomas Duane, of Meelick, Co. Galway, has not been paid for a quantity of turf which, on September 8th, 1922, and March 17th, 1923, he supplied to the order of the Military quartered at the Tower, Meelick, and repeated applications for which have been made to the Military authorities.

General MULCAHY: A payment of £14 was made to claimant on the 1st. A claim amounting to £7 10s. is still outstanding, and arrangements are being made to expedite payment.

WRITTEN ANSWERS.

ARMY ACCOUNTS.

Mr. CONOR HOGAN asked the Minister for Defence if payment of a sum of £22 for provender supplied to live stock impounded at Ennis will be expedited to Mr. Joseph Kerin, Ennis.

General MULCAHY: I am arranging to have consideration of Mr. Kerin's claim expedited as much as possible.

TADHG O MURCHADHA asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that a considerable number of army accounts are still unpaid in the Dunmanway and Drimoleague district, and whether he will take steps to expedite payment of them.

General MULCAHY: Accounts from Dunmanway amounting to £2,000 approximately, and from Drimoleague amounting to about £2,600 were received at General Headquarters on the 9th instant. The bulk of these accounts have been passed for payment and will be discharged within the next few days. The remainder are under consideration, and will be discharged as soon as possible.

SOLDIER'S CLAIM FOR PENSION.

PADRAIG O hOGAIN (An Clár) asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that Patrick Considine, Dunogan, Miltown-Malbay, Co. Clare, was injured by falling off a lorry whilst discharging his duty as a member of [Pádraig O hGáin.] the National Army, and was discharged as medically unfit about twelve months ago; whether, in view of Considine's incapacity to provide for himself, his case for pension will be decided at the earliest opportunity.

General MULCAHY: The enquiries in the case of Patrick Considine who alleges that he was injured by falling from a lorry are not yet completed. I am not, therefore, in a position to state whether his case comes under the provisions of the Army Pensions Act, 1923, but its consideration will be expedited as much as possible.

CO. TIPPERARY COLLISION.

Major BRYAN COOPER asked the Minister for Defence whether his attention has been called to the claim of James Ryan, of Blind Street, Cashel, Co. Tipperary, for damages which his hackney motor car sustained in collision with an Army lorry on September 26th; whether, as Ryan is a poor man and has been deprived of his means of livelihood, he will expedite the settlement of this claim.

General MULCAHY: There is no trace at General Headquarters of the receipt of a claim from Mr. Ryan, but I am making local enquiries and will communicate as soon as possible with the Deputy.

FOOT AND MOUTH DISEASE.

CLOSING OF ENGLISH PORTS.

Mr. ALFRED BYRNE: I desire to ask a question in reference to a matter of great importance. I heard to-day that, at half-past one o'clock, an order arrived in Dublin containing an intimation of the closing down of ports in Great Britain, with the exception of Holyhead, against Irish live stock. I would be glad if the Government would inform us if they have any knowledge of the issue of such an order, and, if so, what is the cause of the issuing of this order.

MINISTER FOR HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. O'Higgins): My information is that the situation is substantially as described by the Deputy, and that there has been a closing down order of ports by the British authorities. It is felt that the seriousness of the Foot and Mouth situation in England demands that step. The ports open at present are the Welsh ports of Holyhead, Cardiff and Fishguard.

Mr. THOMAS JOHNSON: In view of that position, will the Minister take into consideration the desirability of immediately setting the Drogheda Meat Factory to work?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I will transmit that suggestion to the Minister for Agriculture.

NATIONAL LOAN.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Minister for Home Affairs desires to make a statement before we enter upon the business on the Order Paper.

MINISTER FOR HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. K. O'Higgins): I have been asked by the Minister for Finance to make a short explanatory statement with regard to the Loan which is about to be issued.

The Loan consists of ten millions of 5 per cent. stock issued at 95 per cent. These terms are very favourable to investors in comparison with gilt edged issues at present on the market. The British 5 per cent. War Loan is quoted at over 100. The Commonwealth Government of Australia recently issued a 5 per cent. Loan in London at 99, and the present quotation is nearly 100. South Africa also issued recently a 5 per cent. Loan at 99½, and the present quotation is slightly in excess of the issue price.

The better terms granted by the Free State are due, primarily, to the fact that the credit of the country is an unknown factor in the outside world. In fact the financial position of the Free State should be at least as sound as that of the Dominion Governments mentioned in the preceding paragraph, and the actual security afforded for the present Loan, namely, the Central Fund, may be regarded as absolute.

A substantial Sinking Fund is provided in connection with this Loan. This will tend to keep up the market price after issue, as the Sinking Fund will be used to purchase stock that may be quoted on the market at or under par. For the purposes of the Loan generally, £750,000 a year is set aside. Out of this, the interest on outstanding stock will be paid, and the balance, which will increase automatically as the years go on, will be used for the purpose of the Sinking Fund.

The Loan is a Trustee security for Trustees in the Free State.

For the convenience of Southern subscribers, and of the Cork Stock Exchange, a Register of the Loan is being established in Cork. This is the first time that a Government Stock Register is being maintained in that city. It will enable dealings in the Loan to take place expeditiously in Cork, and without any necessity for brokers having to pass on their business to outside centres.

Dividends will be paid without any deduction of income tax at the source. Persons receiving such dividends, who are not within the income tax limit, will, therefore, be saved any trouble about applying for refunds of tax.

Another advantage of the Loan is that there is a prospect that the substantial yield which it allows will be payable over a considerable period of years. The Loan is not bound to be redeemed until 1945, but the Government has an option of redemption in 1935, or later. It is probable that holders can count upon keeping the Loan until 1945. In the case of the British 5 per cent. War Loan, the position in this respect is much less satisfactory. In that case, redemption must take place not later than 1947, but the Government may redeem in 1929. It is highly probable that the power to redeem in 1929 will be exercised by the British Government in that case.

This characteristic of the Free State Loan makes it of special value to Trustees and others who want to obtain a good income over a considerable period.

The fact that the Loan is primarily an internal issue has several advantages. An issue abroad would have to be made at a less favourable rate. This would directly result in imposing a heavier burden on the Exchequer, and, therefore, in tending to keep taxation at a high level. Moreover, the dividends received by home subscribers will swell their income and assist the yield of income tax, whereas dividends paid to foreigners produce no similar return for this country. Again, borrowing abroad is one of several methods by which inflation can most readily be achieved. This evil is far less likely to arise when the Government borrows from the savings of the country itself.

It may be suggested that the Government should go directly to the banks for the money that it requires and ask them to supply its needs out of the large deposits that they hold. The answer is that the Government have already done this on the limited scale on which alone it is justifiable. Larger borrowing by the Government from the banks would be directly inflationary, and could not be reconciled with sound principles of finance. The same objections do not arise if individuals, who have deposits in the bank, take steps to transfer them to the Government by way of subscription to the Loan.

The co-operation of all substantial holders of money is very important for the Loan, and it is very desirable that they should understand that the commercial interests of the country will benefit greatly through the Loan being a success. Taxation will thereby tend to be kept down, and the credit and stability of the country assured. The establishing of a sound credit now will contribute directly towards the financing of the State on a cheaper basis in future.

The terms of the Loan, however, make special provision also for attracting small investors. The Loan can be obtained in blocks as small as £10, and even that amount can be subscribed by instalments spread over a period of three months. The numerous advantages of having many small investors in Government securities scattered throughout the country need no emphasis.

The Minister asked me to add that he invites the hearty co-operation of all members of the Dáil and Seanad towards making the Loan the success it ought to be, towards making it a great act of faith on the part of the people of the country in their own future as a self-governing community.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I desire to ask if there is to be any term within which the lists will be kept open.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I think the closing date is for the 10th December.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: In connection with the order of business there is one item of private business—the First Reading of a Bill by Deputy Johnson—and if that were taken immediately after the First Reading, which is down upon the paper as Government business, and disposed of in a short time, it would mean that the other business could go on without interruption. Otherwise, we would be coming to private business at 5 o'clock, and if it was disposed of rapidly we would then have to go back again to the business which was interrupted at 5 o'clock. If there is no objection, I suggest that the item No. 7 be taken immediately after item No. 1.—I have no objection.

DAIL EIREANN LOANS AND FUNDS BILL, 1923.—FIRST STAGE.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. O'Higgins): On behalf of the Minister for Finance I ask the leave of the Dáil to have printed and circulated the Dáil Eireann Loans and Funds Bill. It is, perhaps, proper that when we are about to float the first Free State Loan we should also pass a Bill to deal with the financial liabilities of the two previous Dáils. This is "A Bill to make provision for the disposal of the property of the First Dáil Eireann and the Second Dáil Eireann, and for the redemption or discharge of the loans floated by, and the other liabilities, of the First Dáil Eireann and the Second Dáil Eireann." I move for the leave of the Dáil to introduce this Bill.

MINISTER for EXTERNAL AFFAIRS (Mr. Desmond Fitzgerald): I beg to second.

Question put and agreed to. Second Reading Stage ordered for Thursday, 6th December.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS BILL, 1923.—FIRST STAGE.

Mr. THOMAS JOHNSON: In asking the leave of the Dáil to introduce this Bill I desire to make a few preliminary observations describing the scope of the Bill, so that I can, with confidence, ask the Dáil to give it a First Reading. It is a Bill that fulfils, or attempts to fulfil, the promises of many people, not only upon these benches, but on other benches. It is a Bill, which if passed, will mean the Nationalisation of the Irish Railways, and the co-ordination of all the transport services of the country, including all communications, that is to say, railways, canals, roads, postal service, aerial communication and the like. It will be said that this is a considerable undertaking, and I agree it is; but it is not proposed in the Bill that all this work of co-ordination will be accomplished on a given date.

It is intended, shortly, that there shall be established a Ministry of Transport and Communication, and that that Ministry will be responsible to the Oireachtas for all the Departments that come within its scope, including posts and postal services. It would eventually mean the absorption of the Ministry of Posts and Telegraphs into the Ministry of Transport and Communication. It is intended that the railway undertakings shall be transferred on appointed dates to the care and charge of the Ministry of Transport. The Minister for Transport will be responsible to the Oireachtas. He may or may not be, as may be decided, a member of the Dáil. He will be a Minister, not a member of the Executive Council. The actual management of the railways will be undertaken by a Director of Railways, who will be in supreme command of the actual workings, subject to the Minister of Transport and Communication. The Director of Railways will be assisted and advised by a Council, or Board, representative of the interests concerned in the railway traffic, agriculture, commerce, manufacture and workers generally and the Treasury. The intention is that the transfer shall be on a basis to be fixed by a tribunal consisting of three persons, the chairman being one who has held a high judicial office and two competent accountants, one of whom shall be nominated by, or approved by, the railway companies.

It is intended that railway stock will be issued by the State in exchange for present holdings, the stock being either in the form of redeemable stock certificates carrying $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. or terminable annuity certificates carrying $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for the first five years and $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for sixty-seven years. The financial effect of this option upon the State being identical, terminable annuity certificates being probably in many cases desired by the present stock holders, in other cases the redeemable certificates at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. with $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. of Sinking Fund being preferred. It is proposed that the tribunal to be set up to decide the price at which the railways will be taken over by the State will determine the value according to all the circumstances, but imposing upon the tribunal a maximum price, such maximum to be based upon the average profits earned and distributed during the five years preceding 1914. It is calculated that the railways will by this means be enabled to carry on in such a manner as will allow of a reduction in railway charges, improvement in the services, dealing fairly with stock-holders, and generally serving the interests both of the community as a whole and the industrial, agricultural, and passenger interests at the same time. It is proposed to set up a rates tribunal, a rates tribunal being a semi-independent body whose functions will be to fix rates in such a manner as will pay the charges without seeking any margin. The rates tribunal proposition is one which, I think, should commend itself to all agricultural and industrial interests. It is proposed also that charges upon county councils or baronies in respect of those railways which have been guaranteed shall be removed and that the county councils shall be relieved of any liability in respect of their guarantees. The position of the employees of the railway companies is safeguarded on much the same lines as have been agreed upon and decided by the recent Bill passed in Great Britain touching the amalgamation of the companies over there. It is intended that, so far as respects the railways over which at present the Oireachtas has no jurisdiction, the date of transfer to the State shall be deferred until a decision is taken as to the transfer of those railways or such portion of them as may be decided upon.

The Bill, if it receives the First Reading, will be printed and a memorandum will be circulated with it describing succinctly the intentions of the Bill. I may say that we have been living for a year in expectation that the Government would have introduced a Bill to deal with railways in the Saorstát. That hope has not been fulfilled yet, and we have sought therefore to fill the gap and to submit such a Bill as we would reasonably expect the Government, not a Labour Government, might themselves introduce.

This, I may tell the Dáil, is not a Bill which fulfils all the equities, as I would conceive them. It is very generous in its interpretation of the rights of stockholders. It is such a Bill as might, without any stretch of imagination, have been introduced by Deputy Hewat combined with Deputy Gorey. It is not, as I say, a Bill which fulfils all the equities as I conceive them, but it is a Bill designed to secure general support. Certainly such a Bill as I would like to see enacted would require a considerable period of education of the public, and the circumstances of the day do not justify, perhaps, experiments of a kind which might be risky. In introducing the Bill we have sought to avoid extravagances or experiments which would lead the public or members of the Dáil to shy off because of its experimental nature. If the Bill is granted a First Reading, as I confidently hope, I would ask the Dáil and the Government to consider very carefully the proposals of the Bill, and perhaps one may hope that it may even be taken over as a Government measure after the Second Reading.

We recognise quite clearly that a Bill of this kind, imposing a charge upon the State, cannot get beyond a Second Reading unless the Government is prepared to move the Financial Resolution which is requisite. I plead at least for careful consideration of the proposals of this Bill, and if it cannot be taken over as a whole that it will be considered as a serious attempt to meet the transport problem and a serious proposal for the co-ordination of all those services which are requisite to carry on the trade, commerce and social life of the community, those services of transport and communication. So far from the Bill being a real charge upon the community it will be, as I contend, a valuable asset, and will enable the credit of the community to stand higher, so that future loans may be floated on more favourable terms for the State. I beg to move that leave be granted to introduce "A Bill to provide for the acquisition by the State of Railways in Saorstát Éireann, for the management of such Railways and the Post Office, and for the co-ordination of Road, Motor, Aerial and other transport services and for purposes connected therewith."

Mr. DAVIN: I second the motion.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: It is not proposed to oppose the First Reading of this Bill. The feeling is that a Bill about which so many fine things have been said, and said at such length, ought to come into the hands of Deputies and that they should have their curiosity with regard to it satisfied. But Deputy Johnson made a somewhat longer statement than is usual on a First Reading, and I want to make it clear that the decision not to oppose the First Reading is very much without prejudice.

Question put and agreed to. Second Stage ordered for Wednesday, December 5th.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ELECTORS REGISTRATION BILL, 1923.

SECOND STAGE.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. Burke): I beg to move the Second Reading of the Local Government Electors Registration Bill. I was obliged to make a Second Reading statement when introducing this Bill last Wednesday, so that I have not very much new to add to what I said on that occasion. The object of this Bill is to legalise the position with regard to the preparation of the Register for Local Government electors. If the letter of the law had been complied with, this

Register should have come into force on the 15th October, but the Electoral Bill does not apply to Local Government electors, and the Representation of the People Act is to that extent still in operation. Owing to the dissolution of the Dáil, to the high pressure of other legislative duties, and to the fact that in actual practice it has been found impossible to prepare a Register in the period elapsing between the 15th July, the end of the qualifying period under the Representation of the People Act, and the 15th October, the Register did not come into operation. Accordingly it now devolves upon us to amend the Representation of the People Act retrospectively, that is, by fixing a date later than the 15th July as the date for the end of the qualifying period, and for the beginning of the Register of Local Government electors. The Electoral Act fixes November 15th as the date for the beginning of the Register of Dáil electors, and that is the obvious date for starting the preparation of the Register of Local Government electors also. It is obvious from the point of view of time, since it is certainly to the interest of all of us to have this Local Government Register compiled as soon as possible, obvious from the point of view of economy, since otherwise additional expenditure will have to be incurred in the way of paying officials for double work, double travelling, and for double printing. I can see no valid reason why those two Registers should not be compiled at the same time, and if any Deputy does see a reason, I think the onus is on him to prove it.

MINISTER for EXTERNAL AFFAIRS (Mr. Fitzgerald): I second the motion.

Question put and agreed to.

Third Stage ordered for Wednesday, December 5th.

LOCAL ELECTIONS POSTPONE- MENT (AMENDMENT) BILL, 1923.

SECOND STAGE.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. Burke): I beg to move the Second Reading of the Local Elections Postponement (Amendment) Bill. This Bill, as is obvious to everybody, does not necessarily of itself postpone the Local Government elections beyond January 1st: all it does is to give power to do so if circumstances make it necessary. The fact that the new register will not be in force by that date, the fact that a large portion of the current rate is still outstanding, and that an election held at present would give an excuse to defaulters for withholding payment still longer and thus put an unfair burden on newly elected bodies, and also the fact that several emergency measures, such as the Local Authorities Indemnity Bill which, amongst other things, protects local authorities from surcharges for acts done under the authority of the old Dáil are reasons why this Bill should, if possible, be passed before asking people to incur the responsibility of seeking election to these public bodies. All these facts constitute, I believe, a sufficient argument for not having the Local Government elections before January 1st, even if Deputies were agreed that the Christmas holidays is a convenient time to hold such elections. One Deputy complained that this election is hanging like the Sword of Damocles over the heads of the representatives of local bodies, but it might be well for all of us occasionally to reflect that that is a condition incidental to public life in general, and is not confined to representatives of local bodies.

Another Deputy has complained that in this Bill no mention has been made of a change in the franchise. Now, such a change is one of the most fundamental and revolutionary acts that any Government can undertake, and would cut right across the whole field of local government administration. Before making such a change, it should certainly be very well weighed and long considered. For me, at this stage, to introduce such a revolutionary measure in this perfunctory manner, after being scarcely a month in office, would amount to little less than an insult to every Deputy. This Bill is a purely emergency measure. It is not intended in any way to be contentious, and I hope to get it through without any opposition. That being so, it would be very illogical for me to confuse the issue by introducing any contentious matter.

Mr. D. FITZGERALD: I second the motion.

Mr. CORISH: Would the Minister, at this stage, give any indication when the elections might be held, and as to whether it is his intention to have County Council, Urban District, and Corporation and Rural District Council elections on the one day? That appears to be the interpretation taken by the people in the country. If that were so, I think it would be disastrous, and confusion would arise. These elections heretofore were held on different dates.

Mr. BURKE: I do not think that really fits conveniently into the discussion. I have not been able to fix on any period for holding these elections. It depends on how I fare after getting certain Bills through. It is generally admitted that local government at present is not in a satisfactory condition. Some people blame the personnel, and some the system. It is not much use holding an election until we are sure that the bodies returned will give satisfaction. If in the meantime we find that it will be necessary to change the system and to find some means of changing the personnel we will be obliged to do so.

Mr. CORISH: I am quite prepared to admit that this does not arise at the moment, but in this Bill the 4 o'clock Minister is given certain powers. I do not think it is too much to ask whether or not it is his intention to hold the County Council and Urban Council elections on the one day, because I believe it will lead to a lot of confusion if he does.

Mr. BURKE: I will consider the representation. I presume the usual procedure will be carried out in this case.

Mr. WILSON: I can plainly conceive that the reasons given by the Minister are sufficient for the postponement of the elections, but when passing the Local Government (Temporary Provisions) Bill we passed Clause 14, which specified that no person should hold an office of profit under a local authority until after an election held after the passing of that Act. At the time we passed that provision we understood an election would have taken place in September or October, but now, for reasons which it is not for me to state, the election is to be postponed for probably another year. I contend it is not right that any member of a public board should be at present in a position of holding an office of profit when he is at the same time a member of the board, in a position of master, an employee of himself, and in a position to grant the man who is supervising him a rise of salary. That is what is taking place. If the Minister would amend Clause 14 of the Local Government (Temporary Provisions) Act No. 9 so that no person shall hold any office of profit under, or be employed for remuneration by, any local authority of which he is a member, then we would be quite satisfied.

Then it goes on: "from and after the holding of an election or appointment of members of such local authority next held after the passing of this Act." That is the law at the moment, so that at present a person can be a member of a local body and, at the same time, receive payment from that body. I do not think that is right. While this Bill legalises a number of irregularities, we never conceived that that sort of thing would be continued for such a long period.

Mr. BURKE: The Deputy's question opens up a very wide field of discussion, and I think it would fit in better in a Bill that I will be bringing in later on for remedying the whole system of Local Government. I do not think that it is quite true to say that this Bill postpones the election for twelve months. It does not give that power, and I do not believe that it will be anything like that period.

Mr. WILSON: Does the Minister not agree that a condition under which a man can be a member of a public board and still be employed by that board should be put an end to at the earliest possible moment?

Mr. BURKE: That actually cannot happen.

Mr. WILSON: I have not got a legal mind, but I think if I read it again the Minister will see that it can happen. It is happening at present, and I can give instances of it. I know several members of local boards working for local authorities of which they are members. The Section reads: "No person shall hold any office of profit under, or be employed for remuneration by or under any local authority from and after the holding of an election or appointment of members of such local authority next held after the passing of this Act." Does that not mean that he can hold it until the election after the passing of this Act? There has been no election since.

Mr. GOREY: I think this is a case for the Attorney-General.

Mr. BURKE: I do not think the Deputy has read the whole Section.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: We ought not to hear the Section any more. We know the Section well enough.

Mr. WILSON: What is the position then if a person is the holder of an office of profit under an authority of which he is a member? How does it come that the Local Government Department do not remove him from the office of profit if it is not permissible under this Section?

Mr. JOHNSON: My complaint in this matter is just the contrary. The Local Government Department has, as a matter of fact, been disqualifying members, at least workmen employed by one local authority from being members of another local authority, notwithstanding the fact that there is a saving clause in the Bill.

It seems to me that in view of the attempt to postpone the elections still further the operation of the law as it stands—not the law as Deputy Wilson reads it—is depleting the local boards of useful members without being able to put others in their places. The Government are, as a matter of fact, by the carrying out of the law as it stands, interpreting it as they are doing, depriving the local authorities of the assistance and help of qualified members and postponing the chances of replacing those members by others who may be as competent to carry on their operation. I would suggest that the proviso in the Act that is referred to should be made to read that until the new franchise and the new Local Government Bill is passed the present members of the councils should be allowed to continue to sit.

Major COOPER: I wish to ask you, a Chinn Chomhairle, whether it would be in order for Deputy Wilson to put down an amendment on the Committee Stage dealing with this question.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I think I had occasion to remark a few days ago that it was a very unsafe thing to give one's ruling in advance. I should have to consider this Bill and Deputy Wilson's amendment very carefully before I could say that the amendment would be in order on the Committee Stage. I think the Deputy's proposed amendment aims at amending the existing Electoral Act.

Mr. WILSON: Exactly; it does. But I have shown the Minister the necessity for this amendment, having regard to the fact that the elections are to be postponed. I know that the register will not be ready for six months, and we will be having the elections probably next June or July.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. O'Higgins): Deputy Wilson has succeeded admirably in causing a certain amount of confusion. At no time could a member of a public body, a member of a local authority, be in the employment or be in contractual relations with a public body of which he was a member. The provision in the Act went somewhat further, and stated that a member of a local authority could not be an employee of another local authority in the same or an adjoining county. That means that an official of the Dublin County Council could not be a member of the Dublin Corporation, and vice versa. Not in my memory, at any rate, has there ever been the position in which a member of a specific local authority could be in the employment of that local authority or be in contractual relations with that local authority.

Mr. WILSON: It exists at the moment. I can give instances.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: If it exists, it exists outside the law, and there is a remedy for it.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: I would like to ask the Minister for Local Government if I am to understand from his statement, that in the event of the Local Government elections being postponed until September 30th, some steps will be taken by his Department to prevent the mal-administration and waste of public money that is going on at the present time owing to the inefficiency of the present boards in control of the different Councils throughout the country?

Mr. BURKE: If the Deputy was keeping in touch with the daily Press, I think he would see that very drastic remedies are being adopted in some cases.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: I do not think it is right to refer me to the daily Press for my information. I would like if I could get a more definite statement from the Minister for Local Government.

Question put and agreed to.

Third stage ordered for Wednesday, December 5th.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES (INDEMNITY) BILL, 1923.—SECOND STAGE.

MINISTER FOR LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. Burke): I beg to move the Second Reading of the Local Authorities (Indemnity) Bill, 1923. I think most Deputies are familiar with the facts that led up to the situation this Bill is intended to remedy. During the period that elapsed between the summer of 1920 and the coming into operation of the Treaty two authorities were struggling for supreme control of Local Government in Ireland. You had on the one hand the British Local Government Board, supported by British law and by British bayonets, and on the other hand the Irish Local Government Department, supported by public opinion, by the Dáil Courts and by the Irish Republican Army. Throughout the territory at present comprised in the Irish Free State, and in some areas outside it, the public bodies were almost unanimous in giving their allegiance to the Irish Local Government Department. In order to make for continuity of administration it was necessary for the Dáil Local Government Department to adopt the greater portion of the legal code of the British Local Government Board. Accordingly, by decree number I. of the First Session of 1921 the Dáil enacted as follows:

[Mr. Burke.]

"It is hereby declared that the Local Government code of law in operation in Ireland up to and including the 17th day of September, 1920, be and is hereby adopted, subject to such amendment and alteration as may be directed by order of the Local Government Department of Dáil Eireann, with the approval of the Minister, such order or orders to be ratified at the first meeting of the Dáil following the making of same."

Mr. JOHNSON: I take it that is in the position of a State document. Will it be laid on the Table, or circulated to Deputies? I think it is customary that when a document of the kind is quoted it shall be made available for Deputies.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: If a public document is quoted from it should be made available for Deputies unless the Minister argued that in the public interest it should not be made available.

Mr. BURKE: I have no objection to making it available.

Mr. JOHNSON: I hope that as the Ministry is making that document available, it will also make available all the Decrees issued by these bodies.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is another matter, I am afraid.

Mr. BURKE: That does not come within the provisions of this Bill. Under the powers conferred by this Decree orders were issued, inconsistent with the ordinary Local Government Statutes, by the Dáil Local Government Department to local authorities throughout the country. I may say that the British Local Government Board offended in a similar way against its own Statutes. Owing to the circumstances under which this Department was carried on, it was not always possible to conform to these regulations in issuing these Orders, which are usually and properly associated with the administration and legislation of Government Departments.

Owing to the deficiency and imperfection of the records of the period, it is very difficult to verify these orders by legal evidence. The following are a few examples of the kind of illegalities which arose out of the situation, and which this Bill is intended to remedy. To begin with, superannuation granted by local authorities as a general rule required to be sanctioned by the British Local Government Board. The local bodies who gave their allegiance to Dáil Eireann were unable and unwilling to ask for such sanction, and accordingly sanction was not given. Most of those acts were sanctioned by the Dáil Local Government Department, but evidence of such sanction is not always to be found.

The same situation arises with regard to loans and to increases of salaries. The present position is that all such payments were illegal payments and must be surecharged by the auditor. Moreover, any rates struck on estimates of which such extra legal payment formed a part, are illegal and may be quashed on certiorari. Other difficulties arise owing to the fact that certain officials refused to carry out the orders of Dáil Eireann, and consequently local authorities were asked to undertake duties which were outside their statutory powers. For example, County Councils were asked to begin the preparation of a Register through their Secretaries, although this was a duty for the Clerk of the Crown and Peace, and, ultra vires, of the Council. Several acts of a similar kind were committed.

Another difficulty arose owing to the fact that because of the passing of the Criminal Injuries Act by the British Parliament, it became necessary for local authorities to conceal the whereabouts of their funds. The Dáil ordered those authorities to transfer their funds from their local treasurer to un-named trustees. The present position actually is that all such transfers were illegal and must be surcharged against the individuals concerned. To enforce such surcharges would be obviously unfair and unjust. At the same time, if we remit all those surcharges under this Bill, there will be no means of coming at those individuals who have been guilty of misappropriation. Efforts have been made unsuccessfully to find some test or criterion other than the Minister's simple approval of the legality of those acts which it is intended to regularise. So many different kinds of acts are involved and so many grounds for illegalities exist, and, as I said before, the documentary evidence of records is so imperfect, it has been found necessary to ask for those powers, admittedly very wide, in order to clear up the confusion.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I beg to second.

Mr. CORISH: The other day, on the introduction of the Bill, I asked the Minister if it would make any provision to have County Councils indemnified against any claim rate-collectors might have against them because of the fact that they refused to carry out the duties they were asked to carry out in 1920. He has pointed out that in that period, soon after the County Council elections, garnishee orders were secured against County Councils and other bodies with a view to securing payments in respect of claims for malicious injuries. An order was sent from the Dáil Local Government Department ordering County Councils to change their funds from the National Bank, as it was in many cases, to trustees whose names were not disclosed. Speaking for Co. Wexford, I know that that order was carried out immediately. We were also told to ask rate-collectors if they were prepared to carry out any instructions in that direction, and if they were not prepared to do that we should inform them that we were not in a position to superannuate them.

I was closely in touch with the thing all the time in Co. Wexford, and I am aware that all but four men refused to carry out the instructions. They refused to resign, but they kept their books and their homes had to be raided to secure the books. During the present year these men, through their Solicitors, made application to the County Councils for superannuation, which, I think, they are entitled to under British Law. An inquiry was held under the presidency of Mr. Justice Wylie and he made an award giving these people the maximum pension. If this is going to be carried into effect it will cost the County Council something in the vicinity of 3d. in the £. I would like to know definitely if the Minister has power to prevent the payment of this. I do not think it is fair to ask the County Councils; who carried out definite instructions, to pay those people, and it is not fair to encourage those people, who refused to help the Council when we were in the throes of the war with the British.

If it is absolutely mandatory that these people should get superannuated, the matter should be considered under the financial clauses of the Treaty, or whatever Article of the Treaty makes provision for the compensation of certain officials. At any rate this should not be a local charge.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Minister in his opening statement quoted from the decree of the Dáil Ministry of three or four years ago, and promised that having quoted it, it would be circulated.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: He promised it would be made available.

Mr. JOHNSON: I hope that any other decrees issued by that authority will be made available. It has been very difficult to obtain access to those decrees, and if one decree can be made the basis of a Bill, other decrees may, for all we know, affect our consideration of this Bill. There may have been decrees contradictory to the first decree. In any case, if they are to be considered as part of the Governmental Acts of the last few years, they ought to be available to the members of the Dáil and the public.

Now, the Bill before us seeks, on behalf of the Local Government Ministry, to make valid any act of the local authority, or to remit any penalty that may have been incurred by the failure to carry out any duty that was imposed upon the local authority during certain years. It seems to me that complementary to this Bill, and it ought to be part of the Bill, there should be a provision of this kind, that any act of a local authority which was validated by the Minister at the time should be considered to be valid, and ought not to be annullable, if that is a word which is allowable, by the present Minister without authority. I am referring to the decisions that were taken by the local authority in regard to payments for services rendered to those local authorities by employees of those local authorities.

Proposals were made and orders given which were sanctioned by the Minister for Local Government, and on that sanction being given, rates of pay for nurses and others were fixed. The Minister comes along to-day and says notwithstanding the fact that the local authority was acting in accordance with its powers, and that it submitted its proposals to the Ministry for Local Government at the time, and those proposals were sanctioned by the Minister for Local Government at the time, those decisions are now being declared invalid and annulled by the present Minister for Local Government, or by the late Minister for Local Government. I submit that there should be embodied in this Bill, and it should be complementary to the proposals in the Bill, that where the Minister for Local Government validated an action of the local authorities in this period, from the 31st March, 1920, to the 6th December, 1922, that these decisions of the existing Local Government Minister should be declared in this Bill to be valid. It seems to me that that is a reasonable proposition, and ought, on the face of it, to be acceptable. I hope the Minister, in reply, will intimate to the Dáil that he is prepared to accept or embody in the Bill on the next Reading some Clause to that effect.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I would like to say a few words on the point raised by Deputy Corish, because I have some special, intimate knowledge of the state of affairs that existed in the Local Government sphere in the year 1920. The position of rate collectors throughout the country, after the break with the British Local Government Board, was an extremely difficult one, and one that I had considerable sympathy with, although, in the position I occupied at the time, I could not give rein to that sympathy. Here were men who had entered into bonds, men who had gone to their friends and neighbours and asked them to stand as their securities, and because a political movement arose in the country advocating a certain course, with which they might or might not be personally in agreement, they were invited by their local authorities to act in a manner contrary to the bonds into which they had entered, and contrary to the law as it stood, without any real confidence that that law and the authority behind it would ultimately be upset and overwhelmed. Now, naturally we brought considerable pressure, amounting almost to compulsion, on these people. Naturally we fulminated against them, against their treachery and disloyalty, and against their unpatriotic conduct, and so on. But all the time anyone with a real grasp of the situation knew that from the human point of view these men were in a serious predicament. Some of them may not have been thinking entirely of themselves. They were probably thinking a good deal of those who had been so good to them as to become their sureties. And while a man might be willing to incur considerable loss himself, he is less willing to involve in loss people who had befriended him.

That was the situation, and that was the position of the rate collectors, and most of the rate collectors through the country gave trouble. Most of them hung back in dismay at this extra-legal course which they were expected to take. Some of them were dismissed, until we found that it was bad business to dismiss them. We found the following week in the local papers a notice from the Local Government Board warning the people against paying to the new rate collectors, and pointing out to them that they might find themselves in the position of having to pay again to a duly and legally appointed rate collector. A good many anomalies cropped up in the course of that struggle and a good many points of friction arose. But it does not become us, who, after all, won that struggle, to try and go back now and in any way victimise or in any way lean against the people with whom we had differences. And now at any rate, if not then when the strife was on, we should realise that these men were placed in a very difficult position indeed, and we should realise that not all the country was Sinn Féin, not all the country approved of the course that we were taking, and that the rate collector as much as anyone else was entitled to his individual views. There was the further fact of his bond, the consideration which he ought to have for his sureties. That is his side of the thing, and I am putting it because the other side has been put so strongly by Deputy Corish. I am putting it also because I cannot be expected to have any considerable amount of sympathy with these people who are causing the President and myself, in the position we held then, the utmost embarrassment.

I take it that Deputy Corish is speaking from a brief, from the point of view of his own particular Local Authority, which is in danger of being mulcted to compensate people who, as he would put it, and the members of his Local Authority would put it, let them down in the past. That would be a matter which I suggest Deputy Corish should take up with the Minister for Local Government. But I stand for this, that either by the Local Authority or the Central Authority those men should be compensated, and there should be no victimisation now, and no leaning against these men now. They were simply the victims of circumstances. They had their own views at the time. But we won that struggle, and we should not be ungenerous now, and advocate or give any countenance to a policy of vae victis.

Mr. CORISH: It is not my intention at all to do these people out of any remuneration if they were deserving of it. I say that that was a national matter, and the local authorities should not be called upon to pay it. It has created a great amount of discontent. Deputy Doyle knows that we had great difficulty with it in the Co. Council, and that we had difficulty in preventing the whole Council from resigning over the matter.

Mr. GOREY: May I ask if the same conditions do not obtain in other County Councils. Were not these matters dealt with by other County Councils and if they have discharged these obligations and liabilities why should not Wexford do the same? If there is to be a central fund, I hold it should be a central fund for all.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: There were not many cases. There were a few cases like that of the late Town Clerk of Dublin and a few others, and I have no doubt the Minister for Local Government will consider the matter as an External Minister. Each case will be considered upon its merits, and in all such cases the Minister can make representation to the Executive Council or to the Minister for Finance. It is not a matter on which you can lay down any hard and fast rule.

Mr. MICHAEL DOYLE: I can bear out fully the statement made by Deputy Corish. We carried out the orders which we received from the Dáil as faithfully as they could be carried out by any county, and we carried them out within six inches of British bayonets. I do not for one moment want to deprive the Rate Collectors who did not do the work of their rights, or to do them any injustice; but if they are to be compensated it is not fair to mulct the County Wexford ratepayers for this compensation. Their representatives did this, and did it to the best of their ability and in good faith, under the instructions of the Dáil at that time, and I hold it would be a great injustice to the ratepayers to be asked now to compensate these men. They should be compensated from a national fund, if there is such a thing, or the money should be found from some national sources. The ratepayers should not be mulcted, and if we in County Wexford thought at the last meeting of the County Council that the ratepayers were to be mulcted in this sum because they faithfully abided by the decision of the Dáil at the time, not a single member would have remained a member of the Council for five minutes. It was with the greatest difficulty, and only after the greatest persuasion from the Chairman, that we induced the Council to hold on until the matter was considered here in the Dáil. The whole Council would have resigned otherwise. Probably the Minister might say that would be a good thing, but we in Wexford do not think so, because the Council has done its duty, and is doing its duty at the present time.

Mr. P. HOGAN (Clare): In view of the statement of the Minister and that it is proposed to compensate those officials referred to, may I ask if there is any provision in the Bill to compensate those whose services were dispensed with under amalgamation schemes carried out by different public bodies. Is there any provision to recompense those whose services had been dispensed with two years ago, and who have not yet received superannuation?

Mr. BURKE: It is provided under the Local Government (Temporary Provisions) Act. In regard to the question raised by Deputy Corish, of course, each one of these cases will be taken on its merits, and evidence will have to be gone into before we can come to a final decision upon each. I believe it is necessary to compensate those from one source or another if we are to carry out the spirit of the Treaty. Speaking for myself, I must say I am in entire sympathy with the attitude taken up by Deputy Doyle, and Deputy Corish and, as an External Minister, I will bring the matter before the Minister for Finance. If Deputy Johnson brings up his amendment I will be prepared to consider it on its merits.

Mr. JOHNSON: Would it be in order for me to frame an amendment of the character indicated?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I am afraid nobody but a member of the Executive Council could carry an amendment which would put a charge upon the State; that would even include the Minister for Local Government, who would have to persuade the Minister for Finance before he could put forward such a proposal.

Mr. BURKE: Well, then the matter is out of my hands. I cannot deal with it further.

Question: "That the Bill be read a second time" put and agreed to.

Third Stage ordered for Thursday, 6th December.

DAIL IN COMMITTEE.

CIVIL SERVICE REGULATION (No. 2) BILL, 1923.

THIRD STAGE.

SECTION 1.

(1) It shall be lawful for the Executive Council from time to time to appoint fit and proper persons to be Civil Service Commissioners (in this Act referred to as "the Commissioners") to fulfil the functions assigned to such Commissioners by this Act.

(2) The number of such Commissioners shall not at any time be more than three.

(3) Every person appointed under this section to be a Commissioner shall hold office during the pleasure of the Executive Council.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I ask leave to take my two amendments together. They are (1) in sub-section (2) line 23, to delete the words "not at any time," and (2) In sub-section (2) line 24 to delete the words "more than." The object of these amendments is to establish the principle that there shall always be three Commissioners. Under the Bill as it stands, it would be possible that there might be merely one Commissioner, and that is a matter to which the Civil Service, in so far as their views are represented by the Civil Service Federation, attach considerable importance.

They feel that though they are beyond the reach of examination themselves that recruitment of the service is a matter of considerable importance to them both as regards the efficiency of their work and as regards the prestige of the service, and they are anxious to preserve this independence and the independence of the Civil Service Commissioners as far as possible. I think the amendment has another point in its favour, and it is that we have in this country two systems certainly not hostile, not conflicting, but slightly divergent types of University education, the system represented by Trinity and the system represented by the National University. It is desirable, I think, that one of the Commissioners should represent each of these points of view, and that the third Commissioner, attached to neither school, should act as arbiter between them. I ask the Minister for Finance if he will consider, and make it quite clear in the Bill, that the normal number of Commissioners should be three instead of "not more than" three; and also if he will secure that under no circumstances will this vast and considerable power be entrusted to one Commissioner only.

Mr. JOHNSON: On a point of order, I desire to ask if there is not some mistake about amendment 1. If it were passed it would read that the number of Commissioners should be more than three.

Major COOPER: As I have already stated, Amendment 2 is being taken with amendment 1.

Mr. JOHNSON: But supposing amendment 1 is passed, and amendment 2 is not passed?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The two amendments are being taken together, and Deputy Johnson must direct his attention to the effect of their being passed or negatived together.

Professor MAGENNIS: Would I be in order to ask Deputy Bryan Cooper to what exactly he refers when he speaks of two divergent types of education as represented by Trinity College and the National University of Ireland so divergent as to require two separate Commissioners to represent them?

Major COOPER: I thought it was common knowledge, but, if the Deputy contradicts me, I will take his word for it, because I had not the advantage of a University education. I have read that there is a certain peculiar mould into which Trinity, at any rate, casts its Graduates, and I assume that the National University, though young, is in process of acquiring a somewhat similar, but not identical, mould. I expressly said that there was no hostility between the two Universities, but you might have a difference in point of view, and I think it would be undesirable if one Commissioner, representing one University, were to be appointed to the exclusion of the other.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. Blythe): I do not propose to accept the amendment. The volume of work which the Commissioners will have to carry out will be small, comparatively. Even at the present time, when there are arrears of work to be undertaken, the work of the Civil Service Commissioners is very much part-time work. As a matter of fact, at the present time, the work is being carried out by three Commissioners who have other responsibilities and greater responsibilities, and it is possible for them to do it. When we have settled down, the holding of examinations, at regular intervals, will be, for the most part, the work of the Commission, and will require a very small amount of time from the Commissioners themselves, and consequently, from the point of view of the volume of work, there is nothing to be said for binding ourselves to three. It might quite well be desirable in the future that we would rather have one than three, and I do not see that we need actually bind ourselves to any particular number. We might very well be able to get on with two, and in fact we might cease to employ Civil Service Commissioners at all, and get in people from outside. It may not be desirable then that we should actually have three, because the question of remuneration in that case might be a somewhat serious one. I think there is going to be no disposition to make the Civil Service Commission other than a reasonable body or a reasonable institution, to carry on the work which is to be carried on, and I think we may leave it to the Government, or to the Executive Council that may be in existence at any particular time, to make the best arrangements they can for the carrying out of that work. It seems to me to be entirely wrong to take up the point of view, as some Deputies appear to do, that the Civil Service Commissioners

[Mr. Blythe.] will continually have to fight the Government of the day. I think that point of view is entirely fallacious and that we should not act on it. If we are not going to have Governments that will observe the letter and also the spirit of the law, I think we will not be able to have our Civil Service what it ought to be, and I think that we will gain nothing by trying to hedge round these Civil Service Commissioners with too many precautions and safeguards.

The Bill provides in this Section the machinery for holding examinations, and for the holding of them with fair and reasonable safeguards. I think we ought to take the point of view that every Government, and not alone the Civil Service Commissioners, will desire to have its Civil Service recruited so that it will get the best possible material, and that it will give an equal and a fair opportunity to all classes of citizens, and one also that will make the arrangements that may be necessary to have the work done efficiently. For that reason I see no need for specifying three in particular. There is a reason for specifying that there should not be more than three, because there may be a question of salaries and charges, and I think it is necessary to limit the maximum number. I see no reason for fixing a minimum number, and I really look upon this amendment as one that is unnecessary, and one that might tie up the hands of the Executive for making what it may regard as the best arrangement, from time to time, for carrying on the work of the Civil Service Commission.

Major COOPER: I desire to ask for leave to withdraw the two amendments.

Amendments, one and two, by leave withdrawn.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I beg to move as an amendment to delete subsection (3), and to add at the end of the Section a new sub-section as follows:—

“The office of any person appointed under this section to be a Commissioner may be vacated by resignation in writing under his hand, but failing such resignation no Commissioner shall be removed from his office save for incapacity or physical or mental infirmity, or misbehaviour in office or misconduct, which shall be certified under the hand of the Minister for Finance. It shall be the duty of the Minister for Finance to give such certificate in case he is satisfied that such incapacity or infirmity exists or that such misbehaviour or misconduct has taken place. No such certificate shall be questioned or made the subject of proceedings in any Court.”

In moving this, I have, first of all, to apologise to the Minister and to the Dáil for a mis-statement I made in my speech on the Second Reading. I said I was under the impression that in England the Commissioners do not hold office permanently. My memory misled me, but that is not to be wondered at when one has to read eight or nine Bills in a few days. Now, with regard to this question, I was told by Deputy Johnson on the Second Reading that I was exaggerating the importance of the Civil Service Commission, and that they were really only persons for conducting examinations. I do not think that is entirely correct, because of an answer to a question which I put to the Minister for Home Affairs to-day. I did not put the question for that purpose, but in his answer he stated that “before appointment to the permanent Civil Service candidates will be required to satisfy the Civil Service Commissioners that their character and health are satisfactory.”

Besides conducting examinations, the Commissioners will have to inquire into the character and health of the candidates. That means that they will have to arrange for the holding of a medical examination, and will require to have a certificate of character from some person knowing the candidate, such as a clergyman. If it were only a question of conducting examinations, I have sat for a good many examinations with varying success, and I can assure Deputy Johnson that it makes a good deal of difference as to who sets the examination papers. If I were to imagine the ghastly possibility that all members of the Dáil had to pass an examination in the subject, say of economics, it would, I suggest, make a big difference as to whether the papers were set by Deputy Johnson or by Deputy Gorey. The only prophecy I can make is that the Minister for Agriculture would probably be plucked by both of them. If you had the examiners selected from a certain school of thought, it would be regarded as a grievance by those educated under another system. As regards the body that selects the examiners, it is very desirable that it should be in a position of absolute independence. I am not suggesting, as Deputy Johnson assumed, that the examiners should take the status of a Judge of the High Court. I have taken a very much humbler official, the District Justice, as my model in this amendment, but the Sub-section in the Bill is modelled on a Section in the Courts of Justice Bill which gives the District Justice precisely the same immunity from removal from office. The Minister, on the Second Reading of the Bill, and also inferentially to-day, said something about Governments always acting for the best, and trying to establish the best kind of Civil Service. That is not the case in the United States of America. The Government of the United States, under the influence of the founders of the Constitution, just as we are now under the influence of the founders of this State, set up an impartial and excellent Civil Service Commission which made its appointments in the most laudable manner, and these appointments were permanent.

After the Constitution had been in existence about 40 years, there came a wild man from the West called Andrew Jackson—not Johnson—who swept out every office-holder and every Civil Service Commissioner and introduced the “spoils” system, which made every Civil Service appointment—postmaster, Customs officer and others—dependent on the support of the party which was victorious. From that day until this the United States have been struggling to free themselves from that system and have not completely succeeded. If that state of affairs can exist in the United States, which has a rather larger Irish population than the Saorstát, it might conceivably exist here. I, like the Minister, would prefer to rely on the spirit in which the Act would be administered. I have no love of paper safeguards. But when you have a paper Constitution you must have paper safeguards. The spirit of the Constitution is what counts. But when you have a Constitution on paper you must have paper safeguards. I do most earnestly ask the Minister to consider this question of making the Civil Service Commissioners immune and safe from removal upon any change of Government. I am not censuring the Government. I am expressing the most extreme confidence in it. I want to see the persons they nominate remain in office for the rest of their lives. I am perfectly sure they will make a good selection. I do not want the Commissioners, who will have to determine the different standards of examination, to go out every time there is a change of Government or any time a Government may think it necessary to reward its own supporters.

Mr. BLYTHE: I would be prepared to go a little way to meet Deputy Bryan Cooper in this matter. I would be prepared, on the Report Stage, to introduce a provision that the appointment and removal of every Civil Service Commissioner should be gazetted. That would mean that it would be assured that it would be done as a public act. There are other officials, just as important as the Civil Service Commissioners, who are removable at the pleasure of the Executive Council—the Revenue Commissioners, for instance. The Revenue Commissioners discharge extremely responsible duties, and duties in which the Executive Council might be tempted to interfere far more than in the case of the Civil Service Commissioners. The Revenue Commissioners are removable at pleasure. I do not know that what Deputy Cooper has said about the Civil Service of the United States tells against my point of view at all, which is that if you provide the machinery and system for doing things you have to rely on the Government observing the spirit of that system in using the machinery. The Government may change the system, and if you have a Government that desires to change the system it will change it in spite of any safeguards you provide. There may be reasons—very good reasons—why you would change your Civil Service Commissioners, without any question of incapacity or misconduct being involved. It might be done simply for convenience. For instance, the Ceann Comhairle, who is a Civil Service Commissioner at the moment, might cease to be Ceann Comhairle here.

He might, perhaps, be engaged in some business elsewhere in the country, which would make it difficult and perhaps costly and inconvenient for him to act as Civil Service Commissioner. Still, he could do the work and he could not be removed, although he would not be on the spot. He might not want to resign. You might have a situation of that sort. You might have a Commissioner who is a Civil Servant—say, the Secretary of the Ministry of Education. He might cease to be in the Ministry of Education and it might be considered desirable that the new Secretary of the Ministry of Education should take up his duties. Remember, that as Secretary to the Ministry of Education he is under the will and pleasure of the Executive Council, and his services can be dispensed with at any time. I think it would be somewhat absurd to have the Executive Council able to dismiss him from the lucrative position and not able to dismiss him from the honorary position. I think what I suggested might meet Deputy Bryan Cooper, that any changes in the personnel of the Civil Service Commission should be required to be mentioned in the "Gazette." That would give an opportunity to any Deputy who thought there was anything queer about the matter to have it thrashed out in the Dáil. After all, the Dáil will be the ultimate tribunal, and if it does not deal with the matter there will be no hope.

Professor MAGENNIS: Has not the Minister argued very cogently against constituting the Civil Service Commission in the way he at present contends. If the Secretary of the Ministry of Education is to be a Civil Service Commissioner, and if he is to be gazetted as removed because he has ceased to be Secretary of the Ministry of Education, it follows, I think, very clearly, that in the mind of the Minister for Finance it is an ex-officio office. I see that he dissents from that. It is true that I have over-stated the case. It is not necessarily true that it will be always an ex-officio office, but it leaves room for removing a Commissioner merely because he has ceased to hold the Secretaryship of the Education Ministry. The Minister spoke also on the last amendment as if he conceived the Civil Service Commissioners as always part-time officials. When going into this question of "the spoils to the victors" and "corruption" and all the rest, is it a good thing for the staffing of the Civil Service of the nation that the entire administration of it, on the side of determination of programmes and standards for all posts, and the conduct of examinations, should be in the hands of part-time officials? Is it desirable that these men should occupy other public offices from which they are dismissable on other grounds? It does not seem to be an ideal system to set up.

I should have preferred if the Minister had, in the interests of economy, appointed only one Commissioner and had put an Advisory Board, constituted in whatever way might be determined, at the service of such one Commissioner. The entire responsibility would then be placed upon him. I think that what he proposed leads in that direction—I mean not what he proposed officially but what he proposed in reply.

Mr. BLYTHE: I would say that if Deputy Bryan Cooper's amendment was passed it would become much more difficult to appoint one Commissioner.

Major COOPER: I am afraid I am very stupid because I am not quite convinced that because the Revenue Commissioners have been placed in a bad position, or in a position they should not be placed in, the Civil Service Commissioners should be placed in the same position. I am grateful to the Minister for meeting me—I will not say half way but one-eighth of the distance. I will withdraw the amendment on the undertaking of the Minister that he will deal with the point on the Report Stage.

Amendments 3 and 4 by leave withdrawn. Section 1 put and agreed to.

SECTION 2.

(1) Every person appointed to be a Commissioner under this Act shall receive such remuneration as the Minister for Finance shall determine.

(2) The Minister for Finance shall appoint such and so many persons as he may consider necessary to be officers of the Commissioners, and such persons shall hold office upon such terms and be remunerated at such rates and in such manner as the Minister for Finance shall determine.

(3) The remuneration of the Commissioners and their officers and such other expenses of carrying this Act into effect as may be sanctioned by the Minister for Finance shall be paid out of moneys provided by the Oireachtas.

Amendment 5. To insert before Section 2 a new Section as follows:—

“The age of retirement of all Commissioners shall be 65 years, but the Executive Council may on the advice of the Minister for Finance extend the age of retirement in the case of any Commissioner to 75 years.”

Major COOPER: This amendment is really consequential on the previous one, which I have withdrawn. It is obviously necessary where you make a Commissioner a permanent official that you should fix some retiring age, when he will become pensionable. I am not much in love with this part-time system in regard to the Commissioners. They may be too much under official influence. It would be much better to have an independent Civil Service Commission, composed of independent officials who would become pensionable at the normal pensionable age. I took the District Justice as my model and I followed the Courts of Justice Bill as far as I could. As the previous amendment has been withdrawn, I do not see that there would be any use in pressing this amendment and therefore I withdraw it.

Amendment not moved.

Major COOPER: I move:

“In sub-section (2), line 31, to delete the words ‘The Minister for Finance’ and to substitute therefor the words ‘The Commissioners, with the consent of the Minister for Finance.’”

Here I am on stronger ground, and I hope very much that the Minister will accept this amendment. Surely the ordinary staff of the Commissioners should be appointed by the Commissioners themselves. The Commissioners should appoint them because the staff have to work under them. Surely they should select the men they think most fit for the work, subject to the consent of the Minister for Finance. This would give the Minister for Finance the power of exercising his veto. As the thing stands the Minister for Finance may—I am sure in the present case he would not—appoint anybody on the staff of the Commissioners. The Commissioners might have to accept unsuitable men according to the provisions of this Bill. I think the rule in every other Government Department is that the staff is appointed by the people for whom they are to work. In practice, I suppose, the Commissioners would make recommendations to the Minister for Finance, but this should be included in the Bill. I would urge the Minister to accept this amendment.

Mr. BLYTHE: I think this amendment arises from a difference in point of view. The Minister for Finance will be the Minister responsible. He is the Minister who will answer in the Dáil. That is one aspect of it. Then it should be remembered that in the case of the Comptroller and Auditor General, where there would be a much stronger case for not vesting the appointment in the Minister for Finance, the appointment of the staff is actually vested in the Minister for Finance. The Comptroller and Auditor General is an officer, as you might say, of a much higher status than the Civil Service Commissioner. He is appointed by, and responsible to the Dáil. He is irremovable. He has the standing almost of a Judge. Yet his staff is appointed by the Minister for Finance. I think there is no case for the appointment of the staff by the Civil Service Commissioners. Then there is the other fact that you would have a part-time staff. You will have some of your staff that will be working in the Civil Service. You may have one person permanently employed in the Civil Service, others will be employed only from time to time. It is obvious they should not be appointed by the Commissioners. You would have your difficulties about putting them on to other work when not required for the work of the Civil Service Commission. I do not think that there would be any throwing of duds on the Commission, so that it would be prevented from doing its work. I do not think that could occur.

Major COOPER: Can the Minister say how the Staff of the Commissioners of Public Works are appointed? They are under the Minister for Finance? Does he appoint them?

Mr. BLYTHE: As he appoints the others. The Minister does not look for somebody himself and appoint him. He appoints people put up to him, if he is satisfied that they are competent.

Major COOPER: I do not want to press this amendment, if I get an undertaking that the point will be considered on the Report Stage and some words inserted like "on the advice of the Commissioners," or "after consultation with the Commissioners." I do not want to press the amendment, as the Minister's undertaking has done something already to meet my point. I hope he will consider the possibility of meeting the amendment. Those apprehensions I have mentioned are felt in the Civil Service, and it is desirable that they should be dispelled as soon as possible.

Mr. BLYTHE: I will consider the question of consultation with the Commissioners. There is a clause in the Ministry's Bill which says: "The Executive Council shall, on the recommendation of the Minister, appoint the principal officer of each of the said Departments, and each of the said Ministers may appoint such other officers and servants to serve in the Department of which he is the head, as such Minister may, with the sanction of the Minister for Finance, determine." This might be a case for appointment by the Executive Council, but I think it would be on the recommendation of the Minister for Finance.

Major COOPER: If the Minister considers the point again, I will withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Amendments 7 and 9 are taken together. This has given me some food for consideration. I have decided to allow amendment 7 to be moved. Amendment 9, however, brings a new class of persons within a section of the Superannuation Act which would impose a further charge for pensions on the State, and could not be moved by an ordinary member. I am, therefore, not allowing amendment 9 to be moved.

Major COOPER: I move:

In Sub-section (2), line 33, to delete all words from "upon such terms" to the end of the Sub-section, and to substitute therefor the words: "by the same tenure, and upon the same terms and conditions (including conditions as to salaries and superannuation) as other Civil Servants in the Saorstát."

Amendment 7 merely seeks to place the Staff of the Commissioners of the Civil Service in the same position as any other civil servants. It seeks to establish that they shall be entitled to all the privileges of the Civil Service and not merely liable to dismissal. The functions they have to perform are important and they should not be allowed to become the subject of undue influence. There was an American politician who said he did not care how the elections were carried on, provided he counted the votes. Those officials will have to count the marks, and it is desirable that they should be removed from the influence of candidates. If they are part-time officials they are already entitled to those rights. If you take on a man to act as Secretary to the Commission, he should have the same pensionable rights, surely, as any other civil servant. It is highly desirable that the body recruiting the Civil Service should not be inferior to any other body in the Civil Service.

Mr. BLYTHE: The intention of the Deputy is our intention, but this amendment goes a little further than he intends. The amendment talks of the same tenure, and the same terms and conditions as other civil servants in the Saorstát. There are various sorts of civil servants, and civil servants who hold varying sorts of tenure. Prison warders are civil servants for the purpose of the Superannuation Acts, and have peculiar rights. The civil servants who are transferred on a change of Government have peculiar tenure and rights. There is a further point. It is an objection to the use of the words "Civil Service." Under the Superannuation Acts, a civil servant is an officer who is entitled to a pension as holding a permanent and established post. Now the words of the amendment might tend to convert a temporary clerk or temporary typist into a person holding "a permanent and established post." I think there is no necessity for the amendment. If a person is appointed to a permanent and established post, he is entitled to superannuation, as a right, under the Superannuation Acts. The Minister for Finance, of course, is entitled to prescribe terms and conditions, just as in the case of other civil servants. I think the Staff of the Civil Service Commission will be suitable persons drawn from the Civil Service.

Major COOPER: Having obtained that assurance, I will withdraw the amendment.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

Major COOPER: The next amendment is also out of order because it conflicts with the resolution we passed yesterday, "That the sums prescribed shall be paid out of funds provided by the Oireachtas." I cannot over-rule a resolution of the Dáil without giving a certain amount of notice, and to avoid the point I will not move the amendment.

Amendment not moved.

Amendment by Major Cooper:

To add at the end a new sub-section as follows:—

(4) Subject to his being in good health at the date of his appointment, the office of a Civil Service Commissioner shall be a pensionable office within the Superannuation Acts, 1834 to 1919, and the pension, gratuity or allowances granted to or in respect of a Civil Service Commissioner on his retirement or death shall be ascertained in the manner and subject to the conditions prescribed by those Acts, and a certificate by the Minister for Finance shall be a sufficient certificate for the purpose of Section 8 of the Superannuation Act, 1859.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: This amendment cannot be moved.

Sections 2, 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

SECTION 8.

(1) The Commissioners shall conduct all examinations in Saorstát Éireann which are now by any statute required to be conducted by Civil Service Commissioners, and also shall if so required by the Executive Council conduct examinations, competitive or qualifying as the case may be, for all or any situations in the Defence Forces of Saorstát Éireann, or in the Dublin Metropolitan Police, the Civic Guard, or any other police force in Saorstát Éireann or in the service of any local authority or authorities, and all or any such other examinations as the Executive Council may from time to time require.

(2) The Commissioners may, with the consent of the Minister for Finance, from time to time make regulations for the conduct of examinations to be held by them under this section.

Major COOPER: The amendment which I have is a very small one, but it is really a drafting one, and I hope the Minister's heart will melt towards it. It is, in sub-section (1), line 31, after [Major Cooper.], the word "statute" to insert the words "or other authority," and it is to meet the case of examinations prescribed by Order in Council, or anything else of that kind. The Civil Service Commission were themselves in Great Britain created by Order in Council and not by statute, and it is just possible that under some Order in Council that we do not know of there may be some provision for examinations. I do not see that the insertion of these words can possibly injure the Bill in any way, and they leave it so that if anything of the kind is found it will not be necessary to bring in an amending Bill to deal with it.

Mr. BLYTHE: I am not able to understand the intention of the amendment, and I do not like it because I do not know what it means, or what its effect would or might be. If there is any examination which the Civil Service Commissioners were, by Order in Council, required to hold, the Executive Council could now, by Order in Council, require them to hold it; and I do not know that we ought to pass an amendment without knowing that it will serve a purpose, or what particular purpose it will serve. The particular passage, "The Commissioners shall conduct all examinations in Saorstát Éireann which are now by statute required to be conducted by the Civil Service Commissioners" was put in to cover, I think, the County Surveyors; that is, it was necessary that a man should pass a Civil Service examination before he could be appointed a County Surveyor, and this particular phrase was put in, obliging the Civil Service Commissioners to hold such examinations.

If there are any other examinations which they ought to hold, the Executive Council can direct them to do so, and I think that that is sufficient. I do not think this matters, but as I do not really know what the effect, if any, would be, I rather object to it.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE took the Chair at this stage.

Major COOPER: Will the Minister make further enquiries before the Report Stage and see if he can possibly adopt it? In that case I will withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Major COOPER: I should like to ask the Minister one question under Section 8, because it seems to lay down that the Civil Service Commissioners may institute examinations for anybody in the Civil Service, and any local authority or authorities, but in the margin it merely says County Surveyors. I think it would be a very desirable thing to have Civil Service examinations not merely for County Surveyors but for clerkships and secretaryships in local bodies, and to bring these things into the sphere of competitive examination and out of the sphere of jobbery.

Mr. BLYTHE: I think that perhaps the marginal note requires amendment, and I will look into it. There is power under the Clause to require the Commissioners to hold an examination for any position under a local authority, but I think that certain legislation will be necessary from the Local Government side to oblige a local authority to appoint persons who might pass an examination. At present the local authorities might ask the Commissioners to hold an examination, or the Executive Council might require them to do it, but when it was held the local authority might refuse to appoint the person who had passed, so that legislation from the Local Government side would be necessary before we do that.

Question—"That Section 8 stand part of the Bill"—put and agreed to.

SECTION 9.

The Minister for Finance may from time to time make regulations for controlling the Civil Service of the Government of Saorstát Éireann and providing for the classification, remuneration and other conditions and terms of service of all persons employed therein whether permanently or temporarily; and may at any time revoke or vary any such regulation.

Major COOPER: I move, in line 47, after the word "employed" to insert the words "or to be employed." This amendment is also merely a drafting one, and I hope the Minister will consider it. It is to cover the setting up of any new departments, so that conditions may be laid down in advance, and Civil Servants will know what they have to expect if they transfer to this department, or if they are going up for examination. It is merely, in case a new Government department is found necessary, that the Civil Service Commissioners will be able to make regulations in advance and people in the Civil Service will know where they are.

Mr. BLYTHE: I have looked into this and I am informed that the clause as it stands is all right. I think that the conditions and terms of the service cannot apply to anybody until he is actually employed. It is really a drafting matter and I will look into it further, but I am told that as it stands it does what Deputy Cooper has in mind.

Major COOPER: Very well, I withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Major COOPER: I move:

At the end of the section to add a new paragraph:—

Every regulation made by the Minister for Finance under this section shall be laid before each House of the Oireachtas at least one month before it becomes operative, and if both such Houses shall, within the next 21 days on which either House has sat after such regulation is laid before both Houses, pass resolutions annulling such regulation, such regulation shall be annulled."

This is an amendment laying down that all regulations made by the Minister for Finance under this Section shall be laid on the table of both Houses of the Oireachtas at least one month before they become operative, and if both Houses pass resolutions annulling them that they shall be void. I think it is necessary to have both the Dáil and the Seanad in agreement upon this. I am not trying to limit the Government unduly and it is only in a case where both the Dáil and the Seanad agree in annulling them that they will be annulled. I think we should have some cognisance of the conditions of employment in the Civil Service, and I think it is desirable that these regulations should be laid on the Table and that we should have an opportunity for discussing them.

Mr. BLYTHE: Clause 9, to which it is sought to add a new paragraph, deals with the functions of the Minister for Finance in controlling the public services. It has no relation really to the Civil Service Commission, which is purely a body for controlling the recruitment of the services. The Clause does no more than express in a statutory form the power of the Minister for Finance to control staff expenditure, both as regards the number of officers to be employed, salaries, conditions of employment, hours of service, etc. It is identical with the power vested in the Chancellor of the Exchequer under the British Government for controlling staff expenditure in the British service. The proposed addition would have the effect that the Minister for Finance could not fix the hours of service, or numbers of staff, or any matter relating to staff expenditure, without putting his proposals before the Dáil from time to time, and waiting 21 days.

It would also, of course, have the effect of giving an opportunity to the Civil Service Commissioners, or any such body, to have all sorts of such matters thrashed out in a way that would probably be satisfactory to them, but of no particular benefit to anybody else. It would enable a sort of agitation to be got up, that we know could very well be got up, and turn the Dáil into a debating society for dealing with some matters it would not be worth the while of the Dáil wasting its time on. We know we always can get people to take up any point put to them, and a good deal of time may be wasted. I think it is not desirable that the functions of the Minister for Finance in dealing with this matter of staffs, which is always a delicate and difficult matter, and which could be made a great deal more difficult by unnecessary discussions at critical junctures, should be interfered with. If the Dáil does not like the way the Minister for Finance deals with the matter, it can easily deal with the Minister for Finance. I think that is the way the matter should remain. The British arrangement, which we adopt here, is, I think, an arrangement which has worked well enough, and at any rate at present we would not be disposed to change it. If we felt after our Government had been functioning, and our services had been working for some time, it was desirable to make a change, we could and will make the change.

Major COOPER: The voice is the voice of the Minister, but the words are the words of the permanent official which I have been hearing all my life:

No Parliamentary interference with Government offices." I cannot accept the Minister's reply. I think there is a great question of principle at stake in this, and though I am loath to embarrass the Government, I will not withdraw the amendment without a more satisfactory and convincing reply.

Mr. JOHNSON: I support this amendment, and I am urged to do so by the example of very recent history. "The Minister may, from time to time, make regulations providing for the remuneration and other conditions and terms of service of all persons employed in the Civil Service." The Minister for Education made a statement the week before last, I think, which made it clear to me that in his view, and I presume in the view of the Minister for Finance, it is not only competent, but reasonable for the Minister for the time being to be able to say that a man who is to-day working for £1,000 a year, next week will work for £100 a year, that the salaries of Civil Servants may be cut down 10, 20, 30, 40, or 50 per cent., as he wishes, without any reference to the Dáil or to anybody but his own conscience. That was the implication of the statement of the Minister for Education when he said that the State was sovereign, and there was and could be no such thing as agreement or contract between the servants of the State and the State which the State could not annul at will. Something like that was implied by the statement of the Minister for Education on the discussion regarding teachers' salaries. The clause asks the Dáil to agree that the Minister for Finance may, from time to time, without any reference, or any period of suspense, declare that salaries and terms of service are alterable at his will. I do not think that that is a position we should agree to, and I think that the proposed amendment is one which would at least limit the power of the Minister in that respect. The Minister may say, as he said earlier, that the Government or the Executive Council for the time being must be trusted to use ordinary discretion, and if they cannot be so trusted they ought to be removed. That is very nice theoretically, but unfortunately the Minister may do a very unjust thing in its application to a single individual which may not warrant the dismissal of the Government. After all, I imagine we would have new Governments every week if every unjust act of the Government was followed by dismissal from office.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Question.

Mr. JOHNSON: I do not understand the interruption, whether the interrupter was asking me to keep to the question, or whether he is querying the statement I made. It is a fact that under this Section as it stands the Minister would have the power, without notice, to alter the remuneration and terms of service of any servant. That, I think, is not a power which should be continued, and consequently I support the amendment, which seeks to impose upon the Minister the obligation, before making any new regulation, that he should lay it before the Oireachtas.

Mr. O'DOHERTY: I support this amendment as I consider it is necessary. Indeed, had I the framing of it, I would go somewhat further. The whole curse of the Civil Service, so far as I have known, lay in the fact that official insolence on the part of superiors has no redress on the part of the Civil Service. To some extent the amendment provides against that. Though the present Minister for Finance would do nothing to interfere with the Civil Service, yet a new Minister may follow who would do so. I think it is well that the provision in this amendment should be accepted.

Major COOPER: I think that that support from the Government benches justifies me in pressing the amendment. Earlier in the debate the Minister asked us to rely on the spirit of Governments in future. Cannot we rely on the spirit of the Oireachtas in future? What is there wrong in suggesting that? Nothing but a manifest scandal would induce both Houses to annul a regulation of this kind. That is certain. You have got the Seanad as a conservative force and the Dáil as a democratic one. If they are both in agreement, therefore, a very strong case will have been made. It will not be a matter of a snap division. You must get both Houses. It does give some control over the proceedings of an arbitrary Minister, and that is a constitutional point of great importance. The individual Civil Servant has very little remedy against injustice. He is one man against an organised department, and the existence of this power—which may never be used, which probably never will be used—will in the last resort assist him to obtain justice.

Professor MAGENNIS: I should like to support this amendment, if only in the interests of what I have stood for so frequently here, and that is democratic control as against bureaucracy. I cannot see that anyone is aggrieved who is a permanent official or a Minister, if he is subject to what, after all, is in the spirit of the Constitution, that regulations that are practically given the force of law should, before becoming operative, have the endorsement of the Houses of Parliament.

Mr. BLYTHE: There is a certain amount of misapprehension about this, and I think it would be very undesirable that the Executive should be hampered in carrying out its executive duties in this way. We have had in the past several difficulties. We had, for instance, a very considerable difficulty in the Post Office strike of last year. I think that when we have had experience of that we should give the Executive Minister responsible the necessary authority to deal with any situation that may arise—to deal with the whole question of regulating the staff which I think is necessary to ensure that we shall not have trouble created which might not arise if we do not invite debate. Dealing with staffs, and especially with large organised staffs, is a matter of considerable difficulty. It is a matter in which you want somebody to have authority and to be able to act without leaving intervals in which all sorts of trouble might possibly be organised. I believe that the essence of democratic government is to control your Executive. It is not necessarily in curbing or limiting the functions of your Executive. It is in holding them responsible; in watching them; in deposing them if you disapprove of what they are doing. But I entirely reject the notion that there is anything essentially democratic in curbing the functions of an executive officer, especially an executive officer holding office from day to day at the will of a majority. If you had executive officers, as they have in the United States and other places, who are not responsible to a Parliament in the way that the Executive Ministers here are, who cannot be removed at any time, the way the Ministers can be removed here, there would be a case, in many instances, for limitations of powers, that are not necessary or justifiable here.

The whole idea in our Constitution is that executive functions should rest with the Executive as far as possible without limitation, and that the Executive should be held responsible. There is nothing in this that has got anything to do with matters that are at all in the nature of making legislation. It is not a matter to be threshed out here, necessarily, whether a lunch-hour shall be one and a quarter or one hour. That is a matter which the Minister for Finance should have power to deal with from time to time as he thinks desirable, and, then, if the Dáil disapproves of what he is doing, it can deal with him. But there are a multitude of matters arising that the Minister for Finance should have power to deal with, and that he should be responsible for. Even the making of arrangements about pay, about [Mr. Blythe.] numbers, or grading is a matter that ought to be left to the responsible Minister to deal with in the first instance as part of his ordinary everyday routine, and if there is disapproval of his act he can certainly be held up to criticism.

Captain REDMOND: I desire to support the amendment, and in doing so I might venture to remark that this seems to me to be one of the occasions on which the Government are unnecessarily following the British precedent. That may seem so upon the surface, but as far as I know, according to the spirit of the British system no civil servant's salary can be reduced or seriously affected without his receiving compensation and, as there is no undertaking to that effect suggested by the Minister for Finance, I think that it is well for us to pass this provision. What is the objection from the point of view of the Government? There is no doubt that this amendment will not interfere in the slightest with the Executive in the operation of its duties. It will only give the Oireachtas as a whole an opportunity of, shortly and within a space of time, perhaps, expressing the disapproval which the Minister for Finance has already stated they are entitled to do. As Deputy Cooper has pointed out it surely will be an exceedingly serious question which both the Dáil and the Seanad will agree to express their disapproval of, and if it is so serious a matter, then, I think, that it should be subject to immediate approval or otherwise. The Minister for Finance has stated that this might lead to unnecessary discussion. Who is to be the judge of whether the discussion is to be necessary or unnecessary? I think that is a matter that rests with the Dáil as a whole and not with the Government, or even with the Minister for Finance. Therefore, I think that it would be in no degree lessening the power or authority of the Executive; that it would in no way deprive them of their rights or the Minister for Finance of his authority in the matter, and I cannot see, except for pure official cussedness—to use a slang expression—why the Minister for Finance and the Government cannot accept this amendment. I certainly hope that Deputy Cooper will put this amendment to a division. If he does so I shall support it.

Mr. HEWAT: In this matter I would like to say that I cannot see the point of view of the mover of the amendment considering the big responsibility that he takes upon himself in putting it forward. The amendment proposes that any alteration of the regulations shall be laid before the Dáil for a certain period. Let us see what that would mean. The Minister for Finance considers it necessary to make some trivial alteration in the regulations governing the Civil Service—it may be trivial or a matter of greater importance—but at all events every alteration that he requires to make in the regulations will have to be brought before the Dáil.

Captain REDMOND: It is not proposed it should be brought before the Dáil. As far as I understand the amendment it is that it should be laid upon the Table of the Dáil.

Mr. HEWAT: I am glad of the interruption by Deputy Redmond, but I think in principle it is brought before the Dáil. The disgruntled civil servants get busy immediately amongst Deputies and by the time the Minister could act we would be all ready for a full dress debate on perhaps a matter of very little importance, as far as the alteration is concerned, but a vital matter in connection with the discipline of the Civil Service. This is the sort of thing that would tend to cut at the root of discipline in every office in connection with the Civil Service. And what is it for? If there is general dissatisfaction in the Civil Service, and with the treatment meted out to civil servants, surely there is not much difficulty in bringing forward the grievance as a whole. I should think not. There will be plenty of sympathisers in the Dáil who will do it readily. To put in the Bill a Section such as this Section, if amended, would weaken the whole administration very much. As far as I am concerned I will vote with the Government in opposing this amendment.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I will support this amendment. It seems to me the question involved is who is to control—the Oireachtas or the Ministry? That seems to be the issue. The amendment only seeks to bring under review an action of the Ministry with regard to any particular service or body of civil servants. If no injustice is done the matter would not come before the Dáil. If an injustice is done it is right that it should come before the Dáil. I thoroughly agree with Deputy Redmond when he stated that the Dáil, and the Dáil alone, must be the judge of the importance of any matter which a Deputy thinks it right should be brought before it. If it is unimportant the Dáil will know how to deal with it, but it should not rest with the Ministry, or with any member of the Ministry, to say that any particular matter is, or is not, of importance to the country. The Dáil is the body that has to find the money, and it has a right to call the tune in the last instance. I think it is not unreasonable that the Dáil should be given an opportunity of knowing what is being done. The Minister stated that if he does anything that should not be done there is a method of dealing with the matter. But an injustice might be done or something might happen to give cause for complaint. It might be smouldering for months before it came to the notice of the Dáil, or until an opportunity would arise for dealing with it on the Estimates or something of that kind. Smouldering discontent in the civil service is not good for the service, and the sooner it is brought to the surface and exposed the better. The Minister will have an opportunity of meeting any argument or agitation that might be put up, and of giving his explanation, which, I have no doubt, in the vast majority of cases, would meet with the full satisfaction of the Dáil. That, I think, will make for a healthier administration rather than trying to keep under ground any discontent that might arise from a Minister's action.

Mr. GOREY: I am very much amused at the description Deputy O'Connell gave of the discontent that might arise. He ventures to say that smouldering discontent could exist in Dublin for months without anyone knowing anything about it. I do not think I could conceive a more impossible position. I do not think discontent could exist for two days without Deputy O'Connell or some of us knowing everything about it. If every regulation or change in a regulation has to be laid on the Table of the Dáil, and has to be the subject of a discussion—

Captain REDMOND: Not necessarily discussion.

Mr. GOREY: I can conceive the position when every Civil Servant with a grievance, or a fancied grievance, will put up some friend to make a case.

Mr. O'CONNELL: And why not?

Mr. GOREY: Deputy O'Connell wants the Dáil to be occupied with nothing else but dealing with questions of this description.

Captain REDMOND: What is the Parliament for?

Mr. GOREY: Judging by the interruptions, Parliament is for dealing with every disgruntled civil servant who has a grievance.

Professor MAGENNIS: Or a disgruntled farmer.

Mr. GOREY: I can conceive a position when the Dáil will be occupied with nothing else. That might be agreeable to some Deputies, but I do not think it would suit the Dáil, or add to the dignity of the Dáil, to be dealing with petty grievances and with every petty dispute in the Civil Service.

Mr. GOOD: I would like to support the view taken by the Minister for Finance on this particular amendment. It appears to me that if the Dáil wants to encourage and create the difficulties that have been pointed out, then it ought to pass this amendment. The Dáil as I understand the position, appoints a Minister to discharge certain duties. If the Dáil on the one hand is going to appoint a Minister in whom it has confidence to discharge the duties, and is now going by amendment to take away and undermine his authority, surely it is an exceedingly weak proceeding. To take a business

Table civil servants, who have any grievance, have no option but go to Deputies and plead with them to make a fuss to bring the matter under the notice of the Dáil. I wonder at Deputies who resent such action refusing to accept this amendment. I am glad that Deputy Cooper proposes to divide the Dáil upon it if the Minister will not accept it, and I hope it will be carried.

Mr. BLYTHE: Deputy Johnson would seem to me, from the trend of his remarks, not to have read the amendment, because this is not the form that such provision usually takes in the Acts that have been passed in this Dáil. It does not propose that the regulations shall be made as usual and become operative and be annulled by the Dáil, if a resolution so deciding is passed within twenty-one days. It proposes that the regulations shall lie on the table one month before they become operative, and everybody is invited to come along and raise a row. It is quite a different thing. I would have no objection to have the usual type of clause put in the Bill. That is that the regulations shall lie on the table for twenty-one days, but in the meantime they should become operative. That would enable the Minister for Finance to deal with the matter. As a matter of fact regulations are in existence. There is no reason why the form of publication should not be the laying of the regulations on the table. That is a different thing to the amendment of Deputy Cooper.

Major COOPER: That is something quite new. If the Minister had said that half an hour ago we would have been saved all this discussion. If he had come a yard to meet me I would gladly have gone more than half way to meet him. If he will undertake to put in the usual form I am satisfied. All I want is that the Dáil shall have some power to review these regulations.

Mr. BLYTHE: I have no objection to the usual regulations.

Major COOPER: If you undertake to do that I withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

DAIL RESUMES.

Bill reported; Fourth Stage ordered for Tuesday, December 4th.

THE COURTS OF JUSTICE BILL, 1923.—FOURTH STAGE.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move that the Bill be received for final consideration. I assume the Dáil will go into Committee on this amendment, which is:—

In Section 7, line 19, page 5, to insert before the words "the Chief Justice" the following words:—"Whenever, owing to the illness of a judge of the Supreme Court or for any other unavoidable cause, the number of judges of the Supreme Court requisite for the transaction of the business of that Court is not available," and in line 19 to delete the words "from time to time."

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE at this stage took the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think the character of the amendments are such that they ought to be considered in Committee, and if I am in order I move that the Dáil resolves itself into Committee to consider these amendments.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: If there is a general desire to go into Committee, of course the Dáil will certainly do so, but the idea of going into Committee on the Report Stage of a Bill was that the Dáil could deal with new matter, or very important matter. I will now take the motion that the Dáil will go into Committee. Is that agreed?

Agreed.

DAIL IN COMMITTEE.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Section 7 enables Judges of the High Court to be called in to act as Judges in the Court of Appeal, and the purpose of this amendment is to limit that power to cases of illness or the unavoidable absence of Judges from the Court and the motive of the amendment is to preserve the position of the Court of Appeal as something supreme and standing in a position by itself and to prevent Judges of the High Court being called unnecessarily or too frequently into the Supreme Court. I move.

Captain REDMOND: I do not really see the force of this amendment, because during the course of the Committee Stage of this Bill I proposed that all the High Court Judges should be paid equal salaries with possibly one or two exceptions, and I had more than one ground for that proposal. In England at the present time that obtains, and I think it is a very useful fact that all High Court and Supreme Court Judges should be co-equals, and I cannot see why if the necessity were to arise there would be anything against the calling in to the Supreme Court of a High Court Judge. I really do not think that there would be that great difference between either their intelligence or capacity, or that there should be that difference between the status of the two Courts, and, therefore, I think that this amendment would require a little more explanation than the Attorney-General has given. What is the objection either from the legal or the civil state point of view to Supreme Court Judges seeking the assistance of their own brethren in the High Court. That is a question I would like to have answered if the Attorney-General would be kind enough to explain.

Professor MAGENNIS: I have been more than once surprised by the line taken, in the way of criticism of proposals, by my friend, Deputy Redmond but never more surprised than on the present occasion. The amendment here goes as nearly perfecting the original proposal as an amendment could well do. Deputy Redmond must be fully alive to the fact of every barrister's experience that a Judge of first instance, a Judge of the High Court, is dealing not merely with questions of law, but with considerations of what I might briefly describe as of a psychological character.

He estimates, from the manner and bearing and general behaviour of the witness, his credibility. He has control of his Court, he deals with counsel, and he exercises a variety of qualities that are altogether different in their nature from that of being a profound or subtle lawyer. That he should receive the same salary as the salary of the Supreme Court Judge does not arise here. If that were the question, I should agree with Deputy Redmond that both should be paid alike as being judges of a High Court, but the point that this amendment seeks to deal with is that the Judge of first instance should not be unnecessarily brought in to be a member constituting the Supreme Court. It is a Court really of specialisation of function, and it is only where there would be a deficiency in the number of Judges available to make up a Supreme Court for the hearing of a particular appeal, that it should be necessary at all to requisition the services of a Judge of the Supreme Court of first instance. I think Deputy Redmond overlooked the fact that in line 19 the amendment seeks to delete the words "from time to time," so that the result is that it is only when the illness of a Judge of Appeal makes it necessary, or some other unavoidable cause of a similar nature, that the Judge of the other Court is to be brought in to complete the number. I think this is a most useful amendment, and one that will commend itself to the Bar of Ireland.

Captain REDMOND: I am exceedingly indebted to my learned friend on my right for having more fully explained this amendment than did the Attorney-General when he said that High Court Judges should not be unnecessarily called in to aid their brethren in the Supreme Court. If that is the intention of the amendment, of course, I am in complete agreement with it, but it did strike me that it was unnecessary, to use the expression again, to have a limitation of the [Captain Redmond.] powers of the Judges of the Supreme Court. However, I am now satisfied that that is not the case, and I require no further explanation on the subject.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: One inaccuracy crept in, on an earlier stage of this Bill, as regards equal payments. The Court of Appeal in this country is intended to be, as far as possible, the final Court of Appeal. In England the Judges in the final Court of Appeal do not receive the same salaries as the other Judges; they receive considerably larger salaries. It is desired that this Court of Appeal, which is to be the final Court of Appeal and which is to be unlike the existing Court of Appeal constituted as a separate Court, should stand apart and should be constituted by men specially chosen for their fitness for that particular Court, and that it should not be possible to rush in High Court Judges in order to give a day's golf or a day's holiday to Judges of the Supreme Court. It is the opinion of the Bar that, in the present existing régime, Judges of the High Court have been unduly called into the Court of Appeal, and it is a constant complaint of the Bar. I do not know whether Deputy Redmond has conferred with representatives of the Bar, but I do know myself that this amendment is in accordance with the best opinion of the Bar, and I should think with a long way the majority of the Bar, that Judges of the High Court should not be called into the Court of Appeal, and that the Court of Appeal should be made a stable institution to which people can look with respect and which should not be simply a scratch collection of Judges got together to hear cases from time to time.

Amendment put, and agreed to.

Section amended accordingly.

Amendment 2.—In Section 12, line 3, page 6, to delete the words “on the advice of” and substitute in lieu thereof the words—“after consultation with the Chief Justice and.”

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move this amendment. It gives effect to an undertaking of the President, given on the Committee Stage, with reference to the extension of the age of retirement. The Section will now read:—“The age of retirement of all Judges of the High Court and Supreme Court shall be 70 years, but the Executive Council may, after consultation with the Chief Justice and the Attorney-General, extend the age of retirement in the case of any Judge to 75 years.”

Amendment agreed to.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

Amendment 3.—To delete Section 13.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: This amendment is for the purpose of inserting at the end of the Bill a comprehensive declaration applying to all Courts. This amendment is also in pursuance of an undertaking, and I move it.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment 4.—In Section 15, lines 26 and 27, page 6, to delete the words “or vacates his office owing to age or permanent infirmity,” and insert after the word “judge” in line 29 the following words:—“There shall be granted to each judge of the High Court and the Supreme Court who vacates his office owing to age or permanent infirmity after having completed five or more years’ service and less than fifteen years’ service a pension calculated at the rate of one-sixth of his salary at the time he vacates his office, with the addition of one-twentieth of his said salary for every completed year of service in excess of five such years, such pension to be continued during his life.”

Mr. O’HIGGINS: I move amendment 4.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: It will be remembered that, on the Committee Stage, a question was raised as to whether, under the provisions as they stood, a Judge might not retire within a few weeks of his appointment on full pension. I think that particular defect was pointed out by Deputy Magennis. This amendment has been drawn to meet that weakness in the Clause. It prevents any Judge vacating office with pension unless he has five years’ service.

Amendment agreed to.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

Amendment 5.—In Section 17, line 43, page 6, to insert immediately before the word “but” the following words:—“or a Judge of the Dáil Supreme Court as defined in the Dáil Eireann Courts (Winding-Up) Act, 1923 (No. 36 of 1923), or a Judicial Commissioner appointed under that Act.”

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The object of this amendment, which I move, is to correct an oversight in failing to set out as a qualification for appointment to the new Courts the judicial record possessed by certain persons. Judges appointed to the Dáil Supreme Court and those who are acting on the Dáil Courts Winding-up Commission were omitted, and I think it will be agreed that that omission should be rectified.

Amendment agreed to.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

Amendment 6.—In Section 20, line 13, page 7, to delete the words “of the High Court and Supreme Court.”

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: This amendment, which I move, is really only a drafting amendment. It was unnecessary to insert the names of the Courts. It is better to leave it in the general form, that the Commissioners referred to shall be simply Commissioners and not limited to particular Courts.

Amendment agreed to.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

Amendment 7.—To delete Section 21.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The intention of this amendment is to transfer the Clause to the end, inasmuch as the Commissioners and Solicitors, respectively, will be Commissioners and Solicitors for all the Courts set up under this Bill. I move the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

Amendment 8.—To insert immediately before Section 22, page 7, a new section, as follows:—

“From and after the commencement of this Act the Reference Committee for Saorstát Eireann mentioned in sub-section (5) of Section

33 of the Finance (1909-10) Act as adapted by the Adaptation of Enactments Act, 1922 (No. 2 of 1922) shall consist of the Chief Justice, the President of the High Court, and the Chairman of the Surveyors' Institution (Irish Branch), in lieu of the persons named in the said sub-section.”

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: This amendment is necessary by reason of the fact that under the Bill as it stands the Reference Committee that appointed Referees for appeals under the Finance provisions of the Finance Acts of 1909-10 could not be constituted. The persons who were made ex-officio members of that Reference Committee cease to exist under this Bill, and it is proposed to substitute for them the persons named in the amendment, who are: the Chief Justice, the President of the High Court and the Chairman of the Surveyors' Institution (Irish Branch). I move the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion made and question put—
“That the new Section be added to the Bill.”

Agreed.

Amendment 9.—To delete Section 25.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The object of this Amendment is to transfer the Section to a more comprehensive Clause, which it is proposed to add at the end and which will make these provisions with reference to juries apply to all Courts. I move the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment 10.—In Section 37 (viii.), line 22, page 10, to delete the word “and” where it secondly occurs and insert in lieu thereof the figures “(ix.)”.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: This Amendment is merely a drafting Amendment and for the purpose of inserting the figure 9. Otherwise the terms at the end of Clause 8 might be limited by the new words which were put in as regards the fixing and the collection of fees. I move the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment 11.—In Section 37, line 26, page 10, to add immediately after the word "majority" the words "of a committee consisting."

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: This gives effect to an undertaking given during the Committee Stage, prescribing the concurrence which is required in the making of rules for the Superior Court and High Court.

Amendment agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move: "In Section 37, page 10, to delete lines 31 to 40 inclusive." It is proposed to apply the clause to all rules in all the Courts, and it is provided that they be laid on the table of the House.

Amendment agreed to.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move:

"In Section 38, line 50, page 10, to add immediately after the word 'Court' the following words:— 'The Minister for Home Affairs may, with the consent of the Chief Justice, and the Judges for the time being of the respective Circuits affected, at any time and from time to time transfer any county or part of a county from one Circuit to another Circuit, or otherwise alter the areas comprised in the several Circuits as he shall think proper, but not so as to alter the total number of Circuits.'"

This amendment enables the Minister for Home Affairs to alter the Circuits. Deputy Cooper pointed out that in his view, one of the Circuits, at least as constituted, would not be workable. Really, it is not possible to arrive at a final view in that matter. Experience will teach us more.

Major COOPER: This is a wise provision, but I should like to ask what does "part of a county" mean? It is not clear, and it seems to me that you would require a more exact definition than simply "part of a county."

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: All I can say is, it means part of a county. It will presumably be some identifiable part—barony or townland, as the case may be.

Mr. JOHNSON: Will the Attorney-General say whether there is intended to be a prohibition against decreasing the total number of circuits by agreement, as provided. The last line but one prevents the possibility of decreasing the total number of Circuits. Is it intended that, no matter what the conditions may be, there shall be no change in that number?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: It is not intended that this provision shall be used for that purpose. It is inconceivable that they could be reduced as a matter of fact.

Captain REDMOND: I distinctly welcome this amendment, and also the remark which has just fallen from the Attorney-General, that it is inconceivable that the present number of Circuits could be reduced. I am very glad to hear also that this amendment does not limit the possibility of a future increase in the number of Circuits, which I personally think will have to be made to make the scheme a workable one. As regards the transferring of one County, or part of a County, from one Circuit to another, I notice that the Minister for Home Affairs, the Chief Justice, and the Judges for the time being, of the respective Circuits, are to have the sole say in this matter. I certainly think that they should be consulted, and I think they should have a considerable voice in the question, but I must also give expression to my view that the residents of those Counties, and the people directly concerned with the operation of these courts, might also be consulted in this matter. I think this is a matter of vital importance to the people, say of a County like Louth, which is included in a Circuit extending to the County Wexford, through the counties of Meath, Kildare and Wicklow. It is an important question to the people concerned, as to whether Louth should or could be advantageously transferred to another Circuit. Therefore, if it were at all possible, I would suggest to the Attorney-General that the proposed change, if any, should not be necessarily limited to the consent or to the approval of the people mentioned in this amendment. If it be possible to get the opinion—as I think it might be—of the would-be, future or potential litigants in those various areas directly concerned, I certainly think they should have a voice in the matter. I would, therefore, ask the Attorney-General, if possible, to consider this matter, and if he comes to the same conclusion, perhaps he might be able to extend and widen the amendment.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I do not know how Deputy Redmond proposes exactly that all future litigants' views are to be taken as to alteration of the Circuits. I do not know whether he proposes to send snowball resolutions round to Board of Guardians. Of course, all representations and views locally that may be sent forward will be fully considered, and a change of this kind will hardly be made in face of opinion that should be given weight to. I think the amendment as it stands is a good one and a reasonable amendment.

Professor MAGENNIS: It may be a perfectly reasonable amendment, but, without being hyper-critical, I might suggest that there is one slight flaw in it. It has been the practice with regard to County Court Judges not to remove the Judge from one area to another without his consent. One can easily see here if a portion of a district were to be removed from a Circuit Judge, he might feel aggrieved, and create considerable difficulty in blocking what, in the public interest, would be a desirable amendment.

The amendment says that "the Minister may, with the consent of the Chief Justice and the Judges of the Circuits involved." That implies, as I take it, the unanimous consent. If one of them be a dissident then the Minister cannot make this alteration. Yet the alteration may be very necessary in the interests of better judicial administration. Then there is a deadlock, and it will become necessary to introduce a Bill to deal with it. There would have to be a short Act doing this in spite of the dissentients. Why not have a majority vote in the matter, or restrict in some way the vetoing power of a Circuit Judge who might feel himself aggrieved? In other words, we are giving too much blocking power to the sense of grievance of men who might have no other objection but merely that he felt his importance diminished by having the area of his Circuit diminished.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: It is essential that the consent of the Judges affected, should there be Judges in occupation of the Circuits at the moment, should be required before their position would be affected in this particular way. Otherwise it could be suggested that things of that kind were done with ulterior motives, or to bring pressure of one kind or another on the Judges. If a more workable arrangement is in view the probability is that the Judges would be only too happy to fall in with it.

Professor MAGENNIS: Might I ask may a Circuit Judge be changed from one Circuit to another or is this the only method? It ought to follow, as a corollary, from the fact that there is only one Court, and that all these constitute the Court that he could be changed.

Amendment agreed to.

Question: "That Section 38, as amended, stand part of the Bill"—put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move to report progress.

Progress reported.

THE ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I move the adjournment until 3 o'clock on Tuesday week.

Mr. JOHNSON: Can the Minister give us any guidance as to what the programme is likely to be during the month of December, or whether we are to meet in Christmas week or adjourn for Christmas week? Is there any foresight in the matter?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: There will be a short adjournment for Christmas.

Mr. JOHNSON: May I suggest to the Minister that at least on the day we meet again we should have some information as to what the procedure for the next two or three months might be, so that we count upon something to help us to carry on our own work, and to know whether we are likely to meet regularly or irregularly, or meet at all?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: We will endeavour by the time the Dáil meets again to be in a position to outline a programme that will enable Deputies to form an idea of what the calls upon them will be.

The Dáil adjourned at 7 p.m. until 3 o'clock, Tuesday, 4th December.

CEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS.

ORAL ANSWERS.

DUTIABLE TRAFFIC AT GREENORE.

TOMAS MacEOIN asked the Minister for Finance if he is aware that owing to inadequate and unsatisfactory arrangements for dealing with dutiable traffic at Greenore—involving considerable delay and additional expense to traders—inward traffic is being diverted from Greenore to ports outside the Saorstát where better Customs facilities are provided; whether the Saorstát Customs Authorities have received repeated representations on the matter from the London, Midland and Scottish Railway Company, and what steps, if any, he intends taking to remedy a state of affairs calculated to detrimentally affect the port of Greenore and which reflects unfavourably on the efficiency of Saorstát administration.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. E. Blythe): As regards the first part of the question, I have no information of any such diversion of inward traffic from Greenore to ports outside the Saorstát. Considerable difficulty in dealing with inward dutiable traffic has been experienced by the Customs Officers at Greenore, partly on account of the diversion of traffic from Dublin to Greenore during the recent labour troubles at the former port, and partly on account of the continued failure of the London, Midland and Scottish Railway Company to provide suitable office and shed accommodation at Greenore. As regards the second and third parts of the question, the Railway Company named have made certain representations to the Revenue Authorities as to difficulties experienced in obtaining the release of dutiable goods at Greenore. All practicable steps have been taken by the Authorities to enable the Customs Officers to cope with the very heavy pressure of work due to the causes I have mentioned, but these steps cannot be fully effective until the Railway Company have fulfilled their obligations in regard to the provision of suitable accommodation.

EX-MEMBERS OF R.I.C.

LIAM O DAIMHIN asked the Minister for Finance whether it is proposed to make an Order under Section 5 of the Superannuation and Pensions Act, 1923, authorising the grant of pensions, allowances or gratuities to ex-members of the Royal Irish Constabulary, and, if so, whether he can indicate the probable time at which the Order will be laid before the Dáil.

Mr. BLYTHE: The Order referred to is at present in course of preparation. I hope to be in a position to have it laid on the Table in a very short space of time.

Mr. JOHNSON: Can the Minister give us any indication of the actual time when it will be placed on the table? It has been in preparation for a long time, and I would like if he would tell us whether it will apply only to those who have been before the Inquiry Committee. Would the Minister be able to give the Dáil some information as to the general position regarding those dismissed and resigned R.I.C. men?

Mr. BLYTHE: The only thing that I can add now to what I have said is that I hope to have it on the table within a very few days. I regret the delay that has occurred in the matter, but I can promise it will be placed on the table in a very short time now.

Mr. JOHNSON: I take it the Minister is aware that there is very great distress amongst many of these men.

Mr. BLYTHE: I am aware of that.

CUSTOMS ARRANGEMENTS AT DUN LAOGHAIRE.

Major BRYAN COOPER asked the

[Major Cooper.]

Minister for Finance whether his attention has been called to the inconvenience caused to travellers by the arrangements for Customs examination at Dun Laoghaire Pier, and whether he will state what steps he proposes to take to deal with the matter.

MR. BLYTHE: I am aware that some inconvenience is caused to travellers by the present arrangements for the Customs examination on Carlisle Pier. A certain amount of this inconvenience is inseparable from a Customs examination, even under the most favourable conditions. Steps, however, are being taken to effect such improvements as are practicable; and for that purpose the Commissioners of Public Works have been in communication with the Revenue Department, the London, Midland and Scottish Railway, and the Dublin and South-Eastern Railway Companies. This correspondence has resulted in a Conference between the representatives of the various bodies interested, which is being held to-day.

If the Deputy will postpone his question for some days I may be in a position to give him more accurate information as to the improvements it is thought possible to effect.

SUBSIDIES FOR BUILDERS OF HOUSES.

MAIGHREAD NI CHOILEAIN BEAN UI DHRISCEOIL asked the Minister for Local Government whether in view of the shortage of housing accommodation in the Saorstát, and the fact that the building of houses is not an economic proposition, he will formulate a scheme of Grants to persons who build houses for the purpose of letting to tenants; whether, in addition, he will introduce legislation exempting all working class houses so built from taxation and income tax for a period of five years; whether this would not be a preferable way of solving the housing problem to the system of loans and grants to Municipal and other authorities.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. Burke): The Government have been considering the problem on the lines indicated in the question. Investigations are being made as to whether any measures can be taken to secure reductions in the abnormally high cost of construction. An announcement on the matter will be made as soon as possible.

FEE FARM GRANTS.

SEAN MacGIBUIN asked the Minister for Agriculture when and by what procedure it is proposed that Fee Farm Rents should be redeemed; how, in order to complete the abolition of dual ownership of land, it is proposed to deal with tenants in occupation of holdings under a Fee Farm Grant.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. P. Hogan): I would refer the Deputy to the similar question which appeared on the Question Paper for 22nd November.

The method of redemption of Fee Farm and certain other Rents is set out in Section 38 of the Land Act, 1923, and is briefly as follows:—The proprietor of the parcel of land concerned applies to the Land Commission for an advance for the purpose of redeeming the rent payable in respect of such parcel. The said rent and any interest superior thereto, will then be valued and redemption ordered by the Judicial Commissioner. The advance will be made in $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Land Bonds, and will be repayable by means of an ordinary Land Commission annuity calculated at the rate of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum.

The Rules governing procedure under this Section will shortly be published.

ANNUITIES PAYABLE BY RE-INSTATED EVICTED TENANTS.

SEAMUS MacCOSGAIR asked the Minister for Agriculture whether his attention has been called to the excessive amounts which evicted tenants and those who got new farms as migrants in Galway County are called upon to pay as annuities; whether it would be possible, by extension of time for repayment to the State of the purchase money, or otherwise, to reduce the annuities payable by such land-holders, so as to afford them relief equal to that obtained by neighbouring land-holders.

Mr. HOGAN: It is presumed that the Question has reference to re-instated evicted tenants and migrants on the Clanricarde estate. Statements of the same nature as those contained in the Question have been made, supported by comparison with the annuities paid by ordinary non-evicted occupiers on the same estate. It is true that the latter are generally lower than the former but for the reason that the comparison takes no account of various Free Grants, amounting to about £8,000, made by the Land Commission to the re-instated tenants for buildings, fencing, drainage, etc. If these Free Grants are taken into consideration, representing as they do about seven years' purchase of the rental of the restored evicted tenants, it would mean that the latter were sold their holdings at a lesser number of years' purchase than the ordinary occupying tenants with whom comparison has been made.

It may be added that since the settlement of these evicted tenants, several of them have sold their occupation interests in the holdings and have obtained very high prices therefor.

There can be no question whatever of re-opening completed sales.

EVICTED TENANTS AND LAND ACT.

Mr. PATRICK F. BAXTER asked the Minister for Agriculture how soon it is intended to take steps to deal with the claims of evicted tenants coming under the Land Act, 1923; whether it is intended to establish a Commission to hear such claims.

Mr. HOGAN: It should be remembered that very large numbers of evicted tenants' claims have already been fully investigated and classified under previous Land Acts. It is the business of the Land Commission to investigate new claims, and it is not intended to establish another Commission to do that work. The Land Commission will investigate these claims as they acquire the various estates, but it will deal with urgent cases of congestion among existing tenants before dealing with any large number of evicted tenants.

TENANTED LAND."

SEAN MacGIBUIN asked the Minister for Agriculture whether he is aware that lands held and worked by occupying tenants do not come within the meaning of the term "tenanted land," because such tenants occupy holdings under "Fee Farm Grants," whether it is intended to introduce legislation rectifying this anomaly and to permit of arrears of rent under a Fee Farm Grant being compounded, in accordance with Section 20 of the Land Act, 1923.

Mr. HOGAN: I am not aware that lands held and worked by occupying tenants do not come within the meaning of the term "tenanted land." I am aware, on the contrary, that the term "tenanted land" means, under the Land Act, 1923, land held and worked by occupying tenants. Fee Farm Grantees are not tenants; they are Fee Farm Grantees. A very large number of the landlords from whom we will be acquiring land compulsorily for the purposes of the Act, hold their land under Fee Farm Grants or long leases. Therefore, the same terms could not be given to Fee Farm Grantees as are being given to tenants. The Land Act, 1923, however, makes special provision for Fee Farm Grantees who hold land which the Land Commission do not require for re-sale to congests. As explained already under Section 38 of the Act, these Grantees are enabled to redeem their head rents. They could not get the benefits of the provisions of the arrears Sections; the arrears Sections were framed for the relief of tenants.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: Arising out of that answer, I would like to ask the Minister for Agriculture if the Land Commission has compulsory power to force the owners of those Fee Farm Grants to sell the land to the Fee Farm Grantees, or if it is only optional in the circumstances?

Mr. HOGAN: There is no question of forcing the owner to sell to the tenant in any case. But it is optional. The tenant may apply to the Land Commission, apart from the wishes of the landlord to have the rent redeemed, and the Judicial Commissioner must fix the redemption price. The Land Commission will then make an advance to the Fee Farm Grantee or Lessee for the amount of the advance necessary to redeem it. It is a matter entirely for the Grantee, and it does not concern the Land Commission.

COLLECTION OF COMPOUNDED ARREARS OF RENT.

MICHEAL O hIFEARNAIN asked the Minister for Agriculture whether in view of the fact that a considerable amount of uncertainty exists as to the methods and approximate date of collecting the balance of the compounded arrears of rent in accordance with the provisions of the Land Act, 1923, he will give an indication as to how and when this is to be brought about, whether the Minister can give any approximate indication of when the Appointed Day will be fixed in regard to the sale of tenanted land, in cases where there is no obstacle to the administration of the Land Act, 1923.

Mr. HOGAN: At the present stage it is not possible to give a reply to the first part of the Question. The procedure to be adopted and the approximate date for collecting the balance of the compounded arrears of rent will depend on the amounts to be collected after the first year's payment, which is now in course of collection and this information is not yet available, and will not be available until we have complete accounts made out in regard to the first year's arrears.

As regards the second part of the Question, provisional lists of lands to be vested in the Land Commission under the Act have been published in respect of eight estates situate in the Counties of Cork, Donegal, Dublin, Clare, Kildare, Limerick, and Offaly. Upon the expiration of two months from such publication, if in the meantime no objections have been entered to such lists, the Land Commission will take the necessary steps with a view to publishing the final lists and to declare the "appointed day" or days for these lands.

Further Provisional Lists are being prepared from the particulars furnished under the Acts and will be published in the "Gazette" from time to time as soon as practicable.

There is not to be one appointed day, but according as the Land Commission has got sufficient particulars to prepare the lists, they will be published so that cases that are ready for vesting will not have to wait for cases that are not ready, as would be the case if one appointed day were to be declared.

REINSTATEMENT OF EVICTED TENANTS.

MICHEAL O hIFEARNAIN asked the Minister for Agriculture what steps should be taken by evicted tenants in order to secure reinstatement in their original holdings or to secure an alternative grant of land in accordance with the provisions of the Land Act, 1923; when will the rules governing the reinstatement of evicted tenants in accordance with the provisions of the Land Act, 1923, be published.

Mr. HOGAN: I would refer the Deputy to my reply to Deputy Baxter's Question to-day on the same subject. I need only add that it is open to evicted tenants to put their claims in writing and send them to the Secretary of the Land Commission.

RENT PAYMENTS.

Mr. P. J. EGAN asked the Minister for Agriculture whether rent payments made on and after the second gale day in 1920 are to be deducted from the three years' compounded arrears of rent allowed to landlords under the 1923 Land Act, and, if so, whether he is aware that many Land Agents are refusing to make such allowances, and what action will be taken in such cases.

Mr. HOGAN: Section 19 (2) of the Land Act, 1923, specifies that any payment of rent made by a tenant after the second gale day in the year 1920 shall be appropriated to the rent which accrued since the first gale day in that year.

In cases where a landlord in his statement of the amount due by a tenant has not given credit for allowances to which under the Act a tenant is entitled, the latter shall at once lodge with the Land Commission a notice in writing of his objection, which shall then be dealt with and decided in accordance with the Provisional Rules on the subject issued by the Land Commission on the 18th August of this year.

ARMY TOURING CARS.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS asked the Minister for Defence how many touring cars there are in the possession of the Army, and of what types, and the capital cost of these in the aggregate, what is the monthly cost for the running and upkeep of these cars, what officers are entitled to use the cars of each type, what duties require the allocation of each type, what is the form of authorisation given for such use of touring cars, and what is the basis of allocation of such cars for the use of officers.

MINISTER for DEFENCE (General Mulcahy): There are in the possession of the Army 285 touring cars, as follows:—

207 Ford	Touring Cars
25 Crossley	" "
2 Dodge	" "
15 Vauxhall	" "
6 Overland	" "
4 Rover Sunbeam	" "
1 Star	" "
2 Hupmobile	" "
4 Hudson	" "
1 Buick	" "
1 Angus Sanderson	" "
1 Clement Talbot	" "
1 Benz	" "
11 Fiat	" "
1 Briscoe	" "
1 Chandler	" "
1 Wolseley	" "
1 Metalurgique	" "

Many of these are cars seized or commandeered during the recent fighting. They are not all in use. The following are particulars in respect of cars which are in use:—

Ford	Touring Cars ... 115
Crossley	16
Dodge	2
Vauxhall	9
Overland	1
Rover Sunbeam	4
Hudson	1
Buick	1
Angus-Sanderson	1

Total 156

Of which, roughly, 25 per cent. are off the road at all times for overhaul or light repairs.

It is not possible to state the actual capital cost of these cars. They come under four headings:—

(1) Cars taken over from the British Government at the time of evacuation by the British forces and in respect of which no specific sale figure is yet agreed on.

(2) Cars of various types that fell into the possession of the Army during the recent fighting.

(3) Cars commandeered from private owners.

(4) 25 new Ford Touring Cars at a cost of £130 each.

It is not the practice to keep a separate account in respect of the running and upkeep of each particular car. The average monthly cost for repairs and upkeep is £28 per car in use.

The duties of the Senior Officers attached to G.H.Q., Command Headquarters, and Special Services are such as make it essential to allocate touring cars to them individually. In the cases of Branches of the Administrative Departments of the Army the allocation is not made to officers, but to the particular branch. In allocating cars to officers or departments the type of car is not taken into consideration.

In the case of cars allocated to certain individual officers, the car is officially allocated in Departmental Routine Orders, and the officer concerned is responsible for the proper use of the car. In the case of cars allocated to Departments the head of the particular Department is held responsible for the proper use of the car. Each driver carries in his possession a Duty Order indicating his duties, journeys undertaken, etc.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Will the Minister state if such allocation is made to Officers strictly for service duty only, and not for private purposes, and secondly, if there are any regulations governing the matter, would he give those regulations?

General MULCAHY: The allocation is made strictly for official duties. I will see what regulations are available in the matter, and have a copy sent to the Deputy.

Mr. WILSON: Do these cars pay the ordinary tax which the motor cars of private individuals pay?

General MULCAHY: They are not liable to pay the ordinary road tax.

SOLDIERS' UNEMPLOYMENT CONTRIBUTIONS.

TOMAS MacEOIN asked the Minister for Defence whether a soldier who prior to joining the Army was a contributor under the Unemployment Insurance Acts, but had exhausted his contributions and was then no longer entitled to benefit, would, on discharge from the Army, be credited with the special contributions provided for in Section 7 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1923.

General MULCAHY: It appears that this question arises out of a reply which I gave to a question asked by Deputy Alderman Byrne on the 25th September last, and which I regret to say, was not accurate. The words "to their credit" in that reply involves a misinterpretation of Section 7 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1923, in as much as they imply that the contributions due from the Minister under the first part of that Section, would not be payable if all contributions paid in respect of a soldier prior to enlistment, had been exhausted as regards right to benefit. That implication is not in accordance with the law of the case. Regardless of the amount of benefit that has been paid to him prior to enlistment, every soldier who enlisted in the Army for any period not exceeding twelve months,

who enlisted before 1st May, 1923, for a period of service which terminated on or before 1st May, 1924, and

who, in addition, prior to the date of enlistment had had paid in respect of him under the Unemployment Acts either twenty contributions at any time or ten contributions since the 8th day of November, 1920, shall have paid on his behalf by the Minister for Defence contributions, so as to secure that there shall be not less than twelve contributions to his credit in respect of each insurance year, during which year, or part of which, he has served in the Army.

In short, and generally speaking, the reply to the Deputy's question is, therefore, in the affirmative. The fact that pre-enlistment contributions had or had not been exhausted in any particular case, does not affect the matter.

FORCES OF PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT.

MICHEAL O hAONGHUSA asked the Minister for Defence whether he is prepared to consider payment of accounts due to traders for goods supplied to the Forces of the Provisional Government which occupied military and police barracks and other buildings throughout the Saorstát from January to June, 1922, inclusive.

General MULCAHY: Accounts from traders for goods supplied to forces of the Provisional Government occupying Military and Police Barracks and other buildings throughout the Saorstát from 1st February to 28th June, 1922, will be considered, and if it is proved that the goods were supplied to and were necessary for the maintenance of forces loyal to the Provisional Government, and the prices charged are reasonable, the accounts will be paid.

Mr. HOGAN (Clare): Arising out of that answer I would like to ask the Minister whether he considers the orders issued to the different merchants throughout the country for goods for the maintenance of those troops will be considered as Army Orders?

General MULCAHY: That would require some consideration, in view of the different circumstances in which orders were given, or alleged to have been given, on behalf of the Provisional Government.

COMMANDEERED CARS.

Mr. D. J. GOREY (for Mr. Patrick McKenna) asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that responsible officers under Captain Callaghan commandeered from Mrs. Sarah M. Donlon, Longford, on the 7th August, 1922, her five motor cars and returned same through Captain D. Molloy, Transport Officer, on the 13th August, 1922, seriously damaged and injured, whether Mrs. Donlon's account for damage and injury to the cars, particulars of which have been supplied, together with an account for motors supplied to the Army in the months of September and October, 1922, and in the months of April and May, 1923, amounting to £507 2s. Od., have not been paid, whether repeated applications with particulars have been supplied, and why payment of this account has been so long delayed.

General MULCAHY: The five cars in question were not commandeered for military use. They were taken on the 7th August, 1922, because they were being used by claimant's son to carry arms and ammunition for Irregulars. Her son was arrested on the same day. The cars were returned to her on the 13th August, 1922. While in military custody they were used only when no other transport was available, and were properly cared for. When handed back they are stated to have been in as good a condition as when taken. Claimant was requested to send a mechanic to the Barracks to have the cars examined before being returned, but she refused to do so.

A claim for £460 16s. Od. for alleged damage to the cars while in military custody, has been furnished, and is at present under investigation. Hirage accounts amounting to £33 18s. Od. for September and October, 1922, and April and May, 1923, have been received. Their settlement has been unduly delayed, but is receiving attention at present.

Mr. GOREY: Arising out of the Minister's answers, I desire to ask what importance he would attach to that paragraph in the answer in which it is mentioned that the cars, when handed back, "were stated to have been in as good a condition as when taken"—how much reliance does the Minister place upon that?

General MULCAHY: The statement is made on the authority of our responsible officer.

Mr. GOREY: Well, we know in what condition the cars are when they are handed back. We know the state they are in.

UNTRIED PRISONERS.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Defence if he will state the number of untried prisoners at present in prisons and internment camps in the Free State; if he will state the number released since the 1st November, if he will state the number released since the hunger strike was declared off, and if efforts will be made to speed up the release of those still detained.

General MULCAHY: The number of untried prisoners at present in military custody is 4,955. The number which has been released since the 1st November is 2,647, which includes 714 released since the hunger-strike terminated. Prisoners are being released as quickly as considerations of public safety will permit.

A. ROSCOMMON SHOOTING.

SEAMUS MacCOSGAIR asked the Minister for Defence if he is aware that on 28th September, 1923, Peter Barrett, aged 21 years, of Kiladerry, Ballyforan, Ballinasloe, was, accidentally or otherwise, shot by a Volunteer of the National Army while attending a dance at Coolgarry, Co. Roscommon, and died on the following morning; whether the military raid during which the fatality took place was duly authorised by the military authorities; whether he is aware that the deceased belonged to no party or association hostile to the Government, and that he was a young man of unblemished character; and whether any steps have been taken or will be taken to compensate John Barrett, the father of deceased, for the loss he has sustained by the death of his son.

General MULCAHY: Peter Barrett was fatally wounded during the course of a military raid on a house at which a dance was being held. The raid was duly authorised and was made in search of certain Irregulars, who were captured. I am aware that Barrett belonged to no party or association hostile to the Government. The soldier who fired the fatal shot was handed over to the civil authorities for trial on the 15th October last.

I regret that the claim for compensation cannot be entertained, as there is no legal liability attaching to the military in a case of this nature.

ARMY ACCOUNTS.

MICHEAL O HAONGHUSA asked the Minister for Defence whether he will immediately consider the necessity for setting up in Cork a small Committee to investigate and assist in expediting the payments of the numerous claims in Cork City and County for motor vehicles, motor cycles, boats, etc., commandeered by National Troops and in many cases damaged while being used by the troops during operation.

General MULCAHY: Arrangements have already been made for the inter-departmental Commandeered Motor Vehicles Committee to sit locally in various districts in An Saorstát so as to expedite the settlement of the claims referred to. That Committee is sitting in Cork to-day.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Defence if compensation has yet been paid to Messrs. Hoary and Tully, Mental Hospital Attendants, Ballinasloe, on account of their bicycles which were commandeered by the Military Authorities over twelve months ago.

General MULCAHY: Compensation has not been paid in these cases. It is hoped it will be paid at an early date.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Defence if he can state the reasons for the delay in paying the account due by the Army Authorities to Mr. James McMahon, victualler, Woodford, Co. Galway, for which application has been repeatedly made by Mr. McMahon personally and by his solicitors.

General MULCAHY: Amounts totalling in all over £200 have been paid to Mr. McMahon, and no outstanding accounts can be traced.

WRITTEN ANSWERS.

ARMY ACCOUNTS.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Defence if he can state the reasons for the delay in making payment to Mr. James O'Donohoe, Motor Driver, Gort, Co. Galway, for work done and cars supplied during the early summer of 1922, whether he is aware that Mr. O'Donohoe's business is practically ruined because of the financial embarrassment caused by the delay in dealing with his case, and whether he will consider the advisability of making a substantial payment on account if there is any further investigation needed before the matter is finally settled.

General MULCAHY: Mr. James O'Donohoe provided two Ford cars for transport services, and drove one car personally. He was supplied by the Army with petrol and oil to the value of £40, and repairs to his cars cost the State £44 16s. 0d. He was billeted at Army expense from June, 1922, to February, 1923, and in addition received payments amounting to £287 15s. 6d.

Consideration of his claim is near completion, and it is regretted that it is not feasible at present to make a further payment on account.

Mr. PATRICK W. SHAW asked the Minister for Defence if he will expedite payment of account for £181 7s. 9d. due to Messrs. H. Milligan and Co., Athlone, the items of which have been certified as correct by the Command Quartermaster, Athlone, and were supplied in September, 1922.

General MULCAHY: A cheque for the amount claimed by Messrs. Miligan and Co., less £4 18s. 0d., for overcharges, has been issued.

MICHEAL O HAONGHUSA asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that Patrick Morrissey, Motor Agent, Youghal, Co. Cork, presented many months ago for payment to the Military Authorities, bills certified by the local accounts officer for work done for the troops, cars supplied them, and for cars damaged by them, etc., and if he will state when the account will be disbursed.

General MULCAHY: Consideration and certification of Mr. Morrissey's account is not yet complete, but part of the account will be paid at an early date.

Mr. PATRICK W. SHAW asked the Minister for Defence if he will expedite the payment of an account due Messrs. Fallon and Son, Mullingar, of £94 17s. 6d., detailed statements of items having been several times supplied.

General MULCAHY: Consideration of the account of Messrs. Fallon and Son will be expedited, and, if it is in order, it will be settled at an early date.

THE PRISONS' SERVICE.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether it is the intention of the Government to alter the existing system in the prisons' service as it applies to the officers generally, whether it is the intention to allow the existing ranks and classes to lapse according as the existing officers pass out of the service, and, if so, whether he will confer with the prisons' officers' representative body before any steps are taken to abolish those ranks and classes; further, whether he is aware that at the present moment the many duties common to the prisons are being carried on under serious disadvantages consequent on the failure to fill vacancies in promoted posts due to officers retiring under Article X of the Treaty, whether he will now take steps in the interests of efficiency as well as economy to have the numerous vacant promoted posts filled and so prevent a further swelling of the pensions list by further large numbers of retirements from the service.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS

(Mr. O'Higgins): It has not been decided to alter generally the existing organisation of officers in the Prisons Service. The decision as to the filling of any vacancy which arises in any rank is determined solely by the necessities of the service. While every consideration will be given to the reasonable representations of the Prisons' Officers' Representative Body, I cannot see that any good purpose would be served by a conference such as that suggested. I am satisfied that the existing arrangements do not involve any disadvantage in the carrying out of prison duties, and I cannot accept the suggestion that the interests of efficiency or economy would be served by the making of appointments to posts which experience may have shown to be unnecessary.

PAYMENT TO ASYLUM OFFICIAL.

Mr. P. W. SHAW asked the Minister for Local Government if he will sanction payment of a sum of £50 unanimously passed by the Joint Committee of Management of Mullingar Asylum to Christopher Crowley, who resigned his position after 36 years' service through ill-health, whether similar gratuities have been sanctioned recently under the same circumstances to the late head attendant and head nurse.

Mr. BURKE: There is no statutory authority under which a gratuity could be granted to Attendant Christopher Crowley on retirement in addition to the pension which the Joint Committee awarded him. The gratuities granted in similar circumstances in the year 1919 and 1920 were not sanctioned, and should not have been paid. I am making further inquiries into the position as regards these payments.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

[Mr. K. O'Higgins.]
(Mr. K. O'Higgins): I wonder would it meet the convenience of the Dáil, to take after Item 1, Item 7, which is the Committee Stage of the Gaming Bill. I have received no amendments to that Bill, and I imagine, therefore, it would be disposed of in a short time.
 Agreed.

THE EXPIRING LAWS BILL, 1923— FIRST STAGE.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I wish to ask leave to introduce the Expiring Laws Bill, which keeps alive the Acts which would, in the ordinary course, expire at the end of this month. It will be observed that the title differs from the usual title, "Expiring Laws Continuance Bill." The reason is that in this Bill we propose to make permanent a few of the non-controversial Bills which have been repeated for a number of years, and which it is thought would be made permanent now.

Motion put, and agreed to.

Second Stage ordered for Tuesday, 11th December, 1923.

DAIL IN COMMITTEE.

GAMING BILL, 1923—THIRD STAGE

Sections 1, 2 and 3 put and agreed to.

Question "that the title stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

THE DAIL RESUMES.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Bill is reported, without amendment.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I ask that the next Stage be taken now.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think, before we agree to this, we should have some reason for its urgency. I have no objection to it, but I think that where there is any departure from the Standing Orders, we should have some reason for the departure.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Short as the Bill is, it is an important Bill, and any day a trustee might find himself in the position of having to sue for the recovery of payment made by cheque by a deceased person during his life. Any day the executors of a deceased bookmaker might find themselves in the position of being bound to sue for the return of all payments made by that bookmaker to his clients. In view of the fact that no amendments have been put in, and that there is a general measure of agreement with regard to the Bill, we ought to recognise its urgency, and pass it through its final stages without delay.

Mr. JOHNSON: I am agreeable.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I move that the Bill be received for final consideration.

Agreed to.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I move that the Bill do now pass.

Agreed to.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Bill will accordingly be sent to the Seanad.

PRIVATE BILL PROCEDURE— SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

PADRAIC O MAILLE: Ba mhaith liom an tuarascabhaíl seo do chur os comhair na Dála. Sílim go mba cheart go nglacfaí leis gan díospóireacht, mar tá go leór Billí chun teacht os comhair an Choisde. Bhí trí cruinnighe de'n Choisde seo agus na leasuithe a tháinig ó'n Dáil agus ó'n Seanad glacadh leis an cuid ba mhó diobh. Bhí leasú nuadh ag tabhairt comhaicta do'n Choisde glacadh le Bille Príomhadach a caithcadh amach as an t-Seanad. Ba choir go geuirfí an leasú sin ins na mBuan-Orduichte. I d-taobh ceist an airgid ní bheidh cosdas na mBille annso leath co-trom agus mar atá sé thall i Sasana.

I wish to propose that the report of the Joint Committee be adopted. There have been three meetings of the Joint Committee. A number of amendments were referred to the Joint Committee by the Seanad and the Dáil, and most of these amendments have been adopted. There has been a new amendment inserted, empowering the Dáil to deal with a Private Bill, in case this Bill had been rejected in the Seanad. That was a necessary amendment to be inserted in the Standing Orders. As regards the financial side, promoters of Bills can have their Bills dealt with in the Oireachtas, at less than half the cost at present imposed on the promoters of Bills in the English Parliament. The amendment was suggested from this Dáil to reduce the cost, and we went as far as we thought was practicable to meet the promoters of that amendment. As there are a number of Private Bills awaiting introduction, I think it is important that those Standing Orders should be adopted. In connection with the Standing Orders it would be also necessary to have a change made in the date allowing the promoters of Bills more time, and it would be also possible to have Bills introduced twice a year for the first two years. When this motion is seconded, I have two further resolutions to move.

Mr. D. McCARTHY: I second the motion.

Motion—"That the Second Report of the Joint Committee on Private Bill Procedure be adopted," put and agreed to.

PADRAIC O MAILLE: I beg to move "That Standing Orders relative to Private Bills be printed."

Mr. P. HUGHES: I second the motion.

Motion put and agreed to.

PADRAIC O MAILLE: I beg to move—"That during the current session the promoters of any Private Bill may publish the notice of intention required by Standing Order 8, during the months of December and January, instead of October and November, and that the dates for the deposit of plans and documents, the notice to owners, the deposit of copies of the Bill, and of petitions against the Bill shall be correspondingly altered."

Mr. P. HUGHES: I second the motion.

Motion put and agreed to.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: In regard to the printing, I would like to ask if one may assume that these Orders will be printed in a shape conformable to Vol. 5.

that of the present Standing Orders, so as to make a companion volume?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes, that is the intention.

DAIL IN COMMITTEE.

COURTS OF JUSTICE BILL, 1923.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: On the motion of Deputy Johnson, the Dáil resolved itself into Committee to consider amendments sent in for the Report Stage. The Dáil will therefore go into Committee on these amendments.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The Dáil had passed twelve of the amendments on the paper at the adjournment. The next amendment is number 13, which proposes to delete Section 41. It is as follows:—

"To delete Section 41, page 10, and to substitute in lieu thereof the following new section:—

The age of retirement of Circuit Judges shall be 70 years, but the Executive Council may, after consultation with the Chief Justice and the Attorney-General, extend the age of retirement in the case of any Judge to 75 years."

That amendment relates to the retiring age of Circuit Judges, and it will be remembered that the President stated in Committee that it was proposed that the extension of the retiring age should be made by the Executive Council after consultation with the Chief Justice and Attorney-General. This amendment gives effect to that undertaking.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I would like to thank the Attorney-General for his action in this matter.

Amendment put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to propose Amendment 14, which is—"To delete Section 42."

This amendment proposes to delete Section 42 in pursuance of an undertaking that there would be an amended form of declaration for all Judges. That will now be found in Amendment 14, which I will move later.

Amendment put and agreed to.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. Blythe): I beg to move the following amendment:—

“To delete Section 43, and to insert in lieu thereof the following new section:—

Every Circuit Judge shall receive a salary of £1,500 per annum, together with an addition or bonus thereon calculated at the rate for the time being applicable to the case of a civil servant in receipt of the like salary with the right to bonus thereon. Every Circuit Judge who resigns or otherwise for any cause vacates his office after having completed fifteen or more years' service shall be entitled for his life to a pension amounting to two-thirds of his salary at the time he resigns or vacates his office, and every Circuit Judge who vacates his office owing to age or permanent infirmity, after having completed five or more years' service and less than fifteen years' service shall be entitled to a pension calculated at the rate of one-sixth of his salary at the time he vacates his office, with the addition of one-twentieth of his said salary for every completed year of service in excess of five such years.”

I think this meets the difficulty that has arisen over this matter. It provides that every Judge who has given reasonable service shall be provided for at a reasonable rate.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I should point out that there is a slight error in the text of the amendment as printed. In the fourth line from the end, after the word “entitled,” the words “for his life” should be inserted. This amendment will give Circuit Judges in the present year a salary of £1,736. I should like to point out that this amendment provides for the contingency mentioned of the possibility of a Judge retiring unduly soon after appointment. The provision at the end of the Section covers that point.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Perhaps the Attorney-General might state exactly what cause there is for inserting these words, “together with an addition or bonus.”

The PRESIDENT: I was going to intervene to ask the Minister for Finance to agree to a fixed figure in this case in order to meet the case put forward by several Deputies, both here and outside, during the early stages of the discussion on this matter. This is the one instance in the Bill in which, I think, a bonus is attached to salary. I think the Minister was agreeable to have a sum fixed at £1,700, without any bonus. If there was general agreement we might get that alteration made now.

Mr. BLYTHE: Since this amendment was put in I had a further discussion on this matter with the Attorney-General, and in view of the fact that the salaries of the District Justices are of a fixed amount, and those of the High Court and Supreme Court Judges are also fixed, I think it is probably undesirable to have a salary and bonus in the case of this one particular class. In these circumstances, I am agreeable to a fixed salary of £1,700. It will cost the State something less than £1,500 with bonus. I think the additional cost will be very slight, because we will not have the cost of living bonus fall very much below its present figure—certainly not more than twenty or thirty points, for a very long time. Under those circumstances, it will involve very little extra cost.

The PRESIDENT: That would mean altering the figure £1,500 to £1,700.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The amendment would, therefore, be to delete the figure “£1,500” and to insert £1,700, so that it would read: “Each Circuit Judge shall receive a salary of £1,700 per annum, and delete all words to the end of the sentence, and the new Section would read:—

Every Circuit Judge shall receive a salary of £1,700 per annum. Every Circuit Judge who resigns or otherwise for any cause vacates his office after having completed fifteen or more years' service shall be entitled for his life to a pension amounting to two-thirds of his salary at the time he resigns or vacates his office, and every Circuit Judge who vacates his office owing to age or permanent infirmity, after having completed five or more years' service and less than fifteen years' service shall be entitled for his life to a pension calculated at the rate of one-sixth of his salary at the time he vacates his office, with the addition of one-twentieth of his said salary for every completed year of service in excess of five such years.

Mr. ALFRED BYRNE: Might I ask whether anything could be done in the case of Judges getting pensions for their lives, and who are going away, to induce them to take up their residence in Ireland, instead of taking the money out of this country entirely? I understand that arrangements are being made by some of the Judges about to retire to leave the country and reside in England, drawing their money from the State here and spending it elsewhere. Perhaps some consideration could be given to that matter.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Perhaps Deputy Byrne would explain what he means by the words "some inducement."

The PRESIDENT: I think the Deputy refers to the case of Judges who do not come under the provisions of this Bill. I take it—and I think I can speak with some certainty—that it is not likely there will be anything in the nature of a trek of the Judges who are to be appointed under this Bill, and possibly if there will be a trek at all, it will be, on the part of those who left, back again into this country. As to those who left, or intend to leave, we have no control over them. They are part of a bargain we have made, and if they do not intend to remain here, I do not think any inducement we could give them would cause them to change their mind.

Mr. JOHNSON: Is it a fact that these Judges under this bargain are paid their pensions out of the Saorstát Funds, or are they paid out of British Imperial Funds?

The PRESIDENT: Their pensions are paid, as regards a considerable portion of them, from funds of the Saorstát, and are paid, so far as we are concerned, in accordance with an agreement. I understand the British Government has made up the difference between that and their salaries, except in a few cases. But it must be understood that their pensions are primarily charged upon the British Consolidated Fund, and, then, the British make application to us for the portion of the charge for which we are liable under the bargain made.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I would like, before we pass this amendment, to ask the Minister for Finance what the cost of this will be? Am I right in thinking it cannot be more than £1,600 a year, and may I ask how far that increased expenditure will be met by the passing of the last amendment which raised the retiring age and obviated the necessity of granting pensions to men at an early age, and, also, which provided that men who retire after three or four years of office, will not get the full pension. Will the whole cost of this additional £200 a year to the Circuit Judges not be balanced by the saving effected by the adoption of the last amendment?

Mr. BLYTHE: As a matter of fact, without taking into account the factors to which Deputy Bryan Cooper refers, it will cost less to give £1,700 as a flat rate than to give £1,500 with bonus. I cannot say what the exact amount of the difference will be, but without making any calculation, and taking into account the factors which the Deputy has mentioned, I believe it will cost less under this new provision than if the old provision were retained. I think the total amount this amendment will involve will be limited to £1,500. It adds nothing to the cost of the Judiciary as a whole.

Mr. JOHNSON: I take it that the principle involved in this, that it is unlikely that there will be any depreciation in the cost of living, will apply to Civil Servants generally.

Question: "That the new Section, as amended, be added to the Bill"—put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: I beg to move Amendment 16, to delete in Section 46 lines 30 and 31, page 11, the words "On such terms as to payment of the deputy out of the salary of the Circuit Judge or otherwise," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "at such remuneration."

The reason for putting forward this amendment is this, that the Circuit Judges will work ten months in the year, as compared with the three or four months in the year worked by the County Court Judges. While it might have been all right to make the expenses of a deputy chargeable on the salary of the County Court Judge whose working year was very slender, it is thought it would be too onerous to put it on the Circuit Judge, who will have a very heavy year's work. It is in view of that, that the amendment is put forward.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Question "That Section 46, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: I beg to move Amendment 17 as follows:—

"After Section 49 (vi.), line 22, page 12, to insert an additional clause as follows:—

(vii.) In proceedings at the suit of the State or any Minister or Government Department or any officer thereof to recover any sum not exceeding £300 due to or recoverable by or on behalf of the State, whether by way of penalty, debt, or otherwise, and notwithstanding any enactment now in force requiring such sum to be sued for in any other court."

This amendment is put forward for the purpose of enabling small debts due to the State to be sued for in the Circuit Court. It is felt that it will be to the advantage of the State, and to the debtors of the State, if it is possible to have these debts sued for in the Circuit Court rather than in the High Court only.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Question: "That this Additional Section be added to the Bill"—put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move Amendment 18:

"In Section 49 to delete lines 23 to 37, page 12 included, and in line 37 to delete the word 'also.'"

This amendment proposes to delete from Section 49 a proviso dealing with the jury matters in a Circuit Court and with certain topics which are common both to the High Court and Circuit Court. It is thought preferable that they should be put in a single clause at the end of the Bill, and that is now proposed to be done by Amendment 40.

Amendment put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move Amendment 19 as follows:—

"To delete Section 62 and to insert in lieu thereof a new Section as follows:—

"Save as in this Act is otherwise expressly provided, an appeal shall lie from any judgment or order of the Circuit Court in civil cases to two judges of the High Court sitting in Dublin. If such two judges agree in their opinion, their decision shall be final unless they certify that their decision involves a question of law or fact of such importance as to be fit to be the subject of an appeal to the Supreme Court, in which case an appeal shall lie at the instance of any party from the decision of such two judges to the Supreme Court. If such two judges differ in their opinion, they shall affirm with costs the judgment or order appealed against, and an appeal shall lie at the instance of any party from such affirmation to the Supreme Court."

This amendment is introduced to meet certain objections put forward by Deputy Redmond and Deputy Magennis on the subject of appeals from the Circuit Court to the High Court. In the Bill, as it stands, there was a provision that the appeal should be, in the first instance, to two Judges of the High Court, with power of further appeal, in case of their disagreement, to the same Court with a Judge of the Supreme Court of Appeal added. That form of proceeding apparently has not been found acceptable, and this amendment sets out a new proposal which, I think, will be found more acceptable. Under this amendment, an appeal can be taken from the Circuit Court to two Judges of the High Court, and, if they agree, their decision will be final, unless they certify that there is some question of law or of importance that should be taken further. If they disagree, then the decision of the Court below is to stand, subject to the right of a further appeal to the Court of Appeal, which is to be open to either party as of right. I think this is a simple proceeding, and is a reasonable way of meeting the objections that were raised. The new Section will read as I have moved it above. I believe I can say that the amendment, in the form of this new Section, meets with the approval of the Bar.

Mr. A. BYRNE: I have not a copy of the Bill before me, but as well as I recollect this amendment deals with a Section under which two Judges, and two Judges only, shall be allowed to give a decision, a majority decision of the Court, and that the opinion of the third Judge, although he differs from the other two Judges, is not to be announced. I think this is a rather grave mistake.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I should like to point out that the Deputy is mistaken in his view. Apparently he has not read the Section.

Mr. BYRNE: The Attorney-General in his statement, said that the decision of the two Judges would be final. I think if the third Judge disagrees with them in their judgment, that his opinion ought also to be announced.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I should like to point out to the Deputy that there are only two Judges. There is no question of a third Judge.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Question: "That the new Section be added to the Bill"—put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move Amendment 20, which is to delete Section 63. This amendment is consequential on the previous one, Amendment 19.

Amendment put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move Amendment 21 as follows:—

In Section 67, line 49, page 14, to add immediately after the word "Ireland" the following words:—

"Provided that at least two members of the Committee shall be certified by the Minister for Home Affairs as possessing an adequate knowledge of the Irish language."

This amendment gives effect to an undertaking which I gave here to Deputy O'Maille that some 4 o'clock. provision would be introduced making it necessary to have on the rule-making authority some members who would be familiar with the Irish language, and who would, consequently, be capable of making rules which would provide for its use without inconvenience and without disadvantage to the parties interested.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 67, as amended, ordered, to stand part of the Bill.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move Amendment 22:—

"To delete Section 69."

That Section provided for laying certain Rules of Court before the Oireachtas. It is now proposed to have a Section at the end—Amendment No. 46—which covers the Rules of all Courts.

Amendment agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move Amendment 23:—

In Section 72, line 30, page 15, to insert immediately after the figures "1923" the following words:—

"But service as a judge of the Dáil Supreme Court as defined in the Dáil Eireann Courts (Winding-Up) Act, 1923 (No. 36 of 1923) or as a Judicial Commissioner appointed under that Act, shall be deemed practice at the Bar for the purpose of this provision."

This amendment amends the qualifications set out in Section 72 for appointments by proposing to insert that service as a Judge in the Dáil Supreme Court, as defined in the Dáil Eireann Courts (Winding-Up) Act, or as a Judicial Commissioner appointed under that Act, shall be deemed to be practice at the Bar for the purpose of this provision. I suggest that this remedies an obvious but quite unintentional omission.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 72, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move Amendment 24:—

“To delete Section 73.”

This proposes to delete Section 73 and leads up to Amendment 44 which follows.

Amendment agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move Amendment 25:—

To delete Section 75, and substitute a new Section as follows:—

“The age of retirement of Justices of the District Court shall be 65 years, but the Executive Council may, after consultation with the Chief Justice and the Attorney-General, extend the age of retirement in the case of any Justice to 70 years.”

This amendment gives effect to an undertaking of mine on an amendment by Deputy Major Cooper. It will be remembered that Deputy Magennis's amendment was defeated on a division. It proposed to make the normal retiring age for a District Justice 70, with power to extend to 75. It will be remembered that on Deputy Major Cooper's amendment, which he withdrew on the undertaking, I promised to consider the question of an amendment providing for a normal age of 65, with power to extend it to 70. This amendment gives effect to that promise.

Major COOPER: The Attorney-General has fully carried out his promise. I preferred, and still prefer, my own proposal, but he has entirely carried out the pledge which he gave.

Amendment agreed to.

New Section ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Mr. BLYTHE: I beg to move Amendment 26:—

To insert immediately before Section 77, page 16, a new section as follows:—

The senior of the Justices of the District Court for the time being assigned to the Police District of Dublin Metropolis shall receive a salary of £1,200 per annum, and every other of the Justices aforesaid and also the Justice for the time being assigned to a District comprising or including the City of Cork shall receive a salary of £1,100 per annum.

Every other Justice of the District Court shall receive a salary of £1,000 per annum.

The several salaries aforesaid shall be paid out of moneys provided by the Oireachtas.

This is to fix the salary of District Justices. It fixes a slightly higher salary in the case of the Senior Justice in Dublin, also in the case of the other Justices in Dublin, and in the case of the Justice who will have Cork City. At present I think the salary of the Senior Police Magistrate in Dublin is £1,200 per annum. There is no doubt that the District Justices in Dublin will have very important business coming before them, in view of the extended jurisdiction which will be given to this class of judge. It is also felt that in Cork city there will be very important work coming before the District Justice and that the salary should be slightly higher. The idea would be that the very best of the District Justices should from time to time, as vacancies arose, be allotted to these cities. The salary of the other District Justices is fixed at £1,000—the present salary. It is felt that that is a sufficient salary, and also that it is no less than a sufficient salary, having regard to the work they will be required to perform. The salary is not charged on the Central Fund but will be voted by the Oireachtas year by year. The reason for that is largely that the number of District Justices will not be fixed, as the number of judges will be fixed. It will give the Oireachtas annually an opportunity of saying that there are far too many District Justices and that there is no work for them. It will also give them the opportunity of saying that the Courts are congested, that there should be more District Justices, and that sufficient appointments are not being made. It is to be remembered, of course, that in other respects the status of the District Justices is not made equal to the status of the Judges, who are appointed by the Governor-General on the advice of the Executive Council, and who can be removed only in a particular way. These particular Justices can be removed in another way. However, it is not a matter of very much importance, but it is felt that it is better that the salary should not be charged on the Central Fund, but that they should be made a matter of submission to the Oireachtas or to the Dáil year by year.

Mr. WILSON: I would like to ask the Minister if the £200 per year travelling expenses for these Justices is still to remain, and if this £1,000 is the maximum salary for District Justices.

Mr. BLYTHE: The travelling allowances will remain.

Mr. WILSON: In addition to the £1,000?

Mr. BLYTHE: Yes.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I might mention that the provision as to salaries was deleted from the former Section 70, and I undertook to have a word with the Minister for Finance. This amendment is the result of that word. There is one thing I want to say, and it is this: Deputy Davin asked a question, which I promised to look into, namely, as to whether District Justices, if removed from one district to another, would be provided with their expenses of removal? I am informed by the Ministry of Finance that they would.

Captain REDMOND: I must congratulate the Attorney-General on getting at the soft side of the Minister for Finance. Certainly he is in an enviable position. I must also congratulate the Minister for Finance on this amendment. As regards the unique positions of Dublin and Cork I make no complaint, but I do think that the other two principal cities of Ireland should be put in a similar position, namely, the city I represent, Waterford, and if the representative so desires, the City of Limerick.

Mr. WILSON: And Galway.

Captain REDMOND: And Galway, too. Certainly I think that there will be equally as important work to be done by the District Justice in the City of Waterford as in the City of Cork. I therefore ask the Minister if it would not be possible to reconsider the question on that basis. As regards the wording of this amendment, I notice that it commences as follows:—"The senior of the Justices of the District Court for the time being assigned to the Police District of Dublin Metropolis shall receive . . ." I confess I cannot quite follow the meaning of these words. I would like to know what is meant by "senior of the Justices."

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: In rank. In Dublin there is a recognised position of senior Magistrate of the City. He receives £1,200 at present.

Captain REDMOND: Does that mean that the transference is to be automatic? If appointments are to be made at the same time does that mean that one of the appointments shall rank senior to the others? I understand that that is so. I welcome this amendment. Perhaps the Attorney-General might try the other ear this time of the Minister for Finance and put in a good word for Waterford and Limerick.

Major COOPER: The Minister for Finance will now see that in giving way to the Attorney-General he has opened a very wide door for others to assert their claims besides Waterford and Limerick. I really think the whole matter needs more consideration than we are able to give it at this Stage. Take the question of travelling allowances. Is it suggested that the Magistrates in Dublin are to receive travelling allowances? Probably their travelling expenses would be sixpence per day. Why should they have £200? In Cork, I agree, there may be important duties and responsibilities. It is ridiculous to give the Dublin Magistrates £200 if they live in Dublin. I expect the Cork Magistrate will need the allowance, as, like all Corkmen, he will probably live in Dublin. By the time this Bill returns to the Dáil from the Seanad I hope the Minister will work out some sort of scheme and be able to tell us whether the travelling allowances are to be applicable in Dublin, and whether the Justices here are entitled to them. This has created a dilemma. The Dublin Magistrates, if they do not get travelling allowances, will not be better off than the other Justices, and, in the case of those who receive £1,100 a year, will be worse off. On the other hand, if the Dublin Magistrates get the allowances they will be getting money from public funds to which they really have no just claim.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Before the Attorney-General or the Minister for Finance replies, I wish to ask, for the information of the Dáil, and not by way of criticism, if the amount allowed for travelling expenses is allowed to each Magistrate even though it might not happen to be incurred to the full amount. It might happen that the figure might be exceeded. Is it a payment made, or have the Magistrates to keep within it or to expend it, or is it made on returns furnished by them, or what is the method?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I remember when £200 was fixed at first, it was really a commutation sum arrived at with District Justices, then temporarily appointed. Of course, that commutation sum was really in the nature of an experiment, and was to represent actual expenditure on travelling. There is nothing in the Bill now that provides that anyone is to receive £200 or any fixed sum for travelling. It is a matter which must be vouched.

Mr. THOMAS JOHNSON: I am not quite convinced of the wisdom of the last paragraph of this amendment: "The several salaries aforesaid shall be paid out of moneys provided by the Oireachtas." I do not think a case has been made out for distinguishing, in this respect at any rate, between the District Justices, Circuit Judges and High Court Judges. If it is undesirable that the conduct of any Judge should be reviewable by the Oireachtas, or by the Dáil, then that should apply, I think, to the District Justices just as much as to the Circuit Judges. The Minister suggests that the question of whether there are too many such Justices might be discussed. There is nothing to prevent judgments being discussed if the salaries are to be reviewable on the Estimates. It seems to me rather to detract from the status of the District Justice in a way that is inconsistent with the intention of the plan. The District Justices are to be much more important than the old Magistrates were, and I think they should be placed in the same position regarding the source of their salaries as the other Judges.

Again, it is the suggestion of the political appointment, and I think that we should get as far away from that as we possibly can. One way to move from that idea would be to place them in the same position regarding payment out of the central fund as the Circuit Judges. I do not think the case for making the differentiation in this respect has been made.

Mr. BLYTHE: As a matter of fact, this amendment itself is, in a certain sense, a concession to meet the point of view of Deputy Johnson and others, and I do not incline at the moment to go any further than we go in the amendment. I do not think that it does at all seriously interfere with the status of the District Justices. As a matter of fact, the provision for terminating the appointment or the removal from office of a District Justice is a far more important thing than this matter of providing his salary in a certain way. I could give the reasons for the special provision in regard to removal from office, but that is not a matter dealt with under this amendment. There are to be a very large number of District Justices. There will be thirty-three of them. It may turn out, when the new code has been in operation for some time, that we will find that 25 or 26 will be sufficient. It may, on the other hand, turn out that we will have to bring in a new Bill and extend the number to 35 or 36. It will come out when we see how they can get through the amount of business they will have to do. At any rate, the number is large and it is not a number that we can fix. It is most desirable that we should not keep up a larger establishment than is necessary.

If, at any time, we find that the full number allowed by the law is not required a suitable and reasonable opportunity will be given to Deputies to suggest that the number should not be so large. I cannot conceive that there would be any discussion on the Estimates of the judgments of District Justices. I cannot conceive that any other question would be discussed in any way that would be serious or would reflect on anything other than the number, or that any Deputy would attempt the discussion of any matter that did not properly arise, having regard to the fact that these were people charged with the administration of justice. I cannot think that cases would be brought up or that magistrates would be arraigned or that any opportunity would be taken to attack individuals. I do not see that the matter is one in which any alteration of the amendment is required in respect of this particular clause.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: May I point out as regards the suggestion of anything political in this matter, upon which I am certainly very jealous, that the mode of appointment is the same as in the case of all other Judges, and that the mode of removal or dismissal from office takes away every shred of possibility for suggesting that there could be anything political in relation to their actions.

Mr. JOHNSON: In respect of the remarks of the Minister I think that it may be within his knowledge, if he scours his memory, that frequently magistrates' decisions have been a subject of discussion in the British House of Commons, and Judges' decisions are taboo; they cannot be discussed. That is quite possible under this, and I think that whatever we may desire in the matter the fact that magistrates' salaries are paid out of moneys provided by the Oireachtas rather makes it possible. There is no rule to the contrary, and you could not prevent Deputies raising questions as to decisions, whereas you could prevent it in the case of a Circuit Judge or of a High Court Judge.

Captain REDMOND: I think there is a great deal indeed in the question raised by Deputy Johnson, and for this reason. Either these District Justices are judges or they are not. If they are judges, according to Article 68 of the Constitution they shall be appointed in a certain manner and they shall be remunerated in a certain manner. Up to this I think that we in these discussions have treated these District Justices as judges, and the reason is obvious. As Deputy Johnson has said, in the British House of Commons, and perhaps elsewhere, magistrates' decisions are always open to discussion and supervision and are constantly discussed, but judge's judgments never; and under Article 69 it is stated that "all judges shall be independent in the exercise of their functions and subject only to the Constitution and the law." I certainly think that this points to the distinction which seems to be drawn here between District Justices and judges. If the Government will say that these are not judges, very good; then we will know where we are.

If they will say they are only to be a replica of the old system of Removable Magistrates, then we also know where we are, but if they are to be called judges, and not to be subject to the same regulations as are laid down in black and white in Articles 68 and 69 of the Constitution, then I say that we are in a fog about the proper character and status of these judicial servants of the State, and I think it is well, at this stage, before any matters which might lead to heated controversy or debate might arise that this question of status should be here and now determined. Before we pass this amendment, I think it would be well if the Attorney-General could assure us on this point, whether these District Justices are to be treated as judges or merely as nominated magistrates. Undoubtedly it will be within the right, and perhaps it may be the duty, of Deputies to bring forward for discussion decisions of these Justices, if they are to be treated as ordinary justices and not as judges. Therefore, I think Deputy Johnson has, I am sure in no capricious way, done a great service, and has anticipated possible events which might lead to trouble by raising this question now. In asking, as I do, for such an assurance, I feel that I am not only asking for worthy and proper information, but also that I am doing something towards placing the Government in a position to tell us and the country whether these judges are to be judges, or whether they are merely to be Removable Magistrates.

Mr. O'CONNELL: The only argument put forward by the Minister in favour of this particular Clause relates to the question which, he says, may need to be discussed in the Dáil—that is the question as to whether or not there are sufficient Justices to deal with all the work which may have to be done, or whether the number of Justices is too many. I submit the proper Vote under which to discuss a matter of that kind would be on the salary of the Minister for Justice, and not on the District Justices Vote. In any case, certainly, the question he mentioned could be discussed on the Vote of the Ministry of Justice, and under that it might be confined to the question of whether or not sufficient arrangements had been made for the proper administration of justice, but, as Deputy Johnson rightly says, if there is to be a vote on the District Justices salary here you cannot, I respectfully submit, prevent a Deputy who wishes, no matter what we may think of the action of such a Deputy, discussing the actions of any District Justice, whose salary he is asked to vote for.

Major COOPER: One rather important constitutional point is involved in this. If the Oireachtas is asked to vote money it is bound to see that the money is properly expended, and you cannot shut out of debate the question of the competence of any one of these people for whom the money is voted. It could not be done. If, say a District Justice took some individual view of law, and his judgments were normally reversed on appeal, you would be almost bound to have that case coming up and being discussed. If he is to be removed, it is better he should be removed as a result of the fiat of the Minister of Justice, rather than as a result of a debate in the Dáil. Take such a situation as exists in the County Waterford, where there is a violent labour dispute, and assume that a District Justice habitually gave his decision on one side or the other, Deputies representing labour, or representing the farmers, would find themselves under almost intolerable pressure from their supporters outside the Dáil to have that magistrate's conduct discussed. I do not think it is fair to place Deputies in that position. Their supporters will say "You have power to raise this under the Statute, why do you not use it?" However reluctant they may be, feeling it was wrong to have these matters discussed, they would find it very difficult to turn down their supporters. I would urge the Government to consider the danger this course exposes them to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I am sure Deputy Johnson will appreciate the tribute of Deputy Redmond, but whether he will equally appreciate the mischievous suggestion that these District Justices are to be put in the position of the old Removable Magistrates, I do not know—a thoroughly mischievous suggestion, when an attempt is being made to set up a judiciary which will meet with the general acceptance of the people and have their confidence. In answer to the question being directed to or at me, referring to Articles 68 and 69 of the Constitution, it is perfectly clear that the District Justices are Judges, and that view of their office has been acted on by the Government, which has in every instance had them appointed by the process presented for the appointment of Judges in the Constitution. Further, Article 69 provided that all Judges, which includes District Justices, shall be independent in the exercise of their functions. Independent of what? Independent of everything, save the law and the Constitution. And if any Deputy should be urged to raise the question here with reference to the exercise of any Judge's functions, I should think, though I should not venture to anticipate the decision or ruling that might be given, it would rest with the Ceann Comhairle to apply this provision of the Constitution in his decision as to whether such a discussion should be permitted. It seems perfectly clear the Article applies to all judges, and they are declared to be independent in the exercise of their functions.

Mr. JOHNSON: It seems to me that the statement made by the Attorney-General strengthens the case for placing the salaries of the District Justices upon the Central Fund. I am glad to have the assurance of the Attorney-General that the District Justices shall be classed as judges, as defined by the Constitution, and that they shall be independent, subject only to the Constitution and the law. Nevertheless, if we are going to be free to discuss the salaries, we can, even within that clause of the Constitution, discuss the fitness of any particular magistrate to carry out the law, and we can cite instances which, in our view, support our contention that he is not fit to carry out his functions. We might, apart from the law or the Constitution, be free to cite his general conduct of cases, to cite his associations; and in many ways, quite within the clauses of the Constitution, it would be competent for a Deputy to discuss the fitness of a District Justice to fill his position and the temptation will always be there. I know a good many people would prefer that the judges should be subject to that criticism, but being conservative, I am in favour of placing the position of District Justice in this respect in the same category with the higher judges. I am inclined to think that the argument of the Attorney-General strengthens the case for placing the salaries upon the Central Fund.

Captain REDMOND: I am very glad to hear from the Attorney-General, authoritatively now, that these District Justices are judges. That being so, of course they must be bound by the regulations of the Constitution. And I must say I was shocked to hear from the lips of the Attorney-General the suggestion, because it is an exceedingly undemocratic and unparliamentary one, that when the salary is voted by this Dáil, any matter with which that salary is concerned might possibly be ruled out of the discussion by the occupant of the Chair at the time. I say that that is the most far-fetched doctrine of parliamentary institutions that I have ever heard. What is the object of having the salary passed each year? It must have one object and one object alone, and that is to determine whether the recipient of the salary is deserving of the salary, whether the amount of the salary is just or unjust, and whether the conduct of the recipient of that salary merits the continuance in office of himself and his enjoyment of future salary. But for a Minister, and especially for the Attorney-General, to come forward and suggest that out of the mouth of the Ceann Comhairle should come forth a ruling that on the vote of a salary the matters with which that salary is concerned should not be fully and freely and openly discussed, to my mind, that goes back very far indeed to the days of oligarchies. However, not believing for a moment that any Speaker in any modern democratically constituted assembly would dare to give such a decision, I certainly would urge upon the Government the reconsideration of this amendment. The District Justices are judges. Well, if they are judges, let them be treated as judges. What is the reason for this differentiation?

As Deputy Johnson has said, it might be well if we could revise the conduct and judgments of judges everywhere. But that is not according to the Constitution. The judges are to be independent in the exercise of their functions. Of course by independence is meant independent of criticism of the constitutionally elected Assembly of the country, just as independent of anything else. But, the Attorney-General has characterised as mischievous my suggestion that these Justices, if they are not to be judges, should be treated as the old Removable Magistrates were. He has characterised that remark as mischievous. All I can say is that the primary objection to the old Removable Magistrates was that they were not independent of the Executive. It was not so much to their personnel. It was not even so much to their method of appointment, but the primary objection to them was that they were not in the position of independent justices. The objection was this, namely, that their actions and their judgments might be and constantly were revisable by Par-

[Captain Redmond.] liament. That is, I say, precisely the position that these judges, as we may now call them, will be in if they are not treated in every way, both as to appointment and remuneration, and as above all the possibility of their conduct being discussed or revised precisely the same as their brother judges of the Supreme Court, the High Court or the Circuit Court. If it is the intention of the Government that their actions should not be discussed here, as appears evident from the Attorney-General's suggestion to the present Ceann Comhairle, then why not place them in the independent position that the judges will be placed in, by having their remuneration paid from the central fund and not subject to a yearly revision by a vote taken on their salary in this Dáil? I see no reason for differentiation. If these judges are to be treated as independent judges why should they not receive their pay in a manner similar to the other judges? No answer has been given to that question. No case has been put forward for differentiation beyond saying that there may be too many of them appointed. I do not think there is any reason why the numbers should not be reduced. Judges have been reduced in numbers in the past. There is no reason why vacancies should be filled up if there are too many of them appointed.

Mr. BLYTHE: Hear, hear.

Captain REDMOND: The Minister for Finance applauds that and I can quite understand his reasons, but I think it is more likely that there will be too few appointed, but that is entirely a matter of opinion.

What I would say is this: Before the Government differentiate, as they are doing by this amendment, in their treatment of these Judges from any other Judges, they should give some sound reason for doing so, especially if they want to regard these Judges as independent Judges, in the same light and under the same terms of appointment as their brother Judges of the Supreme, High and Circuit Courts.

Mr. JOHNSON: There is one point I wish to make, and I think both the Minister for Finance and the Attorney-General will appreciate it. The Attorney-General has said—and I quite accept his word—that it is far from the intention to bring the District Justices into the political arena in any way. I put it to the Ministers as a possibility—and even a probability—that you may have a vote of confidence or a vote of no confidence moved. You may have a vote for the reduction of the salary of the Minister for Justice, and the whole issue might be the conduct of certain Justices. That is quite possible within this scheme. The Ministry would be in the position of defending a Justice. The attack would be on the Ministry, because of the conduct of a Justice, and you would have the Justice by that means brought into a political controversy. That may not happen within this Parliament, but it is quite within the possibility of this scheme, as outlined in the Bill. It is very desirable that we should guard against it, and unless there is some very strong reason for bringing the Justices into the annual vote, which reason we have not yet heard, I would urge the desirability of placing their salaries on the Central Fund.

Mr. BLYTHE: I do not want to anticipate what the ruling of the Ceann Comhairle would be, but I do not anticipate there would be any improper discussion in the Dáil in regard to the conduct of District Justices. I do not, of course, know what any irresponsible individual Deputy might do, but if he did not do what would commend itself to the Dáil, he would get his answer, and the District Justices would not be hurt. There would be no reason for not having these salaries on the Central Fund if we were to decide that there would be thirty-three District Justices, neither more nor less; but it might well be that a great deal less than thirty-three would be sufficient. In the circumstances, I think it is desirable that the salaries of District Justices should not be excluded from review by the Dáil from time to time.

Mr. WILSON: I would like the Dáil clearly to understand the position with regard to travelling allowances. The Minister for Finance said that there would be £200 a year paid to each District Justice for travelling expenses. The Attorney-General said the expenses will have to be vouched for. If a man is vouching for his expenses, does it mean that he is to be kept under the £200, or can he put in whatever figure he likes, or whatever the actual figure might be? Suppose his expenses reach £500, would he get that amount?

Mr. BLYTHE: That would be a matter for the Minister for Finance. He can make it less than £200 if he likes, or he can fix it at £200, or he may require vouchers for the expenses involved. Heretofore the most convenient way of dealing with this matter was to make an allowance of £200 in commutation of expenses. Naturally, where there was no travelling there would be no expenses. In general, it will be found most desirable to continue the arrangement I have mentioned, of giving a commutation allowance of £200. The Attorney-General tells me this arrangement was actually agreed on after consideration by both the Home Affairs Department and the Justices themselves. It is simply a matter of making an arrangement which will be fair to the District Justices and which will ensure that the finances of the country are properly safeguarded and that no undue charge falls on them.

Mr. MCGILLIGAN: I am not convinced that the Attorney-General has made a case for the exceptional course of charging the salaries of District Justices on money voted by the Oireachtas as opposed to the Central Fund. The Minister for Finance has stated as his reason for the change that he is not sure of the number of District Justices to be appointed. But in the case of the Circuit Court Judges, in connection with which it is stated that the number shall not exceed eight, he charges their salaries to the Central Fund. In the case of the District Justices a similar statement appears in the Bill—that the number shall not exceed thirty-three—yet it is proposed to pay them with money voted by the Oireachtas. I am still unconvinced that any case for payment out of supply has been made.

Professor MAGENNIS: It might be of advantage to recall how this amendment came to be in the original draft of the Bill. In Section 70 it is provided that Justices should be appointed at such salaries as the Minister for Home Affairs, with the concurrence of the Minister for Finance, may fix. It was pointed out here repeatedly that in accordance with the Constitution the District Justices are Judges.

We must not permit bureaucratic interference with the judge, no matter how slight, not even the possibility of interference. As the result of our appeals to the Articles of the Constitution this Government amendment was introduced. The salary has now to be, as the Constitution requires, determined by law—a specific salary is named by the present amendment. Instead of the objectionable control of a ministerial office being indicated the control is given to Parliament. Now, undoubtedly, that is an improvement.

The arguments I have heard just now may be summarised in this way—that there must be some purpose in view in differentiating between the other judges, as regards the sources of their remuneration and those judges that are constitutionally quite as much judges as the others. My first consideration would be—is the independence of the judge as a judge in any way jeopardised by the fact that his salary is payable out of a fund voted from year to year? Frankly I cannot see that it is. It is alleged that the District Justice, being a part of the administration, will be subject to criticism, personal, individual, criticism in this Dáil on the occasion of the estimate being under consideration. All of us are quite aware that the independence of the judiciary, which was fought for through many centuries of constitutional battle, was secured by dividing the functions of Government, as we have divided them in our Constitution, into legislative, executive and judicial functions. There is no room left by our Constitution, and, therefore, no room left by any law, unless it violates the Constitution, for blending the executive with the legislative with the discharge of judicial functions. and any Chairman of this Dáil that would allow a criticism upon the position of one of the judges as a judicial position to be canvassed in this Dáil would, by such inconceivable conduct, have violated the Constitution.

I am as strong as any member of this Dáil for securing the absolute independence of the lowest type of judge as much as that of the highest, but I have not been convinced by any of the arguments I have heard that the proposal to bring under review the amount to be expended upon these judicial servants is tantamount to an infringement upon the judicial independence, and that is the essence of the whole matter. If I could see at this moment, when the expenditure of the nation is under review, and when every effort is being made to satisfy the public at large that no extravagance will be tolerated in any department of Government, if at such a moment in the interests of giving such satisfaction to the people whose moneys are in question, if I could be satisfied that we were going to make economies at the expense of what is fundamental in the assertion and protection of the liberty of the subject, I would say: "Perish economy." The Circuit Judges, it is true, are a charge upon the Central Fund. That would appear to give them a special and superior status, but there was more agreement in the debates here as regards the numbers necessary for Circuit Court work than there was as regards District Justices, and it may be that we may have to increase the number of District Justices and re-arrange the provision for their expenses, and, if so, that could be done through criticism made available to this Dáil on the occasion of the discussion on the Estimates. That, I see, is a decided advantage in this matter, and I should consider that that advantage was more than outweighed if it could be shown that what Deputy Johnson fears has any reality in it as a fear. It is true it may be objected that such-and-such a District Justice was absent for so many days or weeks, or that the public complained that they were aggrieved by the delay in his Court. That indeed may come up. I concede so much, but that would not be criticism of a Judge as such.

Mr. JOHNSON: It would damage him.

Professor MAGENNIS: It would; but Judges of the High Court could also come under review as regards their conduct in precisely the same sense. It is not a question of discussing a verdict of a Judge, if I may say so. If a Judge took part in politics and went out and, forgetful of his high office, did something he ought not to do or neglected his duty as a Judge, is it suggested that he would not come under criticism in this Dáil, or could not come under it? Is there anything in the Constitution which safeguards him? I know nothing.

Mr. JOHNSON: There is only one method.

Professor MAGENNIS: What is that?

Mr. JOHNSON: A vote to remove him.

Professor MAGENNIS: A vote of censure. This is much simpler and much more acceptable, I have no doubt, to the District Justice himself.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Since a considerable amount of the discussion that has taken place has centred on the question of order, I may be permitted to put the point of view of the Chair on that question. The independence of the Judges is guaranteed under Article 69 of the Constitution, which reads:—"All Judges shall be independent in the exercise of their functions and subject only to the Constitution and the law." The word "Judges" is not defined in that Article at all, and we must look, therefore, for a definition of the word somewhere else. The first sentence of Article 68 of the Constitution reads:—"The Judges of the Supreme Court and of the High Court, and of all other Courts established in pursuance of this Constitution shall be appointed by the Representative of the Crown, on the advice of the Executive Council." The Attorney-General has told us, I think, that the District Justices will be appointed and have been appointed by that method. That being so, it would seem to me that the Chair would have to agree with the opinion of the Attorney-General that the District Justices are Judges within the meaning of the Constitution. Therefore, if they are Judges, they come within the scope of Article 69 of the Constitution and the Chair would be obliged, notwithstanding what any Deputy might argue as being in accordance with Parliamentary institutions or democratic principles, to rule out of order things which were against the Constitution. I think that if the salaries of the District Justices were on the Estimates it would be made clear, either by Standing Order or a ruling from the Chair, that the decision of a District Justice could not be discussed or reviewed in the Dáil, but I fear that the problem that would be presented to the Chair would not be solved by such a ruling, because, undoubtedly, when an estimate would be presented, to pay the salaries of thirty-three or any number of District Justices it would be open to discuss the fitness of such persons for the position. I think that could not be prevented. While their decision could not be discussed, I have great faith in the ingenuity of Deputies.

I have had some experience of it, and I can see that there are a great many things which could be discussed on that Vote, and which, while preserving the Constitution, would give very considerable scope to Deputies. I fear the Chair would be in frequent difficulties in endeavouring to interpret the Constitution. Would it be out of order, for instance, to complain that a District Justice in an area where there was a farm strike, dined every evening with the Chairman of the Farmers' Union?

Mr. GOREY: It would not be true; he could not afford it.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Would it be in order to complain that a particular District Justice, being democratically inclined, played cards every evening at the rooms of the Transport Union?

Mr. JOHNSON: He could not afford it.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I could suggest a great many points that could be raised, but that would be providing ammunition against myself, or some person occupying a similar position at another time. While I think it is clear, that having now established that District Justices are judges, their decisions could not be discussed on the Estimates, other matters regarding their fitness for the position could certainly be discussed. These matters, in the case of other judges, could only arise by motion. It is a matter I have not considered carefully, but I think I would not allow a Deputy to raise, say, on the adjournment in a rather casual manner, any matter concerning the conduct of a judge. I think the Dáil would be unanimous in agreeing to that ruling. Such a matter would have to be raised by motion definitely. Since the question of order has been raised I think it is only right I should present to the Committee the difficulties of the matter from the point of view of order merely.

Mr. O'CONNELL: There is another point I would like to bring to the notice of the Committee. If a vote comes before this Dáil I assume it is within the power of the Dáil to reject it. We might have the position that a vote for the salary of District Justices would be rejected by the Dáil. What, then, would be the position? The law provides that a certain salary must be paid to the District Justice. If the Parliament does not vote, it cannot be paid. I am open to conviction in this matter, and, honestly, I have heard nothing from the Ministry to convince me of the necessity of making this distinction in the case of a District Justice. No reasons have been put forward by the Minister or Attorney-General which would justify the discussion here, and which would justify this departure in the case of this Justice. One or two reasons which have been mentioned, that of whether there are enough or too many judges, and the other point dealt with by Deputy MacGilligan, are not sufficient to justify this very important departure from the practice in the case of the other judges.

Mr. BLYTHE: The Dáil could equally refuse to vote taxes, and there would be no salaries available out of the Central Fund.

Professor MAGENNIS: Might I say as a species of reply to Deputy O'Connell that I regard this differentiation as a sort of legitimate compromise, because there is more uncertainty and difficulty as regards the final decision with regard to numbers and expenses, involved in respect of District Judges than any other section of the Judiciary. It seems to me necessary at a period like this, a period which will last for not a few years, where cautious expenditure is to be embarked upon, and close supervision of expenditure to be made annually, that a question of this kind should be kept open, and this is the only way to do it. I agree with Deputy Johnson and his colleagues that it would be better to have no ground of grievance whatever, and no suggestion even of inferiority in the source of remuneration. I make this act of faith in the Ministry, that in answer to our demands on behalf of the District Justices, they bring this forward, that it is in their conception a reply to our demands, and at the same time provides those safeguards with regard to finance which had dictated the original form in the draft Bill. In years to come, when a new Judiciary Bill will be going through another Dáil, these District Justices will no doubt be put upon the Central Fund, but the reservation of their case here and now is in the interests of the annual review, and what Deputy Johnson urges undoubtedly has a great deal of ground for it. There is room for the abuse of the privileges of the Dáil, to attack a particular District Justice, to attack his appointment. You have already spoken, sir, of your experience of the ingenuity, we might call it the diabolical ingenuity, of Deputies getting round rules and regulations.

Mr. O'CONNELL: You can limit their opportunities.

Professor MAGENNIS: Undoubtedly it is wise to leave as few opportunities for abuse as possible. Here we balance our inconveniences. We wish to maintain the annual control over number and expense, and at the same time we realise it does not leave an opening for abuse in the way of unfair and personal criticism. That is why I said originally if I could see in this provision anything that attacked the immunity of this Judge, that laid him open to this departure from the Constitution to criticise his decision, I would not vote for it. I have spoken and voted in favour of it because I am satisfied there is nothing sinister in it.

Mr. JOHNSON: The objection against putting this charge on the Central Fund is that it would not be reviewable, and therefore the annual charge may not be discussed. That presents a difficulty to me. I can understand that the salary is guaranteed by the Central Fund. I cannot understand putting it on the Central Fund necessarily compels us to pay for any number of years thirty-three salaries on a given grant. Perhaps we might get some enlightenment on the constitutional and financial standpoint regarding the difference between the Central Fund and the Annual Vote.

Mr. BLYTHE: Putting it on the Central Fund would not compel us to pay annually 33 salaries. It means that the number of Justices does not come before the Dáil. It could be kept up to 33 even if the members of the Dáil generally felt there was no need for more than 25. There is a further matter: We could not put travelling expenses on the Central Fund. The travelling expenses of the District Justices will have to come before the Dáil in any case, and I believe you could get in as much talk on the question of the travelling expenses.

Major BRYAN COOPER: Would not the travelling expenses of the High Court and Circuit Judges come before the Dáil?

Mr. BLYTHE: The real point of advantage we are supposed to get by removing salaries to the Supply Vote will be got in any case if Deputies desire to exhibit that diabolical ingenuity in finding means of discussing the matter possibly on the question of travelling expenses when they come up every year. In any case, by keeping the matter a Supply Service, we do have an opportunity of considering what size the establishment will be.

Major BRYAN COOPER: May I ask your ruling, a Chinn Chomhairle, on a point of order? Is it, at any time, in order to use the word "diabolical"?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I think when it is not used about a particular person.

Amendment 26—"To insert the new Sub-section"—put and agreed to.

Question—"That the new Section be added to the Bill"—put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move amendment 27: "In Section 77, lines 2 and 5, to delete the word 'District' and insert immediately after the word 'Justice' in each line the words 'of the District Court.'"

Amendment agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move amendment 28: "In Section 79, line 28, to insert immediately after the word 'Justices' the words 'or a Justice.'"

Amendment agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move amendment 29:

In Section 79, A (ii.), line 38, page 16, to delete the word "land," and insert in lieu thereof the words "any land the Poor Law Valuation whereof exceeds £10," and in line 40 to add immediately after the word "title" the words:—"Provided also that the jurisdiction of a justice shall not be ousted by reason of a question of title to land the Poor Law Valuation whereof does not exceed £10 being brought into issue, but in such case the decision of the justice shall not operate as an estoppel in or bar to a suit in any court for a declaration of title or in ejectment in relation to such land."

LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE at this stage took the Chair.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: This amendment arises out of a discussion which took place on what was formerly Section 78, in reference to the question of giving jurisdiction in title matters to District Justices. It will be remembered that the controversy was really engaged in by Deputies from Tirconail, and that the shuttlecock was exchanged between them for a considerable time.

Vol. 5.

I then said it was a matter which had been receiving my attention, and that I would consider it further. It is a matter of some difficulty. It is well known that small title cases in the country are probably the cases that take up the largest amount of time in hearing, and that if ordinary title jurisdiction were to be transferred to the District Justices, in the full sense, their time would probably be unduly occupied. On the other hand, we have had experience of the District Justices jurisdiction being ousted by quibbling points of title which was a well known trick in the game. The present amendment is a compromise which I have arrived at after consideration of the matter, and which, I think, should meet with general acceptance even amongst warring Deputies from Tirconail, and I have the support of one of them at least in the matter. Under this amendment if small cases of trespass or assault are brought before the District Justice in ordinary circumstances the defendant's solicitor would raise the question of title, and say that an assault was committed in ejecting a man from a place where he had no right to be, and he would say he was exercising a right-of-way. Under this amendment it will be open to the District Justice to dispose of the matter as one of assault or trespass, as the case may be, and immediately settle the dispute before him, notwithstanding the question of title, and if the parties desire to go further and to have a full dress discussion of the question of title, which one gathers from Deputy Doherty are matters of a very difficult description in the Co. Tirconail, the decision of the District Justice in the trespass or assault case is not to be a bar from a full hearing before the Circuit Judge in a suit properly brought for the purpose of testing the question of title. That, I suggest, is a workable method of dealing with what undoubtedly is a very difficult matter. The amendment I propose to insert meets the difficulty, I think.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I wish to say that I am satisfied with the form in which this amendment appears, and I have to thank the Attorney-General for the way he has met the situation and for the manner in which he has met us by putting forward this amendment, to give title jurisdiction to the District Justices. It will be of great value to counties other than Tirconnaill. Tirconnaill is not the only county, although it has received from the Attorney-General some encomiums here about its warring propensities and I do not think it is the only county that is going to benefit from this amendment as far as litigation between small holders is concerned. This question arose in committee stage in the interests of small holders in congested districts, and these districts are not alone situated in Tirconnaill, but are to be found in many other counties and it was really a hardship at all times and rather intolerable that these people should not have an opportunity of settling their disputes in their own immediate area at a minimum of trouble and expense. The matter was not dealt with when the Bill was drafted and therefore for that reason the amendment was put down on committee stage. There is still another circumstance that makes it advisable and necessary that this jurisdiction should reside in the District Justices.

A great many small holders in these backward districts are people who have no language but their own language. They do not know the language of the stranger; they only know their own language, and as a consequence they are placed at times in the Courts and elsewhere at an intolerable disadvantage. In the Courts their evidence had to be interpreted. There is nothing that has given such satisfaction to the community in general as the appointment of District Justices who have a knowledge of the Irish language especially in counties and districts where Irish is the only language understood and spoken. The appointment of competent Irish scholars as District Justices in these Irish-speaking districts will be a real boon to the poor people and to others who can only speak their own language. These people can now come with confidence into Court and state their cases in their own language, and without being subjected to the difficulty and the disadvantage of having their evidence interpreted for them. It is to be feared, although I see there are to be two men with a knowledge of Irish put on the Rule-making Authority of the Circuit Courts, that there will not be the same advantages in this respect in the Circuit Courts. I would ask the Government to take good care when they are making appointments of Circuit Court Judges to carry on the business of these Courts in counties like Tirconnaill, Galway and Kerry, all of which are Irish-speaking counties, that the Judges appointed will have a good knowledge of Irish and will be competent to deal with all cases which come into their Courts. In many of these cases the parties concerned will only be able to give evidence in their own language, and hence it is of the utmost importance that the Judge hearing their case shall understand that language. I may say that in that matter I am very apprehensive, that is as regards the appointment of Circuit Judges with a knowledge of Irish in the Irish-speaking counties. I again desire to thank the Attorney-General for introducing this amendment which meets an objection I put forward on the Committee Stage of the Bill.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I just desire to say that the amendment moved by the Attorney-General meets the points which I drew attention to on the second reading of this Bill. The amendment, in my opinion, will prevent the frivolous raising of questions of title in order to delay decisions in assault cases or on matters relating to rights-of-way. The lawyer will now see that it would be of no benefit to him to insist, or to claim, that there is a question of title in a case in order to prevent or to delay a decision, because there will be a decision in any case, and he will have to go to another Court to settle the question of title. In that respect, the amendment meets the objections that I had to the Bill as originally drafted.

Amendment put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move amendment 30 as follows:—

“ In Section 79, A (iii.), to insert an additional clause as follows:—

of the State or any Minister or Government Department or any officer thereof to recover any sum not exceeding £25 due to or recoverable by or on behalf of the State, whether by way of penalty, debt, or otherwise, and notwithstanding any enactment now in force requiring such sum to be sued for in the High Court or other superior court."

This amendment is somewhat similar to amendment 17 which has already been passed. It enables small debts due to the State to be recovered in the District Court where they come within the District Court jurisdiction.

Amendment put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move amendment 31 to delete in Section 79 (b), line 48, page 16, the words "and the accused shall elect to be so tried."

The words in the Bill were originally inserted because of some misconception, and I am afraid the effect of them would be to make the jurisdiction, on the criminal side of the District Justice's Court, depend on the consent of the accused. That would lead to very serious complications. The words should not really be there at all, and therefore, I propose their deletion in this amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON: I am doubtful about the effect of this amendment. It appears to abolish the right of the accused person to insist upon a trial by jury. I do not know whether that is so or not. While the summary trial means a lighter penalty, the accused person will not be able to give evidence in his own defence if he has not any right to go before a jury. The amendment seems to me to remove the possibility of the accused preferring to go before a jury. I do not know whether that is the intention, but if it is I question the wisdom of it.

Professor MAGENNIS: Deputy Johnson, perhaps, forgets that that is provided for in the Constitution. In the case of minor offences, what would have been the claim of every citizen to demand a trial by jury of his peers is taken away. I think the original form in the draft was due to some misapprehension, that the rights of the citizens required to leave it to the accused to decide whether or not he would submit there and then to the summary jurisdiction of a District Justice, but that is really provided for in what is practically the last clause of the Constitution in dealing with the Judiciary.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The effect of this is really to enable the Court to decide whether the case is a minor one and can be disposed of summarily. There may be cases, for instance, of a very serious dispute which if it continued and led to a grave disturbance could not be regarded as a minor offence, and must be sent on to the Circuit Courts; but at other times the dispute is ended and the matter comes before the Court and peace perhaps is restored. In such cases, I think, it is highly desirable that the District Justice should be able to say that he would treat such a case as a minor offence and dispose of it there and then, and thus end all further trouble in the matter. The District Justice, under the Constitution, can only deal with minor offences, and this, I think, should not be a matter of election with the accused.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I think there is some misunderstanding with regard to this amendment. It is rather unfortunate and a pity that we should have amendments of this kind brought in on the Report Stage of a Bill, because Deputies are prevented from introducing at this stage amendments dealing with any of the offences mentioned in Sub-Section (B) of Section 79. Deputies, for instance, might wish to introduce amendments with regard to money or property not exceeding £20 in value. They might wish to limit the amount that the District Justice would have power to deal with to £10, or perhaps less, but it is impossible for Deputies to do so under existing circumstances. We have been inadvertently deprived of our rights in that respect, but I am sure it was quite unintentional on the Attorney-General's part. I think there is a great deal to be said for the principle of having minor offences treated quickly. I hope the Attorney-General will take to heart that he has unintentionally robbed us of the opportunity of putting down an amendment to his amendment if we desired to do so, and I trust he will see that such a thing will not happen again in the future.

Mr. JOHNSON: What I think about this is that there may be offences which in the mind of the District Justice should be dealt with summarily, but it may be of the very greatest importance to the accused, and he may desire to be tried by a jury. He may want an opportunity to have the offence, of which he is charged, fully investigated by a jury of his peers. While the clause in the Bill as it stands gives him an opportunity of saying that he prefers to be tried by a Summary Court, he still has the right to demand a trial by jury, and I submit he should not be deprived of that right. I am afraid he will be deprived of that right if this amendment is accepted.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: He has still his rights of appeal.

Mr. JOHNSON: Does not that involve expenditure that he should not be asked to undergo? After all, I suppose in 99 cases out of 100 the accused person would like to be dealt with summarily, but it is the hundredth person I am thinking of, where a person prefers to have the charge hanging over him because he is not confident that his character would be fully investigated at a summary court and prefers to go to a jury. I think we should make it possible for that individual to demand trial by jury.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: He can appeal against the decision to the Circuit Court. Of course, it will involve delay, but he can still appeal against the decision to treat the matter as one for summary jurisdiction.

Major COOPER: He would have to be legally represented in each case and have to pay a double set of costs.

Amendment put and declared carried.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move Amendment 32:—

"In Section 79. B (iii.). line 56, page 16, to insert after the word

'camera' the following words:—
'and when so heard, if the assaulted person is a female, one other female person nominated by the assaulted person shall be entitled to be present in court during the whole hearing of the case.'"

This amendment is in pursuance of an undertaking I gave Deputy Morrissey on the Committee Stage. It provides that where a case of indecent assault is being heard in camera, by order of the Court if the assaulted person is a female one other female nominated by the assaulted person shall be entitled to be present in Court during the whole hearing of the case. I think this amendment meets the matter much more successfully than the amendment that was proposed by Deputy Morrissey.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think what the Attorney-General has stated is true, but I submit to him this suggestion, that failing the assaulted person nominating another woman to appear in Court, the Court should do so, and to insert the words "nominated by the assaulted person or by the Court." That would ensure that though the accused person might be quite careless, or ignorant enough to fail to make any nomination the Court could do so, and should do so.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I am afraid I could hardly accept that suggestion, one reason being that it would compel the woman to have someone in Court when she would not want it and when she might desire the case heard completely in camera. It would also necessitate providing someone like a wardress or hired listener to introduce into Court when the person concerned had no friend. It would also, arising out of a number of discussions I have had on this Section, on which I have had several representations made to me, appear that people seem to look at it as if the female whose protection they had in mind were the prisoner. That is not so. The person concerned is the accuser, the complainant who comes in from outside and who will be entitled to bring her own friends with her if she so desires.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 79, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

ATTORNEY - GENERAL: I move Amendment 33:—

“ In Section 81, line 34, page 17, to delete the word ‘defendants’ where it first occurs and insert in lieu thereof the word ‘defendant.’ ”

This is a drafting amendment consequential to an amendment on the Committee Stage.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 81, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

ATTORNEY - GENERAL: I move Amendment 34:—

“ In Section 82, line 44, page 17, to delete the words, ‘deal with such charges against children as he may consider to be of a trivial nature in such manner as may seem just,’ and insert in lieu thereof the following words:— ‘there deal in such manner as shall seem just with all charges against children, except charges which by reason of their gravity or other special circumstances he shall not consider fit to be so dealt with.’ ”

This amendment is introduced to meet an undertaking of mine to Deputy Johnson with reference to Children’s Courts. Deputy Johnson proposed an amendment on the Committee Stage and I admitted to him then that I thought the expression “charges of a trivial nature” was hardly a happy one, and that I would try before the Report Stage to devise something more apt.

Mr. JOHNSON: I thank the Attorney-General for moving this amendment. It responds quite clearly to my desire in the matter.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 82, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Major COOPER: I move amendment 35.

To delete Section 92, pages 18 and 19, and to substitute a new Section as follows:—

“ The rule-making authority for the District Court shall be the Minister for Home Affairs, with the concurrence of the Minister for Finance in respect of any matter affecting public revenue or expenditure, and with the concurrence of the majority of a committee consisting of (a) five District Justices to be nominated by the general body of Justices, (b) two practising barristers selected by the Council of the Bar of Ireland, and (c) two solicitors selected by the Council of the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland. Each member of the said committee shall hold office for five years and be eligible for re-election, and casual vacancies shall be filled in accordance with the foregoing principle of selection. The Chairman of the Committee shall be such one of the five District Justices as the members of the Committee shall elect.”

In moving amendment 35 we come back to a matter upon which there was an amount of controversy on the Committee Stage. On that occasion you allowed me to move an amendment based on the Report of the Judiciary Committee, a report which in this instance the Government have completely thrown overboard by adopting a rule-making authority for District Courts purely of their own invention. The Attorney-General on that occasion objected to my amendment because it did not provide for the representation of the Minister for Home Affairs. I have been anxious to meet the Government as far as I could, and I have drafted this amendment providing that the rule-making authority shall be the Minister for Home Affairs, with the concurrence of the Minister for Finance, in respect of any matter affecting public revenue or expenditure and with the concurrence of the majority of a Committee consisting of (a) five District Justices to be nominated by the general body of Justices, (b) two practising barristers selected by the Council of the Bar of Ireland, and (c) two solicitors selected by the Council of the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE resumed the Chair at this stage.

Major COOPER: I hope this may prove acceptable to the Government, because it is precisely similar to a provision they have made for Circuit Courts, simply substituting District Court for Circuit Court and District Justice for Circuit Judge. When replying I hope the Attorney-General will give some indication as to why what is sauce for the goose should not be sauce for the gander, if one may talk of Judges in that disrespectful manner, and that he will tell us why he should differentiate between the rule-making authority for Circuit Courts and District Courts. He produced one reason which was, I think, that it would be much harder to select five District Justices suitable for this special work than it would be to select five Circuit Judges. That is what I understood, but I may be wrong.

[Major Cooper.]

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I wish to correct what I think is an unintentional misrepresentation. I never suggested that it would be impossible to find five District Justices who would be capable

Major COOPER: I am very sorry if I misunderstood the Attorney-General. I recollect him stating that considerations of distance might have to be taken into account. After all we may assume that Justices who elect their own representatives will take that into account. As he has accepted that principle I need not argue it further. The point on which I want an explanation is why a different rule-making authority is needed in the case of District Courts to that of the case of Circuit Courts. The second point is that the Attorney-General throughout, and in his amendment, has all the time insisted that in the District Court the rule-making authority should not be the Committee consisting of representatives both of the District Justices, and of the barristers and solicitors practising in these Courts, that they should not be an actual part of the authority but only assist the Minister; while in the case of the High Courts and the Circuit Courts the concurrence of the Committee, or a majority, is necessary. That is a very important point. Here we get back to the old question, the question of status, and why the District Justices are to be treated on a different plane to the more highly paid and more highly placed members of the judicial profession.

Having regard to the arguments with which we have been met, there does seem to be a certain intention in the Bill to put the District Justice on a different footing and make him, in a sense, not the servant of the people but the servant of the Minister; that he will be more under the Minister in a disciplinary sense, and more under the Minister's control than a Judge of either the High Court or the Circuit Court. I was very glad indeed to hear the Attorney-General say that the District Justices were Judges within the meaning of the Constitution, that they were to be—I think I am quoting him accurately now—independent in the exercise of their functions. But they are not independent in the exercise of their rule-making. They are entirely dependent on the Minister, and even though all the District Justices and all the barristers and solicitors practising in the Courts were to disagree with the Minister, they would have no power; they are only there to assist, and their concurrence is not necessary. One cannot help feeling that the Minister may, if he thinks fit, sweep away all the recommendations with one stroke of the pen just as the Government in this case have done with the recommendations of the Judiciary Committee.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: There are three amendments, and in amendments 35 and 36 the principle is the same, namely, to substitute the word "concurrence" for the word "assistance."

Mr. JOHNSON: There is a difference also in respect to the solicitors and barristers.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes; but the principle is exactly the same. The Attorney-General, if one might say so, is inserting one solicitor and one barrister. Before we start with the discussion of these amendments, perhaps we could come to an agreement with regard to the way in which they are to be dealt with. If we took amendment 37 we might be able to dispose of the question of barristers and solicitors, and then we would have the general question of "concurrence" instead of "assistance" on amendment 35.

Major COOPER: I do not want to press my point. I appear to have anticipated Deputy Johnson in putting on representatives of those who work in the Courts. I suppose he will now attribute other views to me. I will not fight the Attorney-General over the question of one or two. If he thinks it better only to have one barrister and one solicitor, I will not press that point.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Suppose we take amendment 37 then?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move amendment 37 entirely without prejudice.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Does Deputy Redmond object to that?

Captain REDMOND: I was going to say that the main point, to my mind, in these amendments is, not the number of barristers or solicitors proposed on this Committee, but rather whether they are to be there as assistants or part of the rule-making authority.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I think I pointed out that the difference of principle is "concurrence" instead of "assistance."

Captain REDMOND: Amendment 37 only proposes that they should be added after the word "assistance." I would suggest that the best course for us to adopt would be, as far as we are able, to decide first of all whether it is to be with the concurrence of these gentlemen or with their assistance. Having decided that question, then the question arises: How many of them, and in what capacity they are to act?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes, but there are two in amendment 35, and only one in 37.

Captain REDMOND: I do not think the question of numbers amounts to anything.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: If the amendment were put whether there would be one or two?

Captain REDMOND: If we were to pass amendment 37 it would amount to acknowledging the representatives of the Bar and the solicitors' profession as mere assistants and not part of the authority.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: No, that question will be open.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That will be still open on amendment 36, which proposes to put in "concurrence" instead of "assistance."

Captain REDMOND: I am agreeable.

Mr. JOHNSON: The real issue is not between "concurrence" and "assistance," but as to who is to appoint the Committee. That is the issue, because the Attorney-General's amendment must be read in conjunction with Section 94. The Committee appointed by the Minister for Home Affairs will approve by a majority—that is equal to concurrence. The question is: How is that Committee to be appointed?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: That will be open, of course, on Deputy Cooper's amendment.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputy Cooper has that in his amendment as to how it is going to be appointed.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think you raised a question as to whether the issue was "concurrence" or "assistance." I submit that is not the issue. The issue is, who is to appoint?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I quite agree; that is so.

Major COOPER: The point that arises is that in Deputy Johnson's amendment the concurrence of the majority of the Justices will be necessary, but the concurrence of the representatives of the bar and solicitors' profession will not—they do not come into Section 94. I would be willing to convenience the Dáil and the Attorney-General.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I think we will take the amendments in the order on the paper. Amendment 35 has been moved.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: On amendment 35, it will be remembered that the [Attorney-General.] controversy here on the last occasion was not quite as Deputy Cooper remembers it, but rather more like what Deputy Johnson has suggested. There were several points at issue, and I made certain offers which I have fulfilled in my amendments. I proposed that I would bring in an amendment to provide that the rules be laid before the Oireachtas, and I have an amendment to that effect. I also stated I would consider associating both branches of the legal profession with the rule-making authority, and my amendment No. 37 is my fulfilment of that undertaking. Deputy Cooper's amendment re-opens the discussion that we had here in Committee on the question as to whether the members of the rule-making authority who were District Justices should be chosen by election from the body of District Justices or should be nominated by the Minister, and it also raises the question of concurrence which I will deal with shortly.

I have myself never been able to see the cogency of the attack made on the subject of concurrence because I suppose for polemical reasons, it studiously and steadfastly ignores Section 94, under which it is provided that the rules shall be approved of by a majority of the justices so nominated, signed and sanctioned by the Attorney-General, the Minister for Home Affairs, and the Minister for Finance, and shall have no validity until so approved of, signed and sanctioned, so that there really is nothing to say on the subject of concurrence if one did not ignore Section 94.

Captain REDMOND: May I interrupt the Attorney-General for a moment? I cannot see any reference in Section 94 to barristers or solicitors.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I did not mention barristers or solicitors. I did mention the subject of concurrence, and perhaps these needless interruptions could be avoided.

Captain REDMOND: I am very sorry to interrupt—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I think Deputy Redmond refers to one thing and the Attorney-General to another.

The Attorney-General was speaking of the concurrence of District Justices.

Captain REDMOND: I was speaking of the concurrence of the whole authority.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The question of how the District Justices are to be selected for the purpose of drafting rules is, I take it, the matter upon which there is most controversy. I explained in Committee the reason why the Section was put in the way in which it stood, namely, that when you are selecting from a body of considerable number, certain persons to do a technical job—and I think most people will admit that legal draftsmanship is in the nature of a technical job—that the persons who are selected should be chosen for their skill in draftsmanship, and that the best way of arriving at the most skilled was not to circulate ballot papers amongst the body of District Justices in order that they might elect draftsmen from amongst their number. I suggest that that proposition cannot recommend itself to any reasonable person. You will have 33 District Justices dotted all over the country, and it must be remembered it is sheer confusion to suggest that the drafting of the rules of the Court is anything like the nature of the discharge of a judicial function. It is the doing of a technical piece of work which will come before the Dáil for final approval as regards matters of substance before it becomes effective, but to say that ballot papers are to be sent out to 33 District Justices and to put it to them to elect members of their body with whom perhaps they are not in daily contact, without an opportunity of consulting these persons, is, in my opinion, not a reasonable proposition. Moreover, the selection might be one of the greatest inconvenience, because draftsmen, during the time they are engaged upon this very difficult and very heavy task, involving the reading of many Statutes, Petty Sessions Acts, and so on, and the various existing rules, and the consolidating of them into a coherent, simple code of procedure will involve having a number of the Justices in Dublin for an extended period. If those who are to engage upon this are to be selected by election, probably every Justice would vote Number 1 for the Justice of his own district, and certainly he will hardly be able to consider a very important consideration, namely, whether the particular Justices proposed to be elected can be spared and their places filled by Deputy Justices while they are so engaged. The position of the Circuit and the High Courts is quite different. The High Court rule-making authority consists of all the Judges. They are all here in Dublin, all accessible to one another for frequent consultation. The rule-making authority of the Circuit Court consists of a majority of the Circuit Judges—five of the eight—who would presumably be accessible, probably residing in Dublin, or at least a number of them will. When you come to the 33 District Justices, I suppose everyone who has sat on a drafting committee would agree with me—I am sure Deputy Figgis would, if he were here—that a large drafting committee is not as efficient as a small one; in fact that even a Committee of one might be the most efficient drafting committee of all.

The object of this provision is to have a small selected number of technicians, chosen from the body of District Justices, to do a technical task here in Dublin until they finish it, and the result then will be laid on the Table here for discussion as to whether it meets with the approval of the Dáil. These are the reasons for adhering to the proposal as we originally drafted it. I have tried to give effect to my undertaking as to the submission of the rules and as to the associating of members of both professions who will be a check upon the operations of the Drafting Justices, and I say that the idea of concurrence is fully met by Section 94, where approval is required, and co-ordination of the rules with the rules of the other Courts will be secured by requiring the approval of the Attorney-General of the time of the rules before they can become effective. For these reasons I suggest that Deputy Cooper's amendment is not workable, is not reasonable in all the circumstances, and should be rejected.

Captain REDMOND: I note the concluding words of the Attorney-General.

He says that, in his opinion, the amendment is not reasonable and is not workable. I wonder does the Attorney-General remember anything about the Judiciary Committee, of which he was a member? Does he now say—

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Nominated by the Minister for Finance of the day.

Captain REDMOND: Nominated by, I do not care whom. I am not talking of its nominators but of its composition, including the Attorney-General. I wonder does he remember that in the report, which he signed, the rule-making authority proposed for the District Courts was with the exception of making no mention whatever of the Minister for Home Affairs, or any other Minister, precisely the same as the amendment now proposed by Deputy Bryan Cooper. Was it then unreasonable? Was it then unworkable? If it was, how came the Attorney-General to sign the report? If it was not, what has happened in the meantime to make it now unreasonable or unworkable? I have heard many plausible reasons put forward for departures from previous opinions or convictions, or even declarations over one's own signature, but I never heard a more flimsy, or shallow, or less substantial defence of such a change of attitude as that put forward by the Attorney-General. This Judiciary Committee, of which the Attorney-General was a member and a signatory, never mentioned any Minister in relation to any rule-making authority, and during the Committee Stage when I complained of the introduction of a Minister—I do not care who the Minister is—I was told by the Attorney-General that the same applied in practice both in England and in Ireland. Perhaps I may refresh the Attorney-General's memory—it seems to be rather lax in regard to the Judiciary Report, and it may not be perfect on this matter either—on the method adopted both in England and in Ireland in the past for rule-making authorities. All rule-making authorities in the past, both in England and in Ireland, both in Common Law and in Chancery, were made by Judges, and Judges alone. In the Judicature Act of 1873, which applied only to Great Britain, there was a schedule containing certain rules, but in Section 74 of that Act it is laid down that at any time with the concurrence, mark you, of the majority of Judges, that the Supreme Court in England may alter, annul, or make rules. There is no mention whatever in this English Judicature Act of a Government Minister. But what about the Irish Judicature Act of 1877?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I never said there was any Minister mentioned in either of the Judicature Acts.

Captain REDMOND: What about the Irish custom, where the Attorney-General mentioned that it was the Lord Lieutenant? His words were, in point of fact, that the Judicature Rules in this country up to this have been made by the Lord Lieutenant. The Irish Judicature Act of 1877, following the English one, also provided for a set of Rules in the Schedule, but Section 61 of that Act says that "the Lord Lieutenant may with the concurrence of a majority of Judges of the Supreme Court alter, or annul, or have power to make Rules." Why was the Lord Lieutenant brought into the Irish Act? The answer is very simple, because we had no Parliament of our own at that time, and instead of laying the Rules on the table of the British House of Commons, as was done in the case of the English Rules, the Rules were promulgated by the Lord Lieutenant by Order in Council. As for the Lord Lieutenant having anything to say in the making or alteration of any existing Rule, the Attorney-General knows as well as I do, that he was merely the means of having the Rules as made or altered by the Irish Judges, and by them alone, put into effect. Therefore, if anyone should have anything to do with rule-making authorities in this country it certainly should not be any Minister, but the representative of the King. If the Governor-General should be placed in the same position as the Lord Lieutenant was, he would be merely the means of putting these Rules into effect by an Order in Council and not be any party to the making of them. There is no necessity for that now because we have our own Parliament, and, therefore, our own Rules can be laid on our own Table, as were the English Rules in the English Judicature Act of 1873. When this question of rule-making authorities arose, as I presume it did, in the discussions—and I suppose there were some discussions—in the Judiciary Committee, why was it that the Attorney-General did not then propose that some Minister should be part of these rule-making authorities? No such thing. He assented, and he signified his assent by affixing his signature to an unanimous report recommending that the rule-making authorities should consist of the parties mentioned in Deputy Cooper's amendment, with the exception of the Minister for Home Affairs, or any other Minister. However, the Attorney-General has changed his mind. He is rather fond of change; but he is entitled to it also, and we must accept the inevitable. The Minister for Home Affairs is to be part of the rule-making authority. That, I am afraid, now seems to be a cardinal principle with the Attorney-General, and I presume the Government. Very well, if the Minister for Home Affairs is to be part of this rule-making authority he should not be the sole rule-making authority. That is my complaint. My complaint in the first instance is, that he should have anything to do with the rule-making authority, and my second complaint is that he should be the sole rule-making authority. He is not the sole rule-making authority for the High Court, nor for the Circuit Court. A member of the Government, Deputy Duggan, I think, moved that the word "assistance" be deleted, and substituted therefor the word "concurrence" in relation to Circuit Judges. So far so good, but why should he be still the sole rule-making authority for District Courts? It may be said that he is to act with the assistance of certain Justices nominated by him, and also the Attorney-General has been graciously pleased to add, to a limited degree, at any rate, certain members of the legal profession.

In the first place the District Justices are to be nominated by the Minister for Home Affairs. They are not to be elected as was proposed in the Judiciary Committee Report. Why?

Up to this, frankly, I tell the Dáil I do not know. I have got no answer yet that I can consider an answer from the Attorney-General on the point. He says that these District Justices will require to have great knowledge and great learning in order to be able to draft rules. Granted. Who is to determine their capacity for drafting rules? Is it the Minister for Home Affairs? Is he such a judge of District Justices' capacity that he is better able to judge them in that respect than their own brother justices? The Attorney-General talks in a very flippant way of sending round ballot papers. I wonder did he talk that way in the Judiciary Committee. The Attorney-General smiles at the suggestion of having an election of District Justices. I wonder did he talk that way in the Judiciary Committee. What is there more extraordinary or more impossible or less feasible in the holding of an election among thirty-three District Justices than among eight County Court Judges? It is only a difference of number. No other difference whatever. "But," says the Attorney-General, "Circuit Judges will be all round Dublin; they will be quite accessible." I thought this was a Bill to decentralise litigation. I thought this was a Bill whereby the Circuit Judges would be constantly at work throughout the country, and that they would not be settled down in their snug, contented homes in Dublin for three-quarters of the year. But now we hear they will be quite accessible. They will be really at our door. To tell the truth, there is no more reason why District Justices should be nominated than why Circuit Justices should be nominated, and I defy any member of the Government to give me any reason. So much for the point of nomination.

Now, we come to the question of "assistance" or "concurrence." I quite agree that Section 94 does provide for the approval of the District Justices, whether these District Justices were nominated or elected, as the case may be. In this case, according to the Bill as it at present stands, they will be nominated; but Section 94 says nothing about the position of barristers and solicitors, whom the Attorney-General has now added to the Committee. I admit he has added them in a very limited sense. He has added them only as assisters. He has politely told the Minister for Home Affairs, "You can take the opinion of barristers and solicitors, if you like, but their opinion will not count, it will have no effect legally." That is what it will amount to. Section 94, even with a limited scope of the barristers and solicitors on this Committee, entirely ignores it. I will be asked, "Oh, why should Section 94 have anything to do with it?" I would suggest that when we come to that Section, no matter in what capacity solicitors or barristers are placed upon this Committee they should at least be recognised in Section 94. Now, we have here a strange state of things. We have the Attorney-General and the Government producing a Bill, nominally in accordance with the Judiciary Committee which they have brought into existence. At one time they adopt the Judiciary Committee's Report and tell anyone who was opposed to it that that was not in the Judiciary Committee's Report. Another time they refused to adopt it, and, if anyone says that it was in the Judiciary Committee's Report, they as much as say, "Oh, we signed this yesterday, but we have changed our minds to-day." I think there should be some more substantial reason given to the Dáil for this change of attitude, and for this striking differentiation between District Justices and other judges. We were all delighted to hear the Attorney-General admit to-day that District Justices are judges. If they are judges they are entitled in this respect, as much as in any other respect, to be treated as judges. But, there is no doubt whatever that the placing of the rule-making authority under the complete control, as the Section as it now stands does, even with the addition of the barristers and solicitors and the Minister for Home Affairs, leave one to surmise that there is something at the back of the head of the Attorney-General or the members of the Government whereby they seek to differentiate between the status of the District Justices and other judges. The Attorney-General has fulfilled his promise by his two amendments.

I fully acknowledge what he has done in that respect, but I thought that by now he would have come to see, just as he did in regard to those two matters, that he could easily have gone the whole hog, that he could easily have placed the District Justices in precisely the same position in regard to the rule-making authority as the other Judges. I think it would be better for the sake of uniformity, and it would render the Bill a far more symmetrical one, and it would adopt the same principle in regard to all the Judges. I yet have to have it shown to me why there should be any distinction in regard to the method, the composition, or the manner in which the rule-making authority for District Justices should be set out, from the composition and the manner of the other judges. Perhaps it is not too late for the Attorney-General to relent. I certainly think that this is a matter of considerably more gravity than most Deputies might realise. The whole future of the working of the District Courts will largely, if not entirely, depend upon the rules which are made for the procedure and the practice of those Courts. Everyone in the country is concerned in them, not only members of the legal profession, especially country solicitors, but also every one who may at one time or another have the misfortune to come before those Courts. I think we deserve an explanation more substantial, and with more sincerity behind it, than has been given by the Attorney-General.

Major COOPER: I do not mean to suggest, and I hope I do not suggest, that the Attorney-General did not fulfil those pledges. He has fulfilled every pledge he made, but I think he will agree that this matter was left open between us. He promised to give it consideration, and I was free, if the result of that consideration did not meet with my approval, to suggest an amendment. There is one thing which I think was a little unfair; he more or less suggested I was in favour of a large Drafting Committee. I never in my life suggested such a thing. The Drafting Committee I suggest in this amendment is actually smaller than the Drafting Committee for the High Courts, and is the same size as the Drafting Committee for the Circuit Courts. When the Attorney-General was talking about the Drafting Committee for the Circuit Courts he rather confirmed my suspicion that he does not know the Circuits very well. He talked as if the majority of the Circuit Court Judges will be living within a short distance of Dublin.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: As a matter of explanation, assuming the rules are all prepared now, the District Justices are already appointed. They are all actually engaged on their work. The Circuit Court Judges, before they commence their work, will be here available to draft the rules.

Major COOPER: That was not quite clear to me, but I will not pursue it further; yet I am not entirely convinced. Now I come to the question of elections. I always thought that the larger the constituency you had to choose from, the better representatives you were likely to get. In choosing five Judges from eight, you might possibly get one or two not really qualified. If you have 33 to select from, you are much more likely to choose the five men best fitted for the job. There are arrangements for relieving District Justices while they are on their holidays. If it is contended that thirty-three District Justices are not fit to choose men to represent them on a rule-making authority, what becomes of democracy? Law-making is as complicated and technical as rule-making. Drafting amendments is as difficult as drafting rules, yet we can go into the streets and take every man and woman of 21 years and they can choose their representatives for this difficult and technical work. Now, the Attorney-General says you cannot trust thirty-three educated barristers or solicitors to choose for themselves a rule-making authority. Really, I am not convinced, and while I am sorry to be thought unreasonable, until I get more convincing reasons than those put forward I will stand to my guns.

Amendment declared lost.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move:—

“ In Section 92, page 19, line 1, to delete all after the word ‘ expenditure ’ to the end of the Section and to substitute therefor the words:—

‘ and with the concurrence of the majority of a committee consisting of five Justices of the District Court elected by the Bench of District Justices. Each member of the said committee shall hold office for five years and shall be eligible for re-election, and casual vacancies shall be filled by election as aforesaid. The Chairman of the Committee shall be such member as the members of the Committee shall elect.’

Amendment 36 raises pretty well the same question, and confines the Committee to five Justices of the District Court elected by the Bench of District Justices, leaving out practising barristers and solicitors. I assume from the discussion in Committee on the last occasion that the Attorney-General had an objection to practising barristers, and perhaps a greater objection to solicitors. I therefore thought the amendment, in the form in which it was sent in, would more likely meet with his approval than if it contained these two elements. There is no need to go over the argument again. I believe, it is unwise to leave the nomination of this Committee to the Minister for Home Affairs, who is a political officer.

ATTORNEY - GENERAL: Is this amendment not covered by the decision which has been registered? On the question of concurrence, the question of the number of Justices, and the mode of selection, I suggest the amendment is already disposed of.

Mr. JOHNSON: I do not know what the decision of the Dáil was. I take it the Dáil passed the inclusion of two practising barristers and two solicitors. That is not what I am proposing. The decision of the Dáil was against accepting the case. That is my proposal.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It is very hard to say what the decision of the Committee was. The discussion was on the mode of selection of a particular body, and whether the concurrence or assistance of the body should be in question. From that point of view I think the matter of concurrence, and the question of selection which comes into this Amendment have been decided upon, and seeing that a decision has been reached, I think a discussion on this Amendment could only be a repetition of the previous one.

Mr. JOHNSON: I want to ask the Dáil to decide that the Amendment I put down is an amendment acceptable. It differs distinctly from the amendment upon which we have voted. I do not intend to cover the grounds already travelled. I do not intend to urge reasons why this Amendment should be accepted.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Is it agreed to negative amendment 36?

Amendment put and negatived.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move:—

“ In Section 92, line 1, page 19, to insert after the word ‘ assistance ’ the words ‘ of a Committee consisting,’ and in line 3 to add after the word ‘ purpose ’ the words ‘ one practising Solicitor nominated by the President of the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland, and one practising Barrister nominated by the Council of the Bar of Ireland.’ ”

This is to fulfil my undertaking to associate members of the two professions with the rule-making authority, and notwithstanding what Deputy Johnson has said, I do not know which of the two professions deserves or has my greater affection. I may say I would be quite willing to amend Section 94 by inserting the names of the two professional men, that is by adding two persons who must approve of the Rules.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Ordered that Section 92 as amended stand part of the Bill.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: If I have agreement I would propose to amend

Section 94 by saying “ By a majority of the Committee consisting of the Justices named by the Minister as aforesaid and the practising Solicitor and Barrister aforesaid.”

Mr. JOHNSON: Would it be simpler to say “ Majority of the Committee aforesaid ? ”

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Yes, “ Majority of the Committee aforesaid.” I beg to propose that these words be inserted in Section 94.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Captain REDMOND: I am most grateful for this little crumb of comfort and I much appreciate it.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I desire to thank the Attorney-General for this acceptable concession.

Question: That Section 94, as amended, stand part of the Bill—put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to propose amendment 39.

To insert in Part IV. before Section 95, page 19, a new Section as follows:—

“ All existing solicitors of the Supreme Court of Judicature in Ireland and all existing Commissioners to administer oaths shall be transferred to and become solicitors and commissioners respectively of the several courts established under this Act.”

This is simply the removal from an earlier part of the Bill of what is a general provision, and which, therefore should not be included amongst the particular Sections. It is a provision dealing with solicitors and commissioners.

Amendment put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move the following amendment:—

“ To insert in Part IV. before Section 95, page 19, a new section as follows:—

‘ Nothing contained in this Act shall take away or prejudice the right of any party to any action in the High Court or the Circuit Court (not being an action for a liquidated sum, or an action for the enforcement, or for damages for the breach of a contract) to have questions of fact tried by a jury in such cases as he might heretofore of right have so required in the Supreme Court of Judicature in Ireland, and with like directions as to law and evidence, but no party to an action in the High Court or the Circuit Court for a liquidated sum, or an action for the enforcement or for damages for the breach of a contract shall be entitled to a jury unless the Judge shall consider a jury to be necessary or desirable for the proper trial of the action, and shall of his own motion or on the application of any party so order. Subject to all existing enactments limiting, regulating, or affecting the costs payable in any action by reference to the amount recovered therein, the costs of every civil action, and of every civil question or issue tried by a jury in the High Court or the Circuit Court shall follow the event, unless, upon application made, the Judge at the trial shall for special cause shown and mentioned in the order otherwise direct; and any order of a Judge as to such costs may be discharged or varied by the appellate tribunal."

This amendment transfers from Section 48 the provision dealing with juries in Circuit Courts and inserts it here amongst the general provisions at the end and applies it to the High Courts. It contains two new provisions to which I should direct attention. The first is that in an action of contract a jury must be asked for. That is, an application must be made to the Court to have a jury in actions of contract. In cases of tort a jury is obtained merely by serving a notice in the office. Here a judicial ruling will be necessary, and it will be for a Judge to decide that a case is one which involves issues of fact which should be submitted to a jury or whether it is a matter of law which ought not to be submitted to a jury. This part of the amendment gives effect to an understanding given to Deputy Good and other Deputies as regards the question of prosecuting actions of contract. In that connection for some years past there has developed in the High Court a system of non-jury trials for business cases which proved very efficient, particularly as developed by Mr. Justice Dodd who, since the death of Chief Baron Palles, has been the greatest common lawyer we have in this country. Under him a system of non-jury trials was developed. I think it will be found that that system in contract cases, many of which should be sent for account before an official, will be found satisfactory.

Now, the second provision is one which the Bar is anxious to have inserted. It begins with, "Subject to all existing enactments," and the purpose of it is this, that "The cost of every civil action and of every civil question and issue tried by a jury in the High Court or in the Circuit Court shall follow the event unless, upon application made, the Judge at the trial shall for special cause shown and mentioned in the order otherwise direct"; and then there is power of appeal on the Judge's ruling as to costs. The point of that provision is this: If the Judge in a jury case has still absolute discretion for awarding costs, notwithstanding what the jury's verdict may be, then the advocate has to trim his sails, and instead of devoting his attention to getting a verdict from the jury he has to proceed in such a manner as may not offend the Judge, who has a very serious whip in his hands in the matter of costs. It is the opinion of the Bar that this provision, which existed under the old Judicature Act, did not make for independence of advocacy, and the Bar is anxious that this amendment should be inserted in the Bill.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Question—"That the new Section be added to the Bill before Section 95"—put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move amendment 41, as follows:—

"To insert in Part IV. before Section 95, page 19, a new section as follows:—

"In every trial whether in the High Court or the Circuit Court of a civil case before a judge and jury, the jury shall consist of twelve members and a majority vote of nine of those twelve members shall be necessary and sufficient to determine the verdict. The judge shall so inform the jury and the verdict of such nine members or upwards shall be taken and recorded as the verdict of the jury, without disclosure of the dissentients, if any such there be."

This amendment transfers the provision as regards a verdict of nine members of a jury being sufficient. It is put here amongst the general provisions and applies to all juries. There is one reason in particular why that is necessary, namely, that doubts have arisen whether the old County Court Jury provision which provided for a jury of six, would not have survived in relation to cases within the old County Court Jurisdiction and so would have complicated the matter. This amendment gets rid of the doubt and applies the verdict of nine to all verdicts in civil cases.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Question: "That the new Section be added to the Bill before Section 95," put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move amendment 42 as follows:—

"To insert in Part IV. before Section 95, page 19, a new Section, as follows:—

"Every appeal from a judgment of the High Court or the Circuit Court in an action tried by a judge and jury, or from any other judgment of the High Court or the Circuit Court founded on the verdict of a jury in a civil case, shall be made by way of motion before the appellate tribunal for a new trial, and, in the case of an appeal from the Circuit Court, the allegations on which such motion may be grounded shall include the allegation that the verdict of the jury was against the weight of the evidence or was otherwise perverse."

This amendment provides specifically for the manner of appeal in the case of actions which have been tried by a jury. There were doubts expressed as to what the effect of the more naked form of appeal, as given in the original draft of the Bill, would be, and it was thought well that the appeal in jury cases should be by way of a new trial motion with the ground added, which has largely been excluded from consideration by the development of a judicial decision in recent years, namely, the ground of objection that the verdict has been against the weight of the evidence.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Question: "That the new Section be added to the Bill before Section 95"—put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move Amendment 43, as follows:—

"To insert in Part IV., before Section 95, page 19, a new Section, as follows:—

"So much of the buildings and premises commonly known as Dublin Castle and of the precincts thereof as shall for the time being be appropriated for the holding of any Court established under Parts I. or II. of this Act or for the use or accommodation of any judge or officer of any such Court or for the transaction of the business of any office attached to any such Court shall be deemed and is hereby declared to be situate for all purposes both in the County of the City of Dublin and in the County of Dublin."

This amendment is necessary for technical reasons. Originally the Four Courts were built under Statute and the same applied to Green Street Courthouse. They were both deemed to be situate in the County and in the City of Dublin, and the necessity for that was for the purpose of criminal trials so that in cases arising in the County of Dublin they could be heard either at the Four Courts or in Green Street Courthouse.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Question: "That the new Section be added to the Bill before Section 95"—put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move Amendment 44, as follows:—

"To insert in Part IV., before Section 95, a new Section, as follows:—

"The Declaration to be taken on appointment by every judge of the Supreme Court, the High Court and the Circuit Court and by every Justice of the District Court shall be as follows:—I do solemnly and sincerely before God promise and declare that I will duly and faithfully and to the best of my skill and power execute the office of Chief Justice of the Supreme Court (or President of the High Court, or Judge of the Supreme Court or of the High Court or of the Circuit Court or Justice of the District Court as the case may be) of Saorstát Eireann without fear or favour, affection, or ill-will towards any man, and that I will uphold the Constitution of Saorstát Eireann as by law established.

“Such declaration shall be made and subscribed by the Chief Justice in the presence of the Governor-General and by each of the other judges and justices aforesaid in the presence of the Chief Justice in open Court.

“Any judge or justice who declines or neglects to take the declaration aforesaid in the manner aforesaid shall be disqualified from entering on and shall be deemed to have vacated his office of judge or justice (as the case may be).”

This amendment is for the purpose of complying with an undertaking that the President gave to Deputy Magennis with reference to the form of declaration to be taken by judges. This amendment provides a form of declaration for all judges in all Courts and, in addition, provides for the effect of a Judge refusing or neglecting to take a declaration. Deputy Magennis suggested that the original form of declaration was not sufficiently solemn or awe-inspiring, and we have attempted to make it in a more solemn form.

Mr. JOHNSON: I desire to raise a question as to whether the form of this declaration is not in the nature of an oath and whether it is likely to raise objections from two quarters. Take the Society of Friends. Would, I ask, a Quaker be willing to accept such an oath in that form?

Professor MAGENNIS: It is not an oath.

Vol. 5.

Mr. JOHNSON: Well, I do not know. The declaration says: “I do solemnly and sincerely before God promise and declare.” I have an opinion that that may be taken by some persons as more than a declaration, and that it may be objectionable. I do not know but I suggest that the matter is worthy of inquiring into. There are other sections of the population, very small I have no doubt, but bearing in mind the Constitution, there may possibly be atheists who are capable Judges, and the question is whether this declaration would debar a person from getting such an appointment. I think this form is different from the affirmation or declaration that is required in the courts. I just raise this question but I do not press it. I have not made any inquiries in the matter but the question is one that may arise.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Under the English Promissory Oaths Act there is an actual form of oath provided for judges but by other legislation that was passed in the course of time in England it was permitted to substitute other oaths in the case of forms of declaration where persons' religious belief or disbelief did not permit of their taking the oath. I believe that the existing legislation in favour of such persons would apply to this if it is considered to be an oath, but I do not think it is an oath at all.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Question: “That the new Section be added to the Bill before Section 95”—put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move amendment 45 as follows:—

“To insert in Part IV. before Section 95 a new Section as follows:—

‘A person who has been a judge of the Supreme Court of Judicature in Ireland or a Recorder or County Court Judge in Ireland shall not be disqualified from being appointed a judge of the Supreme Court, the High Court, or the Circuit Court by reason of his having at the date of such appointment already attained the age prescribed by this Act as the age of retirement of the judges of such Court, and where such person as aforesaid is appointed to be a judge of any of the Courts aforesaid after he has attained the age of retirement aforesaid, the age of retirement shall in his case be deemed to be extended to the maximum age to which it could be extended by the Executive Council under this Act."

This amendment was introduced to give effect to an undertaking that I gave here that provision would be introduced enabling if thought fit the existing judges, even though they were over the age limit, to be appointed. The provision merely leaves it open to the Executive Council to 7 o'clock. advise the appointment should the Executive Council think fit, and I hope no one will regard it as more than keeping the matter open.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Question: "That the new Section be added to the Bill, before Section 95," put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move Amendment 46: "To insert before Section 95, page 19, a new Section, as follows:—

"All rules of court made under this Act shall be laid before each House of the Oireachtas within fourteen days after they are made, if the Houses of the Oireachtas be then sitting, or, if not, within fourteen days after the commencement of the next session of such Houses, and if a resolution is passed by either House within one month after the rules have been laid before such House to the effect that the same or any of them should be annulled, the rules or rule referred to in such resolution shall be null and void, without prejudice, however, to the validity of any proceedings meantime taken under the same."

This amendment provides that all rules of court shall be laid before both Houses of the Oireachtas, and so far it fulfils the promise made with regard to the District Justices.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Question: "That the new Section be added to the Bill before Section 95"—put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move Amendment 47, as follows:—

"In Section 95, page 19, to delete all from the word 'shall' in line 37, to the word 'Act,' in line 47 inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the words 'or the Divisional Magistrates of the Police District of Dublin Metropolis shall continue to hold office by the same tenure as heretofore, and to discharge the duties heretofore discharged by them or duties analogous thereto. Every question which shall arise as to whether any duties are analogous to any other duties shall be determined by the Chief Justice, whose decision shall be final.'"

It will be remembered that on the Committee Stage Deputy Duggan introduced an amendment providing for the existing staffs of the Courts and for their continuance, pending reorganisation, without prejudice to their position. This amendment brings in a group which had been omitted, unfortunately, in the original amendment, namely, the staffs of the Dublin Police Courts, and it also leaves the question of analogous duties to be determined by the Chief Justice.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Before that amendment is put I would like to raise a point, which is a purely drafting point, for the consideration of the Attorney-General. We have just passed a series of amendments, commencing with amendment 39, and all these are to come before Section 95. Now, the matter of amendment 39 seems to me to be clearly connected with the substance of Section 95, and should precede it, but I suggest that all the later amendments after 39 should follow Section 95. Because although both deal with the continuance of existing officers the later amendments deal rather with the question of procedure.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: There is really no substantial analogy between the position of solicitors transferred to act as solicitors to the new Courts and the position of the staffs of existing Courts kept temporarily in office.

Mr. JOHNSON: I would draw attention to the change in the form, and I would like to ask the Attorney-General if it means anything. It seems to me that while Dublin Metropolitan Police Magistrates are included, the inclusion only applies to the same tenure and duties as heretofore. Now, the Bill as it came from Committee provided for the same terms and conditions and the same salaries, and that they were to be entitled to the same pensions as if this Act had not been passed. I realise it is optional in the persons concerned to retire if the salaries are reduced or any alteration takes place in their terms, but I think some justification should be adduced for altering the provisions of the clause as it emerged from Committee.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I think it was considered that tenure would sufficiently cover all provisions. There is nothing sinister in the thing so far as I know. Moreover, if any substantial change were made other considerations would arise, because the Deputy will observe at the end of the Section the position under the Treaty is preserved. It was suggested that the thing as it stood might prevent promotion, and I think the expression, "by the same tenure," taken in conjunction with the terms of the Treaty, safeguards their position.

Mr. JOHNSON: I raised the question because I noticed that the words, "by the same tenure," were in the original, but the reference to the same terms and conditions was added to "tenure," and I think that probably "tenure" generally covers terms and conditions. I recognise the strength of the position about officers under the Treaty, and if the Attorney-General assures us that there is no decline in the value of the conditions, then there is no objection, but I think it necessary to draw attention to the matter.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The Treaty is there, and there can be nothing sinister in that.

Amendment agreed to.

Question: "That Section 95, as amended, stand part of the Bill"—put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move amendment 48. To insert after Section 96 a new Sub-Section:—

"Every person who shall at the commencement of Part I. of this Act have been sent forward for trial at Assizes or any other Commission of Oyer and Terminer and gaol delivery, and be awaiting trial, and every person who shall at the commencement of this Act have been sent forward for trial by the County Court Judge, or by any Dáil Court as defined by the Dáil Eireann Courts (Winding-up) Act, 1923 (No. 36 of 1923), on any charge excluded from the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court and be awaiting trial on such charge, shall be deemed to have been sent forward for trial by and shall be tried by the Central Criminal Court or, if so directed by the Attorney-General, a court of the High Court Circuit. Every person who shall at the commencement of Part II. of this Act have been sent forward for trial by the County Court Judge, or by any such Dáil Court as aforesaid, on any charge within the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court, and be awaiting trial, shall be deemed to have been sent forward for trial by and shall be tried by the appropriate Circuit Court."

This amendment is to cover the case of persons who may be imprisoned or who may be on bail awaiting trial, having been before the District Court and returned for trial before the Bill comes into effect, and it provides that they are to be brought to trial in due course in the new Courts. In the case of offences within the jurisdiction of the Circuit Courts the case will be dealt with as if sent on to that Court, and the same will apply to the High Courts.

Amendment agreed to. New Section inserted in the Bill.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: This concludes the amendments for which the Bill was recommitted, and the Committee will now report to the Dáil.

DAIL RESUMES.

Bill (as amended on recommitment) reported.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: When is it proposed to take the Report Stage?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move that we take the Report Stage at once.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Motion is:—"That the Bill, as amended, be received for final consideration."

Mr. JOHNSON: I move an amendment to omit from the new Section 26, which was inserted in Committee, the last paragraph, which deals with the salaries of District Justices. The amendment is to delete the words, "The several salaries aforesaid shall be paid out of moneys provided by the Oireachtas."

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Is it in order that an amendment of that kind which has actually been decided upon can be taken upon a Report of the Committee?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes, the decision of the Committee was to insert the Section, and the Committee has to report to the Dáil, which has the power of reviewing the Section as decided upon by the Committee, or making any alteration it pleases, I take it.

Mr. JOHNSON: The amendment that was passed in Committee, or rather the new Section that was passed in Committee, dealt with salaries of Justices, and it is quite in accord with one's desire that these salaries should be fixed, and therefore it was not competent to vote against the Section. But while the paragraph declared that the several salaries provided aforesaid shall be paid out of moneys provided by the Oireachtas, that seems to call for an expression of opinion from the Dáil. There is no need to discuss the matter that was the subject of discussion that took place upon the Section as a whole, and therefore I do not intend to cover that ground again. I just formally move the deletion of that sub-section.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I beg to second.

Mr. BLYTHE: Only that it might seem cynical I would accept the amendment. Even if the amendment were carried the Government would still have to come to the Dáil each year for the salaries, so that I propose not to accept it.

The PRESIDENT: The difficulty I see is that while it is laid down in Section 44 how the money is to be provided, the amendment of Deputy Johnson means that the method in which this money is to be provided is taken away. As there is no consequential provision it is open to question whether the Ceann Comhairle might not rule out the consideration of these salaries when considering the estimates on the ground that the machinery which was provided in this Bill has been deleted by vote. I do not know whether the Ceann Comhairle would take it upon himself to do such a responsible act as that, but I do say that there would appear to be some grounds for doing it. These salaries are not a charge on the Central Fund. In the case of Circuit Judges, Section 44 sets out that the remuneration and pension payable for a Circuit Judge shall be charged upon and payable out of the Central Fund. I can understand Deputy Johnson's idea with regard to striking out the payment by the Oireachtas, but without a corresponding amendment, specifying where the moneys are to be paid from, I do think that the District Justices would be left without their salaries.

Mr. JOHNSON: Of course I realise that the Minister could insert an amendment of that kind in the Seanad.

The PRESIDENT: Could the Seanad do it? This is money.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Seanad could certainly do it.

The PRESIDENT: I do not think they could.

Mr. JOHNSON: If the President desires that the form of the amendment should be altered I am quite satisfied.

Captain REDMOND: Yes, it is only a matter of form.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: An amendment to delete "moneys provided by the Oireachtas" and substitute "Central Fund" would certainly provide the District Justices with salaries and relieve the Ceann Comhairle of the enormous responsibility that this particular discussion seems to be placing upon him. The whole question of the payment of District Justices seems to be weighing on the Ceann Comhairle more than anybody else.

Mr. JOHNSON: Might I say that, quite apart from any question of form, I think it is desirable that the Dáil should declare itself on this question, and if there could be general agreement that the amendment should be put to the Dáil in this form—"That the several salaries aforesaid shall be paid out of moneys to be provided out of the Central Fund"—it would be a clearer issue to put before the Dáil.

The PRESIDENT: I would agree, if the Deputy so desires, that he should move the adjournment of the debate so that this matter might be taken up to-morrow in order to give Deputies an opportunity of seeing this amendment and having it put before them. I do see the point of the Deputy that a division was not taken on this particular matter, and that he probably would like to have a division. I do not like to take an advantage of him. I am sure he appreciates that merely moving out the part which provides that the Oireachtas shall make good the money does not cover his point.

Mr. JOHNSON: I realise that, but the Bill would be still a Ministerial Bill, and it would then be the business of the Ministry to find ways and means of inserting a provision for finding the money.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: It might meet the case if, instead of that particular provision, for the deletion of which Deputy Johnson has moved, the words of Section 44 should be taken as they stand, with the change of "Justice of the District Court" for "Circuit Judge."

The PRESIDENT: It would take a little time to explain that.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: It can be done now.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I asked if this was going to be considered this evening or to-morrow. If it is going to be considered this evening we will have to take the amendment. If it is going to be considered to-morrow the amendment can be altered.

Mr. JOHNSON: Unless the Minister is going to consider the possibility of acceptance it is better to take it now.

The PRESIDENT: We cannot say for certain how many of these District Justices will be required. That is a point Deputies appear to have given no weight to. It is possible we may reduce them to 25. We cannot say at present. We are dealing with an abnormal situation, even though it is daily and gradually becoming normal. We cannot estimate the number of these men that will be required. The argument has been that it is undesirable we should come to the Dáil looking for a Vote. It appears to me it would be much weaker the other way—if we were to say we wanted 33 and were to commit the Dáil and the country to that number, when possibly we could work down to a smaller number. At any time vacancies must occur, and if a redistribution were to take place, and if the Ministry continued to appoint and reappoint to those vacancies, then there is an opportunity left to the Dáil to criticise the Government for keeping up the service beyond its requirements. Everyone knows, I am sure, that for years past the work of a County Court Judge was looked upon, I think, as a sort of preparation for the next world—at least that it allowed ample time for preparation. We do not want to perpetuate that three months of work in the year. That is why we feel so keenly on it. Even if it is necessary in years to come to introduce a Bill placing them on the Central Fund, just now is not the time to stereotype the number at 33.

Captain REDMOND: Would it not be possible to create a maximum number of justices and not necessarily a minimum? Would it not be possible to set it out that not more than a certain number should be appointed, but not necessarily that a certain minimum must be appointed?

Mr. O'CONNELL: Does the President wish us to understand that if these salaries are now payable out of the

[Mr. O'Connell.]

Central Fund the Government must continue paying them?

The PRESIDENT: Not at all. There is no opportunity for the Dáil criticising it.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I maintain so that there is no point in the President's argument if that is the case. The fact that they are payable from the Central Fund does not bind the Government to have a certain number of Justices, and there is nothing to prevent them reducing the number of Justices, in view of developments, if it is advisable to so reduce them.

Major COOPER: We have got into the anomalous position of the Government standing up for the rights of private members and private members wishing to confer more power on the Government. I do not quite see the President's point because if it happens that the Dáil really and sincerely desires to reduce the number of District Justices, surely it would be easy to bring in a Private Member's Bill of one clause, and if there was strong feeling it would be very simple to get it through. In the same way if the Government wished to reduce the number they could do it by one stroke of the pen.

The PRESIDENT: We can do it now without one or the other.

Amendment declared lost.

Mr. WILSON: I would like to raise a point as to the expenses of these District Justices.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is on the question of the Bill being received for final consideration?

Mr. WILSON: As to why it should not be.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy is quite in order.

Mr. WILSON: I contend that the travelling allowance which will be supplementary to this £1,000 a year ought to be excluded and that the £1,000 a year should include travelling expenses. I do so in order that it may be definitely understood that we consider £1,000 a year sufficient for these gentlemen, who, by means of cheap motor cars, can travel around the whole area and stop at home at night at practically no cost. For these reasons, therefore, I should like to amend the Bill, making the salary £1,000 a year including travelling expenses. This is in aid of economy and we should have some economy in this direction.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE : The Deputy cannot propose the amendment at this stage, because he is proposing to amend the second last paragraph of the Section after an amendment has been taken to the last paragraph. Therefore, the amendment is not in order.

Mr. WILSON: When this particular amendment was passed we voted on two or three separate items, and there was no vote directly confirming the salaries of these District Justices at £1,000 a year. This particular item in this amendment was not debated and was not carried. The whole section as it stood was carried, and Deputy Johnson has moved on one matter. I think that I ought to have some opportunity of bringing up this matter.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: This is a new Section and it cannot be amended backwards.

Mr. BLYTHE: Might I suggest to Deputy Wilson that these travelling expenses will have to come before the Dáil on the estimates. If travelling expenses are allowed it will be for the Minister for Finance, who sanctions them, to justify that sanction and to persuade the Dáil to vote the money.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE took the chair at this stage.

Question: "That the Bill, as amended, be received for final consideration," put and agreed to.

Next stage ordered for Friday next.

Mr. WILSON: I would not have time to put in an amendment for the next stage by Friday. I would have to give proper notice.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: You can only move a verbal amendment on the next stage.

Mr. WILSON: This is a verbal amendment.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: I will leave the Ceann Comhairle to deal with it when it comes forward.

CIVIL SERVICE REGULATION (No. 2) BILL, 1923.

FOURTH STAGE.

Mr. BLYTHE: I move the first amendment which has been put down in pursuance of an undertaking which I gave on the Committee Stage. I think it should read: "In Section 1, line 27, to add at the end of sub-Section 3 a new Section as follows:— Every appointment and every removal of a Commissioner under this section shall immediately be published in the 'Iris Oifigiúil.'" That means a full notice shall be given of any change in the personnel and that there can be no, as it were, private removal or appointment of a Civil Service Commissioner.

Major COOPER: This carries out the undertaking which the Minister gave me. It does not carry out my wishes fully but I shall not reopen the case. I thank the Minister for what he has given.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: I move in Section 8, line 31, page 5, to insert immediately after the word "Statute" the words "or other authority." This amendment is one originally proposed by Deputy Bryan Cooper. I opposed it on the last stage, but I am not able to argue now that it does any harm.

Major COOPER: It certainly does not do any harm. Let us hope it will do some good.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Amendment by Mr. Blythe:—

“ In Section 9, line 48, page 5, to add two new sub-sections as follows:—

(2) All regulations made by the Minister under this section shall be laid before each House of the Oireachtas as soon as may be after they are made, and if both such Houses shall, within the next twenty-one days on which either House has sat after such regulations are laid before the Houses, pass resolutions annulling such regulations, such regulations shall be annulled accordingly, but such annulment shall not prejudice or invalidate anything previously done under such regulations.

(3) The Rules Publication Act, 1893, shall not apply to regulations made under this section.”

Mr. BLYTHE: With your permission, I do not propose to move the whole of this amendment, that is, the proposed new Sub-section (3). I think that is unnecessary, and with your permission I only move the first part, which provides that regulations to be made by the Minister for Finance shall be laid on the Table of the Dáil and may be annulled by resolution of the Dáil. The Rules Publication Act provides that 40 days notice shall be given of statutory rules. There is also a provision in it whereby the rule-making authority, in case of urgency or other special reasons, may make provisional rules which come into effect immediately. That would give all the protection and security that I want, and I think it is unnecessary to have this proposed new Sub-section (3). I simply propose to add the new Sub-section (2).

Mr. JOHNSON: I am glad that the Minister has decided that this Sub-section should not be moved. The points he has urged were present in my mind, and I thought it carried with it very much more than was desirable to adopt, but on paragraph 2 I think it will be in the memory of the Dáil that the Minister generously conceded the point that the ordinary provision of Bills relating to the laying on the Table of the Houses of the Oireachtas should be made to apply in this case, and it was generally understood, I think, that that ordinary provision should be brought forward in the form of an amendment. I certainly expected to see that that would be the case, but unfortunately the new Sub-section proposed by the Minister does not carry out that undertaking, or what I understood to be the undertaking. We have just inserted in the Courts of Justice Bill what is the ordinary Clause relating to these rules, which reads:—

“ All rules of court under Part I. of this Act shall be laid before each House of the Oireachtas within 14 days after they are made, if the Houses of the Oireachtas be then sitting, or, if not, within 14 days after the commencement of the next session of such Houses, and if a resolution is passed by either House within one month after the rules have been laid before such House to the effect that the same or any of them should be annulled, the rules or rule referred to in such resolution shall be null and void, without prejudice however to the validity of any proceedings meantime taken under the same.”

That is pretty much the same as the Clause which appears in a number of Bills, but the Section proposed to be inserted says:

“ All regulations made by the Minister under this Section shall be laid before each House of the Oireachtas as soon as may be after they are made, and if both such Houses shall, within the next twenty-one days on which either House has sat after such regulations are laid before the Houses, pass resolutions annulling such regulations, such regulations shall be annulled accordingly.”

For both Houses to pass such resolutions is a very much larger order than for either House to do so, and I think the promise of the Minister is, to that extent, at any rate, not fulfilled. I hope it is a mistake on his part in the formulation of this amendment, and I would urge that the usual section inserted in Bills regarding the placing upon the table of rules and regulations should be inserted in this Bill, and not the section submitted.

Mr. BLYTHE: I think Deputy Johnson is labouring under a misapprehension. This clause is the usual clause, and is the one that is in all Bills. The form that is in the Judiciary Bill is an unusual clause. I think it was taken from the Judicature Act of 1877, and the clause I have put down in this amendment is the usual form. Moreover, a great number of these regulations that may be made by the Minister for Finance under this Act will be regulations dealing largely with financial matters, and as to some of which there will be a doubt as to whether they ought to come before the Seanad at all, but in any case they will deal with financial aspects of the matter, and it is undesirable that the Seanad solely or by itself should have the power to annul them.

Major COOPER: I acquit the Minister of any breach of faith, because my amendment as originally drafted was worded, "either the Dáil or the Seanad." Then I came to the conclusion that it would possibly be unconstitutional and certainly undesirable to give the Seanad power to override the Minister for Finance on a question as to the financial conditions of the Civil Service. Therefore, I accept the wording now proposed. It would be very desirable if a form was made to allow the Dáil to do it, and not make it necessary to seek the concurrence of the Seanad. I think the best form of all would be, instead of both, to say the Dáil or both; but I do not see that we can make the Seanad supreme arbiter in a financial question. That would be contrary to the Constitution.

Mr. BLYTHE: I think if the Dáil passes the resolution the Minister for Finance would be bound to take notice of that and to amend the regulation.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think the proposition to ask both Houses to pass such a motion is asking almost an impossibility. The Minister says most of the regulations will be dealing with finance, and it will be doubtful whether the Seanad should have the constitutional right to interfere at all. If the regulations are laid upon the table of the Dáil I would be satisfied, but I think that the Minister will find, if he looks back through a number of Bills we have passed, that the term "Either House" appears in more than one recent Bill. I will not say it is usual or unusual, but certainly it appears.

Mr. BLYTHE: I think it has not occurred very often. This was the form I had in mind when I was giving the undertaking. I also think that there might be Regulations which would be desirable, especially Finance Regulations, that would be of more general importance, and that it would be desirable to allow the Seanad to raise the matter. I do think that if the Dáil annuls a Regulation or passes a resolution calling for the annulling of a Regulation, the Minister for Finance responsible to the Dáil would be in a position whereby he would proceed to make new Regulations.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: In that case the change that Deputy Johnson is seeking might be agreed to. It is the course that the Minister for Finance says would be adopted. Then why not adopt it now?

Mr. BLYTHE: I have already stated the reason.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: I move that the Bill, as amended, be received for final consideration.

Motion put and agreed to.

Motion made and question: "That the Bill do now pass," put and agreed to.

THE DAIL IN COMMITTEE.

FISHERIES BILL, 1923.—THIRD STAGE.

Section 1 put and agreed to.

SECTION 2.

(1) Every person who shall wilfully take or fish for, or aid or assist in taking or fishing for, any salmon or trout from or in any river, lake, or estuary, or from or in any part of the sea during the annual close season for salmon or trout respectively in that river, lake, estuary, or that part of the sea, shall be guilty of an offence under this Act, and shall on summary conviction thereof be punishable by a fine of not less than two pounds nor more than twenty-five pounds, together with a further fine of two pounds for every salmon or trout so taken or caught by him, and shall also forfeit every such salmon or trout and the net, engine, or instrument by which the same was so taken or caught.

(2) Every person who shall buy, sell or expose for sale, or have in his custody or possession any salmon or trout, or any part of any salmon or trout, taken from or caught in any river, lake or estuary, or any part of the sea during the annual close season for salmon or trout respectively in that river, lake, or estuary, or that part of the sea, shall be guilty of an offence under this Act and shall on summary conviction thereof be punishable by a fine of not less than two pounds nor more than twenty-five pounds, together with a further fine of two pounds for every such salmon or trout or part of a salmon or trout so bought, sold, or exposed for sale by him or so in his custody and possession, and shall also forfeit every such salmon or trout, or part of a salmon or trout.

(3) In any proceedings under the next foregoing Sub-section, proof that a person bought, sold or exposed for sale or had in his custody or possession any salmon or trout or any part of any salmon or trout during the annual close season for salmon or trout respectively, in any river, lake, or estuary in Saorstát Éireann, or in any part of the sea adjacent to the coast of Saorstát Éireann shall be prima facie evidence that such salmon or trout was taken or caught during the annual close season for salmon or trout (as the case may require) in the river, lake, estuary, or part of the sea from or in which the same may have been taken or caught.

Mr. JOHNSON: I have a series of amendments to propose to this Section, as well as to other Sections. My amendments to this Section are:—

In Sub-section (1), line 36, to delete the words “less than two pounds nor.”

In Sub-section (2), line 48, to delete the words “less than two pounds nor.”

Indeed, there is a long string of amendments in my name, and as it is now five minutes to eight, I do not propose to trouble the Dáil with divisions on every one of these amendments. The same principle is involved in every one of them. It is that we should not insert in this Bill a clause which would provide for a minimum penalty on the offender. The matter was discussed on the Second Reading Stage, and it was pointed out that under the provisions of the Bill the magistrate was obliged to sentence offenders to certain minimum penalties. The offence of taking a salmon or trout from any river is to be punishable on summary conviction by a fine of not less than £2 and not more than £25, together with a fine of £2 for every salmon so taken. So that no matter what the conditions under which this offence had been committed, no matter what circumstances might mitigate the guiltiness of the offender, the magistrate would be obliged to fine not less than £2 or £4, if two fish were taken in addition to the forfeiture of the net or instruments. The objection that I have is to the principle of imposing a minimum penalty and putting it upon the magistrate the duty of seeing that he will be obliged to punish by a minimum penalty, no matter what the circumstances may be. This obligation simply tells the magistrates that they do not know their business and that they are liable to be influenced by local considerations, or friendliness to the culprits. You are practically telling the magistrates, who were raised to the level of Judges and hold very important offices of State, that they cannot be trusted to impose a penalty or to take into account the circumstances. In certain other clauses it deals with periods of imprisonment, but the same principle is involved in every case, and I submit it is not a good policy to tell a magistrate or Judge, for that is what you are doing, that no matter what the circumstances might be, he must impose a fine or a certain period of imprisonment on the culprit.

It is contended that he may submit a case for consideration to the Minister for Justice or he may plead 8 o'clock. with the Governor-General for leniency, and request him to exercise certain prerogatives, but I think that is a very undesirable course to adopt. I move the amendment, and I will accept the decision of the Dáil on it as applying to the other amendments in my name which seek to remove this minimum penalty from the Bill.

Major COOPER: There is reason in all things, and there is a certain reason why the minimum penalty is mentioned in the Bill and why it has appeared in all previous Bills. The reason is that the profits that can be made from the poaching of salmon can be so very large that it is necessary to have a serious deterrent. One night's work and one lucky sweep of a net in a crowded pool may bring in from £200 to £300. That can be done by two or three men, and that is the reason why there is a strong case for the minimum penalty.

Mr. JOHNSON: The maximum is £25.

Major COOPER: I am aware of that, but let me point out that the minimum penalty here acts as a deterrent. There are individuals who have peculiar views on poaching. A relative of mine took some shooting in Scotland from a noble man who was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland at the time. He was rather surprised to find that the landlord paid the fines that were imposed upon persons who were caught poaching. He asked him why he did so, and the reply was, "I think the birds are as much theirs as they are ours." Then my relative said, "What am I paying you rent for?" Suppose you get a man of that peculiar mentality as a District Justice, it is desirable to have a minimum fine. It would not be desirable to introduce a minimum penalty where there had not been one already, but in cases where there are things of great value at stake, a minimum penalty is necessary. I wonder if Deputy Johnson recollects George Bernard Shaw's play, "The Showing Up of Blanco Posnet?" In that it was argued that the stealing of a horse in Western America sometimes meant life or death. Similarly, there is a minimum penalty of death where a verdict of murder is brought in. Taking all those things into account, I do not think that the minimum penalty of £2 is too high. I agree that it is ridiculous to have a very high penalty like £100 for the manufacture of poteen. There have been cases where that fine has been commuted to £5, or maybe £2. In this case I think £2 is not an unreasonable minimum.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: I would like to support Deputy Johnson in his amendment. On the Second Stage of the Bill I supported him in regard to the minimum penalty. I think the principle is a bad one, and it should not be maintained in our laws. I think we are all familiar with the custom regarding poaching in the past. We are aware that it was one of the crimes very heavily punished. There were many other crimes which were much more objectionable than the crime of poaching. The curious thing about poaching is that by a great number of people it was regarded as an honourable thing—a thing to be proud of rather than to be condemned by the public.

I am of opinion that the minimum penalty would place the District Justice in an awkward position. If young people, hardly aware of the crime they are committing and are merely following the example of their elders, are brought before a District Justice, he might find himself in the position of finding these young people guilty, and imposing the minimum penalty either in fines or imprisonment. He would be liable, if he were a humane man, to let the offender off, whereas if there was no minimum penalty he might impose a nominal fine. The only other alternative would be to impose a penalty and forward a memorial to the Ministry of Home Affairs, which was a very common thing in the past in poaching cases. I think it would be more important that there should be an adequate police force capable of catching practically all the offenders. If poachers were aware that they were practically certain of getting caught, that would be a great deterrent, and in such cases the imposition of a fine, lower than the minimum here set out, would be just as effective as a large fine.

Whenever the law insists on the severe penalty it is an indication that the Government feels itself in the position that it cannot catch offenders. Deputy Cooper referred to cases in America. We know that at one time people were hanged for stealing horses in America. That ought not to be necessary, and I feel sure that if there were a feeling that poachers would be caught we would not find it necessary to maintain so high a minimum penalty.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I feel that for a number of years, at least as long as I can recall, the magistrates and justices dealing with this class of offence were most particular in penalising these delinquents and that they had no alternative. Under the British law, if there was anything in particular that stress was laid upon, it was upon infringements in the poaching or gaming laws and it was painful to see people who committed trifling offences ordered to pay heavy penalties. If I were certain that the permanent officials have nothing to do with the ordination of penalties in this Bill and that it be left to the discretion of the District Justices I would be more or less satisfied with this Bill, but I can only vote for it with that reservation. I would ask the Minister although he may carry this proposal in the Bill, to see that it is carefully guarded and not allowed to be used against people who have committed a trifling offence but who may be subject to heavy penalties.

Mr. JOHNSON: I would like to say that Deputy McGoldrick is bound to support the amendment because the Minister cannot interfere. We have just passed a Bill saying that the Judges are independent and cannot be interfered with by Ministers. If we pass this Bill without this amendment, the District Justices will be bound to impose in these cases a fine of £2 per fish, and the Minister for Fisheries cannot interfere. Whether it is in response to promptings of the permanent officials or not, the Bill as it stands should not be passed. It should only be passed if these words are deleted. I could understand Deputy Cooper's reference to Blanco Posnet. I can understand in his mind a salmon being as sacred as a horse to a Western cowboy, and the theft of the salmon being as culpable as the theft of a horse in Western America. Perhaps Deputy Cooper would not oppose the Bill if it said that capital punishment should be applied in the case of a poaching of salmon. I think that Deputy Cooper is not what you might call a free agent in this particular case. He is bound by tradition and the plea he puts forward as to the danger of poachers taking two or three hundred pounds worth of salmon would be equally well met by the maximum penalty plus £2 per fish. If there is a Judge trying a case of a poacher who has taken two or three hundred pounds worth of salmon in a night, such as Deputy Cooper suggests is possible, I think that the Minister for Home Affairs who will have appointed District Justices will have missed his man, if he thinks he is satisfied with a fine of £2. Deputy Cooper's case hardly fits the argument he submits. Deputy McGoldrick must inevitably, from his speech, vote for this amendment.

Major BRYAN COOPER: As a matter of personal explanation may I say that I never caught a salmon in my life, but I lost at least £1,000 worth of salmon by poaching within the last few years.

Mr. WOLFE: I wish to say a few words about the minimum fine. Deputy McGoldrick must have lived in a district where the magistrates were extremely severe, when he talks of high game penalties. I have not heard of them in Ireland, although I have heard of them in England. As far as I know, the penalties were a farce, and might as well not have been brought before the Court at all. For that reason, if they are to bring any revenue to the Government, which I suppose they hope to get, there must be punishments meted out to people who do not carry out the fishing laws, and I think the only way to do that is to have a penalty devised so that there shall be some recognition of the fact that the laws of the country are being disregarded.

Mr. D'ALTON: I wish to support the special clause brought forward in this Bill. We have heard a good deal regarding the question of the fishing industry, that it should be protected, and I am rather surprised at Deputy Johnson referring to it in the cavalier style which he has adopted. If we wish to retain fishing for the benefit of all engaged in it we should support the Minister in any point which is calculated to punish those who poach in the close season. The fish are being poached at a time when they are being protected, and I say that any fine that would be inflicted on those people who help to destroy salmon is a just one and they deserve it. Let it be a deterrent, and then our fishing will be preserved.

Mr. O'CONNELL: It would appear as though some Deputies are conflicting the principle at issue in this amendment of Deputy Johnson. They are rather inclined, from their remarks, to think back to the days of the old magistrates. It must be remembered that we are dealing with a different body to-day. We are dealing with people who have the status of a Judge, who are trained lawyers, and for whose provision a Bill was passed in this Dáil, men of known worth, who are not subject to anything in the nature of those things which influenced the decisions of the old magistrates. If they are men worthy of the positions they occupy they ought to have sufficient discretion to judge aright on a matter of this kind which comes before them.

I personally do not object to a maximum being put, even if it be higher than the figure mentioned in the Bill. Here we cannot know all the circumstances of such cases as may come up. We know that from time to time cases will come up in which there will be certain circumstances which would be mitigating, and in which the Justice would feel that the infliction of the minimum fine which he is forced to impose would not be in strict accordance with justice. He has, however, no discretion. If these Justices are men of the type we hope they are, they should know when it is necessary to inflict a heavy fine. The principle of taking that discretion from them is bad, and I will therefore support the amendment.

Mr. WOULFE: Am I in order in asking whether in certain cases magistrates could refuse informations?

Mr. FINIAN LYNCH: I am afraid if there is a division on this amendment it will not be possible to finish this debate in the time left at our disposal, and I therefore move to report progress.

Agreed.

CEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS.

ORAL ANSWERS.

INCOME TAX ON FOREIGN SECURITIES.

POSITION OF IRISH CHARITIES.

Captain W. A. REDMOND asked the Minister for Finance whether British Dominion and Colonial securities held by Irish Charities are at present exempt from the Income Tax, if any, of the respective Dominion or Colony of registration; and, if so, whether this exemption will lapse after 31st March, 1924?

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. E. Blythe): I have no information as to the laws in operation in the Overseas Dominions with regard to the exemption of charitable bodies from Income Tax, and an answer to the Deputy's question would involve an exhaustive study of the Income Tax codes of such Dominions.

Captain REDMOND: Will the Minister make enquiries into the matter?

Mr. BLYTHE: I will make enquiries, but I cannot pretend to get an authoritative answer.

Captain REDMOND: Are there not charities in this country that have investments in Colonial Securities?

Mr. BLYTHE: I presume so.

Major BRYAN COOPER: Would it not be quite simple to obtain this information from our High Commissioner in London?

Mr. BLYTHE: It would.

Captain REDMOND asked the Minister for Finance whether British 5 per Cent. War Loan held by Irish Charities will be assessed for Income Tax in the Irish Free State after March 31st, 1924?

Mr. BLYTHE: A Saorstát charity is entitled to exemption from Saorstát Income Tax in respect of income derived from British 5 per Cent. War Loan Stock subject to the conditions and limitations governing the exemption of charitable bodies as provided by the Income Tax Acts.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I understand the question to be, will that exemption still prevail after the close of the present financial year?

Mr. BLYTHE: That was not asked in the question. Of course it will prevail.

DOUBLE INCOME TAX CLAIMS.

Captain REDMOND asked the Minister for Finance whether by means of a Clearing House established in Dublin between the Inland Revenue Commissioners of Great Britain and Saorstát Éireann, or otherwise, it could be brought about that one claim only should be made on the citizens of Saorstát Éireann in respect of dividends paid by companies registered in Great Britain and other British securities; whether by this means the Irish Income Tax-payer should only have to pay one sum; viz., the higher of the two rates of Income Tax then prevailing in the respective countries, and any adjustment necessary between the two Governments would be fixed through their respective representatives in the Clearing House; and whether he would consider the advisability of consulting the British Government with a view to the establishment of such a Clearing House?

Mr. BLYTHE: I dealt with this matter fully in my answer to a question by Deputy Good on the 31st October, 1923, and I am unable to add anything

PRE-TRUCE LOSSES OCCASIONED BY I.R.A.

MICHAEL O HAONGHUSA asked the Minister for Finance whether he is in a position to make an announcement regarding the setting up of a branch similar to the War Compensation Court, to deal with pre-Truce losses occasioned by I.R.A. forces during their operations against British forces prior to the Truce.

Mr. BLYTHE: The setting up of such a tribunal as is suggested is not contemplated. The Compensation (Ireland) Commission, a body set up by agreement between the British and Irish Governments, investigates alike cases of alleged damage by both sides in the late conflict.

GRADING OF BUTTER AND EGGS.

MICHAEL O HIFERNAIN asked the Minister for Agriculture if in compliance with the statement in the Governor-General's speech, it is the intention of the Government to introduce at an early date legislation which will have for its object the compulsory grading and branding of Irish export butter, and the grading and regulation of the Irish export egg trade, and, if so, what is the approximate date of the introduction of such legislation.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. P. Hogan): The preparation of legislative proposals based on the Ad Interim Reports of the Commission on Agriculture, dealing with butter and eggs is at present engaging the careful attention of the Department of Agriculture, and considerable progress has been made in the matter.

It is, however, not yet practicable to indicate the date by which a Bill or Bills embodying the Government's proposals will be ready for submission to the Oireachtas. Both of these Bills raise very important questions of policy.

CONTROL OF LOCAL ADMINISTRATION.

MICHAEL O HIFERNAIN asked the Minister for Local Government

whether in view of the further postponement of the Local Government elections, steps will be taken to ensure that local boards will be controlled in such a manner that they will not have power to carry out any business involving unnecessary or wasteful expenditure, pending the holding of the next Local Government elections.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. Burke): Pending the holding of the Local Government elections the Deputy may be assured that all possible steps will be taken to secure efficient and economical administration.

ALLEGED DELAY IN PAYMENT.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Industry and Commerce if he is aware of the large number of complaints being made by unemployed men and women with reference to delay in paying the unemployment money, if he is aware that persons are signing for six and seven weeks before they receive their allowance; if he will take steps to speed up the consideration of all such cases.

Mr. HOGAN (replying for Minister for Industry and Commerce): The Minister is not aware of any cases in which six or seven weeks delay has occurred in the payment of benefit to those entitled to it, and cannot investigate such statements without particulars of the cases the Deputy has in mind. It is the fact that some delay in authorising claims occurred at the beginning of a new benefit year on October 17th, last, because the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1923, necessitated the balancing at that date of the account of each insured contributor. This work was, however, completed some time ago.

Mr. BYRNE: Might I ask the Minister whether he would not consider the advisability of merely ringing up the Exchange and asking whether the statement contained in the question is true. Nine unemployed men called on me on the morning I put down the question, and they told me that they had been signing for seven weeks.

Mr. HOGAN: It is stated in the

[Mr. Hogan.] answer that the Ministry of Industry and Commerce has not heard of any cases in which for six or seven weeks unemployed men had been signing up. If there are nine specific cases, and if you can give those nine names, they will be investigated immediately by the Ministry. It was pointed out that there was some delay about the 17th October, owing to having to balance the books of each contributor.

Mr. MORRISSEY: Arising out of that answer, will the Minister be surprised to know that people have been signing for 12 or 14 weeks in parts of the country?

Mr. HOGAN: Furnish the names and they will be investigated.

Mr. CORISH: Is there any reason why those cases should be sent to Dublin for adjudication? The delay seems to be altogether in Dublin?

Mr. HOGAN: It is stated in the answer that as far as the Minister knows there has been no delay of six or seven weeks. Some delay occurred about the 17th October, as a result of having to balance the books of contributors. If the Deputies have any cases which they wish the Minister to investigate, they can give the names. I do not think he could go further than that, except to hold an inquiry.

LETTER DELIVERIES.

MICHAEL O hIFEARNAIN asked the Postmaster - General whether, having regard to the fact that there is only a tri-weekly delivery of letters in the rural districts, with the consequence that many people in those districts call for their letters at the Post Offices on Sundays, steps will not be taken to discontinue the charge which is at present made for handing those letters to callers.

POSTMASTER - GENERAL (Mr. J. J. Walsh): The Deputy appears to be under a misapprehension. The delivery of letters in rural districts is not restricted generally to three days a week, there being a large number of posts working on six days a week. All Post Offices other than those at which telegraph business is transacted, are closed on Sundays, and there is no delivery of letters to callers at any offices on that day. Whether it is advisable to revert to postal labour on Sundays which, apart from other objections, would entail additional expenditure, is another matter.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: Arising out of that answer, I do not think the Minister has answered the question I have asked him; that is, will he take steps to discontinue the charge which is at present made for handing those letters to callers on Sunday—will that charge be taken off in view of the fact that so many deliveries have been discontinued?

Mr. WALSH: That matter will be considered.

MICHAEL O hIFEARNAIN asked the Postmaster-General whether any steps have been taken to secure the delivery of letters from the Mullinahone Post Office to the Cappanagrane and Poulacapple districts, as at present there is no delivery to those districts.

Mr. WALSH: I beg to refer the Deputy to my reply of the 2nd November to Deputy D'Alton on the subject. There has been no change meanwhile.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: Arising out of that, might I ask the Minister, in view of the answer he gave Deputy D'Alton and the promise contained therein, that immediate steps will be taken to see that that delivery is re-started, as the people of those districts suffer great inconvenience owing to the lack of better facilities?

Mr. WALSH: So far we have been unable to materialise, but we are losing no opportunity of getting those deliveries going.

MICHAEL O hIFEARNAIN asked the Postmaster-General whether, in view of the present inadequate delivery to rural districts, he will make provision for the sorting of mails received on Saturday nights so that callers may receive letters contained in these mails on Sunday mornings?

Mr. WALSH: The matter is receiving consideration.

DISABLED KILDARE SOLDIER.

AODH O CULACHAIN asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that Private Michael Cleary, Army No. 11695, 33rd Infantry Battalion, Naas Barracks, attested 3rd July, 1922, was discharged from the Army as medically unfit on 10th July, 1923, suffering from a broken leg, sustained on the night of September 2nd, 1922, by his falling off a ladder, in coming down from sentry duty in an elevated post; whether he is aware that the leg was not properly set; that Cleary was perfectly sober at the time, and that the ladder was defective; whether the Ministry will expedite payment of a wound pension, as this man is disabled and in very poor circumstances?

MINISTER for DEFENCE (General Mulcahy): Private Cleary sustained a fractured ankle on the 2nd September, 1922, through falling from a ladder, and was discharged from the Army medically unfit on the 5th July, 1923. I am advised that the ladder was defective, and that Cleary was sober at the time of the accident, but I am not aware that Cleary's leg was not properly set after his admission to hospital.

Consideration of the question of compensation under the Army Pensions Act, 1923, will be expedited as much as possible.

COMMANDEERED FIREARMS.

MICHEAL O hIFEARNAIN asked the Minister for Defence whether the firearms which were seized by the Volunteer forces during the pre-Treaty struggle will be handed back to those from whom they were taken, or from whom they were received, and if this is not possible if the owners of such firearms will be compensated for their loss?

General MULCAHY: In many cases it will not be possible to trace arms taken by Volunteers prior to the Truce, and in other cases to ascertain definitely the owners of any arms held in military custody at present. Where it is possible to do so, however, these arms will be returned to the persons from whom they were taken.

Vol. 5.

The general question as to whether claims for compensation in respect of loss of arms can be entertained has yet to get consideration.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: Arising out of that answer, will the Minister state what steps will be necessary in order to prove that those arms were given up or were taken from them?

General MULCAHY: The circumstances in which persons lost arms, prior to the Truce, varied in so many cases that I am afraid no general statement could be made. For the present, I am afraid nothing but an ordinary statement of claim supported by any receipt that might have been obtained at the time is all that anybody wishing to make a claim can make. It may be possible that after the receipt of a certain number of claims like those that the form of application may be systematised, but I have my doubts.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: The Minister is probably aware that receipts were scarcely ever given for those arms. Perhaps he would accept some other form of proof.

ARMY ACCOUNTS.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Defence whether payment has yet been made to P. Casey, carpenter, of Woodford, Co. Galway, for work done on April 18th, 21st and 25th, 1923, repairing Woodford Military Barracks, and if not, will he see that payment of this small sum (£1 10s. 0d.) is expedited.

General MULCAHY: Mr. Casey's account was not received at Headquarters until the 12th ultimo. It is now under investigation locally, and if in order will be settled without undue delay.

INTERNEE'S BICYCLE.

AODH O CULACHAIN asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that Joseph Ennis, Cloncurry, Enfield, Co. Kildare, whose bicycle was retained by the Military when he was arrested on 20th July, 1922, and who was released on the 11th October, 1923, xl.

from Gormanstown, has not yet received it; further, if the bicycle be not returned, whether compensation will be granted to Ennis, who values his bicycle at £12 10s. 0d.

General MULCAHY: It appears that the bicycle retained by the military authorities on the occasion of the arrest of Joseph Ennis, Cloncurry, Enfield, Co. Kildare, on 20th July, 1923, was not his property, and that he was unable at the time to give a satisfactory explanation as to how it came into his possession. In the circumstances a claim in the matter from Ennis cannot be entertained.

ARMY ACCOUNTS.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Defence if he will state why the amount due by the Military to Thomas Curley, Tullycross, Letterfrack, which has been fully certified, and for which application has been repeatedly made, has not yet been paid, and whether steps will be taken to expedite settlement of this account.

General MULCAHY: No account from Mr. Curley can be traced at Headquarters. Inquiries are being made locally, and a settlement of the claim will be expedited.

LISDEEN INTERNEES.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN asked the Minister for Defence whether the detention of Messrs. David Walsh, Moyasta, and Michael Hennessy, Lisdeen, will continue.

General MULCAHY: David Walsh was released on the 21st ultimo. It is intended to continue the detention of Michael Hennessy.

THE CARRYING OF ARMS.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Defence whether he will state what soldiers (if any) have permission to carry arms when off duty; what steps are taken to see that soldiers who have not such permission do not take arms out of barracks except when going on duty; whether there is any regulation whereby a soldier when returning off duty must deliver up any arms he may have carried when on duty and give a strict account of all ammunition served out to him when going on such duty; further, whether in view of the many regrettable occurrences due to the carrying of arms by soldiers off duty, the Minister will impress on all concerned the necessity for a strict observance of the regulations governing the carrying of arms.

General MULCAHY: No soldier has permission to carry arms when off duty except in very special cases, when the Provost Marshal issues the necessary authority. Military policemen on duty at all exit gates from barracks have instructions to search any soldier suspected of being in unauthorised possession of arms; soldiers returning off duty are not required to give up their arms, but they must give a strict account of all ammunition issued to them when going on duty. Instructions are issued from time to time impressing on all ranks the necessity for a strict observance of the regulations governing the carrying of arms.

UNEMPLOYMENT ALLOWANCE FOR EX-SOLDIERS.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Defence if he is aware of the hardships inflicted on discharged soldiers owing to their cards not being stamped during their period of service in the National Army; if he is aware that many hundreds are now walking the streets seeking employment, and not in receipt of unemployment allowance; if he will seek for an alteration in the regulations that will enable these men to receive the unemployment money for the same period as that granted to ordinary civilians.

General MULCAHY: I am aware that a number of men discharged from the Army are not eligible for unemployment benefit because they have no contributions to their credit. Such cases are limited to men who, before joining the Army, were not normally employed in an insurable occupation, and they are, consequently, in no worse position because of their Army service. Where a man normally employed in an insurable occupation joined the Army, the contributions necessary to keep him in insurance are paid, although Army service is not an insurable occupation. This position could not be altered without legislation.

Mr. BYRNE: I ask the Minister whether something cannot be done to relieve the distress amongst discharged army men who are seeking employment?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is a separate matter altogether.

SHOOTING OF CIVIC GUARD.

SEAMUS MacCOSGAIR asked the Minister for Defence if his attention has been called to the murder, on the night of 15th August, 1923, of Michael Lyons, a member of the Civic Guard, stationed at Belturbet, Co. Cavan; if the deceased was for two years a member of the Royal Irish Constabulary, from which force he resigned in accordance with the wishes of the people; and whether any steps have been taken to compensate Thomas Lyons, of Ramore, Killimore, Co. Galway, the father of deceased, for the loss he has sustained through the murder of his son, who had contributed to his maintenance.

General MULCAHY: I am aware of the circumstances under which Guard Lyons met his death as the result of a shot fired by a military sentry, and am advised that he had resigned from the R.I.C. for political reasons. The soldier who fired the fatal shot is in civil custody awaiting trial. I regret that the claim for compensation cannot be entertained, as there is no legal liability attaching to the military in a case of this nature.

PRIVATE NOTICE QUESTION.

HAULBOWLINE DOCKYARD— DISCHARGE OF EMPLOYEES.

MICHAEL O HAONGHUSA asked the President whether he is aware that 50 employees were discharged from the Haulbowline Dockyard on the 1st instant; whether he will state the reason for these discharges; whether a number—8 or more—of patrol boats were recently sent to this yard for overhaul and refit, and still remain tied up there; whether it is the intention of the Government to have such necessary work on these boats carried out in this yard, if so, when such work is likely to start; whether an effort will be made by the Government to continue employment in this yard, at least over the next three months, and help in relieving the present condition of distress amongst a large number of families residing in this district, and unable for a considerable period past to find employment.

The PRESIDENT: I am aware that about 50 men have been discharged, as stated, their services having ceased to be required. Of the patrol boats at Haulbowline, it was decided to reconstruct three. The work on these has been suspended, as I understand, by direction of the Minister for Defence. The Government are anxious to provide employment so far as possible at the Dockyard, but cannot undertake to do so by incurring expenditure which in itself serves no useful purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON: Are we to understand the suspension of the work is merely for a short period?

The PRESIDENT: I am very much afraid it is a permanent suspension, owing to the necessary economics that have to be made in the Ministry of Defence Vote, and also owing to the fact that fortunately the necessity for which these boats were originally purchased has not materialised.

Mr. HENNESSY: Are we to understand that it was more economical to repair these boats elsewhere than at Haulbowline?

The PRESIDENT: No; it is not intended to have anything done to them. The work is not being done elsewhere.

REPORTS LAID ON THE TABLE.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Before we proceed to the Orders of the Day, I would like to raise a question, which I raised last week, in regard to the circulation of certain reports. The President said that one of these reports—the report of the Canal Commission—was then being printed and would be available in a week. I notice it was down yesterday as having been placed upon the Table, but I would like to know will copies be available and circulated to Deputies?

The PRESIDENT: It will be circulated, certainly, before the end of the week. There may have been some delay in supplying the necessary number of copies, but a certain number of copies are available, and I take it that the reason they were not put upon the Table is that the full number was not available. But they will be circulated before the end of the week.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: The reason I asked is that the Bill introduced by Deputy Johnson, that is the Transport and Communications Bill, is to be discussed this evening, and obviously the one has very close connection with the other, and were it at all possible it would be most desirable that Deputies should have copies of the Report before 7 o'clock, when this Bill will come on.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: On yesterday's Order Paper it was stated that this particular Report was laid upon the Table, which means that it was available in the Committee Rooms for Deputies. The question whether a promise was made to circulate the Report to Deputies is one of which I have no recollection, but it is available in the Committee Rooms at the present time.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Two matters were left over from yesterday, the Committee Stage of the Fisheries Bill, which was entered upon and not completed, and the Money Resolution of the Minister for Finance. I take it that we should go on with the Fisheries Bill at once.

The PRESIDENT: Yes.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: When shall we take the Money Resolution? Will it be before Number 3, Ministers and Secretaries Bill (Committee)?

The PRESIDENT: Yes, before item No. 3.

DAIL IN COMMITTEE.

FISHERIES BILL, 1923—THIRD STAGE (RESUMED).

Section 2 ("Penalties for taking, selling, etc., Salmon or Trout during annual Close Season").

Amendment 1, in Sub-section 1, line 36, to delete the words "less than two pounds nor" (Mr. Thomas Johnson).

Mr. LYNCH: In putting forward this amendment, Deputy Johnson said he bulked practically all his amendments in the one. The same principle is obviously involved in all the amendments the Deputy has brought forward to the different Sections in this Bill. The principal object in this Section is the imposition of a minimum penalty. The minimum penalty actually exists in the Fishery Laws on a comparatively wide scale already, and when I brought forward this Bill I did so with the intention of tightening up, and possibly increasing, the penalties under the existing code, so as to make illegal fishing not a paying proposition. Acceptance of Deputy Johnson's amendment would mean putting matters, from the fishery point of view, worse than they are at present, because it would mean abolishing the minimum penalties that exist. I am not prepared to accept this amendment, because I believe that the minimum penalty is a necessity in the fishery law, if the law is not to be a farce. It has been found necessary to have minimum penalties in the past for various fishery offences.

Mr. JOHNSON: Did they succeed?

Mr. LYNCH: If they did not succeed in putting down these offences, it was because the penalties were not enforced. In addition to fixing a minimum penalty by law, we hope, in the future, that there will be a more strict enforcement of the law. A minimum penalty is first heard of in a Fishery Act passed in the year 1848. It was passed to meet an offence such as is mentioned in Section 2 of this Bill, to which the amendment we are now dealing with, refers. The minimum penalty then imposed was 10s., and I think it is not unfair, in the present currency, to impose £2 as the minimum penalty where 10s. was imposed in 1848. Deputy Bryan Cooper referred to the fact that one of the reasons for the minimum penalty is this: That poaching is comparatively profitable, that one scoop with a net paid the very nominal fine that was normally imposed. That is quite so. Deputy McGoldrick was concerned as to whether I brought in this Bill on my own initiative, or whether it was inspired through some persons with horns, some prominent officials wishing to inflict as much injury as possible on the poor unfortunate people. I brought in the Bill as the result of many requests from many parts of the country, and I was not foolish enough naturally to bring it in without consulting prominent officials in my own Department. If that offends Deputy McGoldrick, I am afraid I will have to sacrifice his vote.

Under the existing Acts there are many minimum penalties fixed. Under a British Act passed in 1850, relating to Irish river fisheries, there are minimum penalties in about a dozen different cases. Under the bye-laws passed by the Inspectors of Fisheries in the Department of Agriculture there are fixed penalties which are tantamount to minimum penalties. This Bill, therefore, in that sense, is no departure from the existing law, and I cannot see my way to accept the amendment.

THE DAIL IN COMMITTEE.

MINISTERS AND SECRETARIES BILL, 1923—(THIRD STAGE.)

SECTION I.

There shall be established in Saorstát Eireann the several Departments of State specified and named in the eleven following sub-paragraphs, amongst which the administration and business of the public services in Saorstát Eireann shall be distributed as in the said sub-paragraphs is particularly mentioned, and each of which said Departments and the powers, duties and functions thereof shall be assigned to and administered by the Minister hereinafter named as head thereof, that is to say:

(i) The Department of the President of the Executive Council which shall comprise the business, powers, authorities, duties and functions by the Constitution or by any existing or future Act of the Oireachtas or otherwise conferred on or to be discharged or performed by the Minister, who shall hold the office of and be styled Uachtarán na hArd-Chomhairle or (in English) the President of the Executive Council, and also the custody of and responsibility for all public archives and records and of papers and documents of State and of grants, deeds, and other instruments of title relating to the property corporeal and incorporeal, real and personal for the time being vested in Saorstát Éireann and of records of the Executive Council and also the custody of the Seal of the Executive Council, and also the responsibility for and control of the official publications of the Executive Council and also the administrative control of and responsibility for such public services and the business, powers, duties and functions thereof as may not for the time being be comprised in any of the Departments of State constituted by this Act.

(ii) The Department of Finance which shall comprise the administration and business generally of the public finance of Saorstát Éireann and all powers, duties and functions connected with the same, including in particular the collection and expenditure of the revenues of Saorstát Éireann from whatever source arising (save as may be otherwise provided by law), and also the business, powers, duties and functions of the branches and officers of the public service specified in the first part of the Schedule to this Act, and of which Department the head shall be, and shall be styled, an t-Aire Airgid or (in English) the Minister for Finance.

(iii) The Department of Justice which shall comprise the administration and business generally of public services in connection with law, justice, public order and police, and all powers, duties and functions connected with the same (except such powers, duties and functions as are by law reserved to the Executive Council, and such powers, duties and functions as are by the Constitution or by law excepted from the authority of the Executive Council or of an Executive Minister), and shall include in particular the business, powers, duties and functions of the branches and officers of the public service specified in the Second Part of the Schedule to this Act, and of which Department the head shall be, and shall be styled, an t-Aire um Dhlí agus Cheart or (in English) the Minister for Justice.

(iv) The Department of Local Government and Public Health which shall comprise the administration and business generally of public services in connection with local government, public health, relief of the poor, care of the insane (including insane criminals), health insurance, elections to each House of the Oireachtas, elections to local bodies and authorities, registration of voters, maintenance of public roads and highways, registration of births, deaths and marriages, and vital statistics and all powers, duties and functions connected with the same, and shall include in particular the business, powers, duties and functions of the branches and officers of the public service specified in the Third Part of the Schedule to this Act, and of which Department the head shall be, and shall be styled an t-Aire um Rialtas Aitiúil or (in English) the Minister for Local Government and Public Health.

(v) The Department of Education which shall comprise the administration and business generally of public services in connection with Education, including primary, secondary and university education, vocational and technical training, endowed schools, reformatories, and industrial schools, and all powers, duties and functions connected with the same, and shall include in particular the business, powers, duties and functions of the branches and officers of the public services specified in the Fourth Part of the Schedule to this Act, and of which Department the head shall be, and shall be styled, an t-Aire Oideachais or (in English) the Minister for Education.

(vi) The Department of Lands and Agriculture which shall comprise the administration and business generally of public services in connection with agriculture and lands, including the fixing of rents and tenure of lands, acquisition by occupying tenants of full ownership by means of public funds, enlargement and other economic improvement of holdings of land, purchase of land for distribution by way of re-sale, relief of rural congestion and like uneconomic conditions, forestry, veterinary services, survey and mapping of land, and all powers, duties and functions connected with the same, and shall include in particular the business, powers, duties and functions of the branches and officers of the public service specified in the Fifth Part of the Schedule to this Act, and of which Department the head shall be, and shall be styled, an t-Aire um Thalmhuíocht or (in English) the Minister for Lands and Agriculture.

(vii) The Department of Industry and Commerce which shall comprise the administration and business generally of public services in connection with trade, commerce, industry, and labour, industrial and commercial organisations and combinations, industrial and commercial statistics, transport, shipping, natural resources, and all powers, duties and functions connected with the same, and shall include in particular the business, powers, duties, and functions of the branches and officers of the public services specified in the Sixth Part of the Schedule to this Act, and of which Department the head shall be, and shall be styled, an t-Aire um Thíúséal agus Thráchtáil or (in English) the Minister for Industry and Commerce.

(viii) The Department of Fisheries which shall comprise the administration and business generally of public services in connection with fisheries, including deep-sea fisheries, tidal waters fisheries, coastal fisheries, inland waters fisheries, and industries connected with or auxiliary to the same, and all powers, duties and functions connected with the same, and shall include in particular the business, powers, duties and functions of the branches and officers of the public services specified in the Seventh Part of the Schedule to this Act, and of which Department the head shall be, and shall be styled, an t-Aire um Iasgach or (in English) the Minister for Fisheries.

(ix) The Department of Posts and Telegraphs which shall comprise the administration and business generally of public services in connection with posts, telegraphs, and telephones, and all powers, duties and functions connected with the same, and shall include in particular the business, powers, duties and functions of the branches and officers of the public services specified in the Eighth Part of the Schedule to this Act, and of which Department the head shall be, and shall be styled, Aire an Phuist or (in English) the Minister for Posts and Telegraphs.

(x) The Department of Defence which shall comprise the administration and business of the raising, training, organisation, maintenance, equipment, management, discipline, regulation, and control according to law of the Military Defence Forces of Saorstát Éireann, and of all powers, duties, and functions connected with the same, and of which Department the head shall be, and shall be styled, an t-Aire um Chosaint or (in English) the Minister for Defence, and shall be assisted by a Council of Defence as hereinafter provided:

(xi) The Department of External Affairs which shall comprise the administration and business generally of public services in connection with communications and transactions between the Government of Saorstát Éireann and the Government of any other state or nation, diplomatic and consular representation of Saorstát Éireann in any country or place, international amenities, the granting of passports and of visés to passports, and all powers, duties and functions connected with the same, and of which Department the head shall be, and shall be styled, an t-Aire um Ghnóthaí Coigríche or (in English) the Minister for External Affairs.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: I move:

In sub-paragraph (i), line 26, after the word "Council" to insert the words:—"and also the control of the Department of External Affairs which shall comprise the administration and business generally of public services in connection with communications and transactions between the Government of Saorstát Eireann and the Government of any other state or nation, diplomatic and consular representation of Saorstát Eireann in any country or place, international amenities, the granting of passports and of visés to passports, and all powers, duties, and functions connected with the same, and of which Department the head shall be the President of the Executive Council."

The feelings which animate me in putting forward this amendment are somewhat as follows: I feel 4 o'clock. that in the interests of economy and efficiency it would be an advisable thing that the Ministry of External Affairs should be concentrated under the guidance of the President of the Executive Council. I believe that in the actual working of our affairs in communications with foreign nations the Minister for External Affairs in almost all cases would find himself called upon to confer with the President, and I think that with such a young State as the Saorstát it is hardly necessary that we should have a separate Ministry. A considerable amount of expense is attached to this Ministry, and by placing it under the guidance of the President I feel that we would save a large part of it. I do not mean for a moment to suggest that the President has not a sufficient amount of work to do at present, but I do think that it might be useful that he should take control of this Department, and, if necessary, that he should employ a Parliamentary Secretary, or obtain the necessary help otherwise.

I also would like to say that I do not wish to make any insinuations that the present Minister for External Affairs has not conducted the business in the proper manner. I feel sure that the Dáil is willing to give him full credit for his capabilities and for the manner in which he has directed the business up to the present; but I think that it would be an important thing that we should concentrate on internal rather than external affairs, and that, except on matters arising out of our trade relations, it is rather inadvisable that we should devote so much attention and place too much emphasis on our connection with outside countries as to establish and maintain a separate Ministry for that purpose. Taking all these considerations into account, I think that the Ministry should give serious consideration to this proposal. I would say, in connection with this, that in order to have this amendment complete it would have been necessary to put in an amendment deleting Paragraph 11. I have not done so, but I feel sure that if the Government see fit to adopt my amendment, they will introduce another at a later stage which would have this effect.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I desire to associate myself with this amendment, because, I think, for the reasons that I explained on Second Reading, that the Dáil would naturally look to the President for responsibility under all circumstances, and that is the only matter that is concerned in the creation of a separate Ministry responsible for all matters in connection with external affairs. The facts bear out the contention that I have made. There has never been an occasion in which any explanation has been given to the Dáil, either in the days when it sat as a Constituent Assembly or since then, when it sat as the first House of the Free State Oireachtas, in which a statement has been made respecting the external policy of the Free State by anybody except the President. There have been times when the Minister for External Affairs has answered in respect of the expenditure and estimates of the Department, but on main questions of policy it has been the case, and I contend it must in the future inevitably be the case, that all questions on external policy will be answered for here by the President of the Executive Council.

Therefore, I think it is only fitting, seeing that he is to assume the major responsibilities in the Dáil for the policy of the Department, that he should be the person who should take over the entire responsibility of the conduct of this Department, leaving the administrative details to be conducted by some Civil Servant, who will be responsible directly to him. In that way a separate Ministry, and the expense of a separate Ministry, will be saved, and that extra expense will be saved simply by achieving what must always be the case, and expectation of the Dáil, that is, that the President should deal directly himself with all external affairs. It was for this reason that it was so desirable that the President should be relieved of the work imposed on him until the last election in connection with the Finance Department. Now, these financial responsibilities do not directly bear on him. There is a Minister for Finance, and the President is relieved of all other matters, and should be able and should be expected to attend to external affairs, and the responsibility for these affairs in the Dáil. But to face facts quite frankly, everybody knows that the chief work of this Ministry has not been external affairs, but publicity, and it is desirable that a separate department of publicity should cease to exist. If there is any statement to be made, let that statement be made from each department, whichever department be concerned in the issuing of that statement, without there being some official Ministerial publicity department. We know that several of the Ministries have had from time to time occasion, very rightly and properly, to make statements to the Press.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: There is no question of publicity. I think, in the amendment.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: That will arise with regard to the deletion of the Section, presumably.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: There is no question of publicity in Paragraph XI either.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Very well, I bow to your ruling, Sir, and I will not touch on that matter, but if I may leave it with a sentence with your permission, it is this, reference was made to it on the Second Reading, and what was said on the matter in the Second Reading, by whatever Deputy made the statement, I entirely endorse. I confine myself, therefore, to the immediate question, which is this, that inasmuch as the President will naturally be held responsible both by the Dáil and the country at large for the guidance of the policies of this State in regard to its affairs with all other countries, that the President should be always, as a cardinal principle, both President and the Minister for External Affairs, without the separate creation of a Ministry, and so save extra expense by getting a more consistent and logical division of responsibilities and offices.

Mr. JOHNSON: I wish to say a word in favour of the amendment. I believe it is desirable that the President should answer to the Dáil for external affairs, and I note that it does, in fact, retain a Department of External Affairs. There is no intention, I presume, in the amendment to disband the Department of External Affairs. The object is to ensure that that Department shall be controlled by the President. I think it is quite desirable, and almost a certainty, that whoever may be nominally in control of the Department of External Affairs in practice, for any important matters the President will, as a matter of fact, answer to the Dáil and be in ultimate control. I do not want for a moment to question your ruling respecting publicity, but it did occur to me that when international amenities are under the Department that the publicity activities of this Department might well come under that general term. They have, as a matter of fact, been quite interesting to nations beyond the seas, the activities of this Department, and do conform to the term "international amenities." That by the way. I think it is desirable that the President should at all times be answerable for matters as between the Saorstát and Great Britain, but the external affairs will be, I think, mainly in connection with Great Britain, and the practice that has already grown up by force of circumstances will necessarily be the practice in the future, and, therefore, I support the amendment.

MINISTER FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS (Mr. Desmond Fitzgerald): I think the general purpose of this Bill is to define a certain number of Ministers and Departments, without saying who shall be in charge of them. Actually, as the Bill stands, there is nothing to prevent those Departments being under the President. A good deal of talk has gone on about the Ministry of External Affairs being a luxury, and so on. You have to have it, and you cannot get away from it. I daresay there are people who wish to go back to the status or lack of status implied by the Home Rule Bill of 1914. This is now a Sovereign Nation, and it has to do with other countries. We cannot separate ourselves from other countries, and if we were utterly cut off from other countries, Deputy Gorey and the party he represents would be the first people to suffer. This country has the power to initiate, to negotiate, to sign and decide upon the ratification of Treaties with other countries, and almost within the first week after we received our new status, questions arose which had to be decided. There is no reason why this Department should not be under the President. The reason it was not, was due to the circumstances of the time. One of the speakers has just said that the most important business is Internal Affairs, and he did not want External Affairs stressed too much. It was the very reason that Internal Affairs were the overwhelming pre-occupation of the country, and the Ministry, that made it necessary to have a Ministry of External Affairs. When the time comes for the President to take over this Ministry, I can assure the Dáil it will have no trouble in getting rid of me.

With regard to the big question of policy, there is such a thing as joint responsibility. On the big question of policy the whole Ministry has equal responsibility, but the peculiar thing about this Ministry is it probably needs the attention of its Minister in small details more than does any other Ministry. Also an entirely new situation was created. Questions of policy are involved in matters which seem very small. Within the first week there was a question of policy involved as to whether we should pay 30/- for the repatriation of one of our Nationals. The Department must be the first pre-occupation of the Minister in charge, and it requires more his personal attention in matters of detail than any other department.

With regard to expenditure, we talk about economy. What does anybody think the saving would be, if they did away with it as a Ministry, put it under a Secretary, and made it a sub-department of a Ministry? The obvious effect it would have outside would be that we would go out of our way to take from the status of this country, by implying that we had no foreign affairs, which means we had no international standing. On the other side, I do not know whether people realise that Ministers are paid less than the major Civil Servants. They are paid less, because the major Civil Servants' salaries amount to the same as the Ministers', and they have, in addition, security of tenures and pensions. Does anybody think you could hand over this Department to a minor Civil Servant? We are actually creating a precedent. Is it suggested it would be a good thing that this Department should be under a minor Civil Servant? In effect the policy would be dictated by a minor Civil Servant. So far as I am concerned, I realised long before the economy scare started that there was need for economy in this country. The first thing I did was to do away with things that seemed to me more ornamental than effectual.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Was publicity one of them?

Mr. FITZGERALD: Publicity has been cut down to a minimum.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Publicity in this connection is not in the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD: I was answering the question of Deputy Figgis.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The question should not have been asked. If the Minister is prepared to deal with publicity as a branch of international amenities, as Deputy Johnson outlined, I would not see any objection to that.

Mr. FITZGERALD: There has been a lot of talk in the earlier stages of the cost of the Ministry of External Affairs as compared with that of other countries. We are a mother country with the major part of our people abroad. We have four million Irish people at home, and 25 millions abroad. Canada is, therefore, as far as nationals are concerned, much smaller than we are. My Ministry costs 1/40th of what is cost by the Canadian Foreign Department. My whole Ministry costs rather less than the Australian External Affairs Department in London costs. New Zealand, which is infinitely smaller than Ireland, maintains an office in London which costs more than half of what our whole Ministry costs. The South African Government have an office in London which costs considerably more than the whole of the External Affairs here. Our Department has two offices in America, offices in Holland, Belgium, France, and so on. The Estimates have been referred to as being over £60,000. Those do not include the cost of membership of the League of Nations. I realise the need for economy so well that I think that the Estimate we made this year, after including membership to the League, will pay our way in the League for this year, and possibly leave a certain balance over. Deputy Figgis said in the earlier stages of the Bill that the Department of External Affairs was doing very little work now. I do not know what steps Deputy Figgis took to find out what work it was doing. Deputy Gorey said that we were not concerned with foreign affairs, but he entirely failed to understand the position of this country. Deputy Gorey also said that this would be known as the Ministry for finding a job for somebody. I can assure him that it is not a Ministry for finding a job for me, and, as I have already said, as soon as the President takes it over, I will leave it with very good grace. Deputy Cooper pointed out that Monsieur Poincaré was the Minister for Foreign Affairs in France. That is because the preponderating matter in France is foreign affairs, and if that were the preponderating matter in Ireland, I have no doubt the President would give attention to it now as he gave in the last year to other matters. Deputy Redmond spoke considerably about the Publicity Department. That is a matter to which I would like to refer, but I am not permitted to do so. Mr. Milroy complained of the fact that our trade agents abroad are under the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON: Is it in order for a Minister to refer to a Deputy as Mr. So-and-so?

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: It is not often the Minister speaks here.

Mr. FITZGERALD: I apologise. In other countries foreign representatives are under the Department of Foreign Affairs, and for this reason, the moment we come to deal with other countries, although it seems to be a straightforward trade matter, there are always political and international questions arising. The obvious thing is clear to everybody and a trade department can be expected to look after that, but you need a co-ordinating department to look after the political or national point of view, to suggest recommendations and maintain co-ordination. So far as our department is concerned with foreign trade, we, of course, consult with, and submit to, the trade department any matters that affect trade only, but the suggestion that we are making a cumbersome machine for dealing with trade with other countries is quite untrue and quite unnecessary. We follow in that just the lines that are followed in other countries, and those are not arbitrarily followed. They exist in the very nature of the circumstances. On many occasions when dealing with things outside of Ireland, there is not only one department but many involved. The External Affairs Department has to serve as a co-ordinating factor in these things and has to consider the point of view of the various Departments that may be contradictory and present the national or political view. As I said before, there is nothing in this Bill which prevents this Department being under the President, and the reason it has not been under him so far is owing to the exigencies of the present situation.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I would like to ask your ruling, sir, with regard to publicity being under the External Affairs Department. Under this Bill it is not put in charge of publicity, and it is, therefore, open for me to argue that it is no longer a wholtime job for a Minister, but should be under the President. Is that a legitimate line of argument?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I would rather hear any line of argument before saying whether it was legitimate or not, but on the question of order about this particular amendment, paragraph 11 of Section 1 details the scope of the Department of External Affairs, and says: "Of which Department the head shall be, and shall be styled, an t-Aire um Ghnóthaí Coigríche, or (in English) the Minister for External Affairs." Under Sections 10 and 11 of the Bill it will be possible for the President to be also the Minister for External Affairs, or it would be possible for any other Minister to be Minister for External Affairs as well. As I understand the amendment, its object is to make it statutory that the President, and only the President, shall be the Minister for External Affairs. That, I think, is the object of the amendment.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: That is the intention.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The question is really not a question of the behaviour of the present Department, not a question of the personality of the present Minister or any other Minister, real or imaginary, but a question whether the Department should be by statute under the President. The Executive Council, if the amendment is passed, would be prevented from having any individual other than the President as Minister for External Affairs. That seems to be the exact position. The actions of the Department come up on the Estimates.

Major BRYAN COOPER: Would it be open for me to reply to some of the statements of the Minister?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes.

Major BRYAN COOPER: There are one or two points to which, I think, attention may be called in the Minister's speech. It seems to be a most fortunate Department, because one moment he was magnifying it and at another minimising it. It is like Mahommed's corpse; it is not important enough to reach the ministerial heaven, and it is too important to come under a subordinate Civil Servant. He compared it with the cost of the offices in London, of New Zealand, Australia, and South Africa, but he did not mention that these offices have great immigration schemes to deal with in trying to attract emigrants to take up the great waste spaces. That is not our problem, as really we want to keep our people in the country. The comparison in part is a fallacious one. The Minister talked of our lowering ourselves, in reply to Deputy Gorey, if we do not have a separate Ministry. In Canada Mr. Mackenzie became Prime Minister and also Minister for External Affairs.

Mr. FITZGERALD: If I may be allowed to explain, I did state it would be lowered if there was not a Minister in charge of it who made it his first pre-occupation. I did not say it would be lowered if it were under the President.

Major COOPER: It is not his first pre-occupation. Surely the Minister knows that Canada is vitally concerned with her status, most emphatically now as she is an independent Treaty-making power. Surely no Prime Minister or party leader is first pre-occupied with external affairs. I think that even now the time has come when the real head of the State should be the person really responsible for external affairs. He must be in the nature of things, and I think the time has come when he should assume all responsibility in the face of the world, and take the office on his own shoulders. I support the amendment.

Mr. GOREY: For the first time the Minister has been good enough to speak

[Mr. Gorey.] on this matter. We have not heard him very often in the Dáil. When he stood up I think he ought to have told us how much this Ministry is costing. I am sorry I was not here to listen to what the Minister had got to say. I want to know how much the Staff of the Ministry is actually costing, from the Minister down. He said a Department of the Ministry was needed in London to deal with our trade. Why have we a Ministry of Industry and Commerce if it is not able to deal with the trade of this country? We have a Ministry of Agriculture which deals with our trade in agricultural products. The Minister for External Affairs objects to the statement that his Ministry will be known in the country as a Ministry for finding jobs. I may tell you that outside the Dáil, and amongst the plain men in the street, it will be known as a Ministry of very little utility and a Ministry purely for finding jobs for somebody—not for the present Minister, perhaps. I do not think that the President of the Executive Council, if he is given this portfolio, will be overworked. He ought to be able to deal with this Ministry of External Affairs, if there is such a thing to be attended to; some of us very much doubt it. The President can deal with the political end of it, if there is a political end to it. The commercial end of it can be dealt with by the Ministry of Industry and Commerce, with the assistance of the Ministry of Agriculture. I do not see the necessity for this Ministry at all, either its staff or its head, and therefore I support the amendment.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The question of the existence of this Ministry has not arisen. The cost of the Department of External Affairs does not arise. It is a question of whether the Department of External Affairs, as defined in the amendment which takes the definition from para. 11 of Section 1 of the Bill, should be under a separate Minister or be compulsorily under the President and nobody else.

Mr. JOHNSON: I support the amendment on the grounds that it is desirable in my view that the very important work of this Department should be in the hands of the head of the Executive Council because of its importance. For entirely different reasons from those of Deputy Gorey, I support the amendment. I believe the existence of this Department will, and must necessarily, increase if we are to get the position in world affairs that we are entitled to. I think it must necessarily increase and will require a Department as laid down in the Bill. I think it is so important that it should be a Department of which the President of the Executive Council for the time being must be the head.

Most of the arguments of the Minister for External Affairs supported the contention that to the outside world the fact that the President of the Executive Council is also Minister for External Affairs will add to its prestige and importance. It is because I desire there shall be statutory obligation that the President shall have charge of that Department, that I support the amendment.

MINISTER FOR HOME AFFAIRS

(Mr. O'Higgins): My chief object in rising is to stress and emphasise what already has been pointed out, that it is not a question of the existence or non-existence of a Department, but simply a question of the political head-ship of that Department. I might remind Deputies that it is really quite a short time since they, on the nomination of the President, approved each political head of all the Departments that there is joint responsibility for in the Executive Council. They ought not to have approved these without consideration, and when the President nominated his Council, naming a man for each post and for the political head-ship of each Department, presumably Deputies gave the matter the consideration they ought to have given it.

Mr. JOHNSON: They did as a matter of confidence.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Deputies will remember also that while the Dáil was sitting here demanding the very full attention of the President and other Ministers, there was sitting in London a Conference, not without importance for this country, for its people and for its future—the Imperial Conference.

Throughout six months the Minister for External Affairs was in attendance at that Conference representing this country and reporting to the President. The President, not being a bird, cannot be in two places at the same time.

Mr. GOREY: Boyle Roche.

Captain REDMOND: An aeroplane.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The Minister for External Affairs was present in London watching and safeguarding the interests of this country and reporting to the President of the Executive Council. He could not have attended there with the same weight and in the same representative capacity other than as a Minister for External Affairs. If Deputies consider that the President himself qua Minister for External Affairs, should have been present in London throughout that Conference, then they have got to measure the corresponding loss on this side due to the absence of the head of the Executive Council.

It is not all quite so simple as it seems to Deputies Heffernan and Gorey, and above all it is not a question of economy to be effected by scrapping a particular Department, because that Department cannot be scrapped. It is simply a question of the political headship of that Department and I think I have pointed out one practical inconvenience that would follow if the political headship had been vested in the President.

Major COOPER: The Prime Ministers of Canada, Australia, South Africa and New Zealand did attend the Imperial Conference and they are not birds. They arranged for business to be carried on in their Parliaments by their colleagues, sometimes at a good deal of inconvenience. I have no doubt that the Minister for Home Affairs does not mistrust the Vice-President's capacity for carrying on the business of the Dáil. I think those things can be all arranged very easily as in the other Dominions. I think it would be an advantage to Ireland to have had our President on an equal footing instead of having—I speak with all respect to the excellent work the Minister for External Affairs did—a subordinate Minister doing so.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: While the Imperial Conference was sitting Canada and Australia were not running a little Civil War.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I would like to touch upon one or two points made by the Minister for External Affairs, and in doing so I must congratulate him on what I consider to have been almost his maiden speech in this Chamber. Not quite his maiden speech, but almost, and that very fact itself illustrates the contention that has been made throughout on this amendment and as the whole cause of this amendment, not that there should not be a Department for External Affairs, but that the responsibility for that Department must invariably be answered for in this Dáil by the President. That has always been the case in the past and will be the case in the future.

Mr. PETER HUGHES: Making speeches.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: The Minister stated that the Ministry was not a luxury. We are not dealing with whether the Ministry is a luxury or whether the Minister for External Affairs is himself a luxury. What we are dealing with is that in the circumstances the Dáil and the country will look to the President for responsibility for this Department. That being the case, even minor economies are sometimes desirable, and the economy effected by saving the Minister's salary is an economy that will be quite desirable for this country. The Minister has stated in reply to that, that a Secretary would have to be appointed. I imagine that there is a Secretary there already. There has been a Secretary. A Secretary's salary has been voted. The Minister for External Affairs referred to the joint responsibility of the Executive Council. There we are all at one. There is joint responsibility. Whoever in a Conference abroad, whether in Geneva, or in London or elsewhere, answers for that joint responsibility, all that is sought to be effected by this amendment is that for that joint responsibility one person, and one person

[Mr. Darrell Figgis.] only, will be answerable in this Dáil. And that person will be the person who must answer, who will be expected to answer, who always in the past has answered for External Affairs.

We had occasion a month ago when a question was put by Deputy Milroy respecting the affairs of this State and its relation with another State, to appreciate this. A question was put down on the motion for the adjournment. By whom was the answer given? By the President. Go back over the proceedings for the past year, and every time a vital question has been asked in this Dáil, who has intervened in the debate to deal with the question? The President. The Dáil would not be satisfied if any other person than the President had answered. Therefore, the procedure that has been adopted, by the practice of the Executive Council itself, is a procedure for which statutory effect has been sought in this amendment. That is all. The Minister says that the President may take the responsibility for it at an early date. That still does not answer the contention of the amendment. The Minister for External Affairs says that he would go with a good grace. We would bear his going with philosophy and fortitude. But that still does not answer the purpose of the amendment, and that is, that the responsibility for External Affairs in the Free State is a responsibility that the people and the Legislature will look to the President himself to acquit. Therefore, it is a responsibility that should be attached in any legislation in the Dáil to the Presidency of the Executive Council.

Mr. HEWAT: As I propose to vote against this amendment, if it comes to a division, I would like to say that the arguments that have been used in favour of the amendment seem to cut under the importance of the office of the Minister for External Affairs. In the present state of the country there is not one of the Ministries that is more important, in so far as the work done under this Department is largely initiatory work. At the present time, at all events, I would be very sorry to see the Department left in charge of any subordinate. I quite sympathise with the arguments that have been used that the President should be Minister for External Affairs. I think it is fallacious to say that he should be directly the Minister for External Affairs, because I rather visualise the President as being the head of all Departments. As President of the Executive Council, in matters of importance I think it is very right and proper that we should have his views, certainly on matters of External Affairs. I do not think that that in itself justified the abolition of the Ministry of External Affairs. In my judgment, and with the development that we hope and expect in the country, the work of the Minister for External Affairs will be largely increased. We all hope it will be largely increased, and we hope that we still will have the assistance of the President of the Executive Council in addition to the Minister for External Affairs.

Professor O'SULLIVAN: May I point out what is an inconvenience, if this amendment is adopted. It is a very definite inconvenience. I thoroughly agree with Deputy Johnson that this Department for External Affairs will become more important in the future, and that it will continue to grow to be more and more important. It does not require much stretch of the imagination to see that a state of affairs may arise in which the President may have another portfolio besides his Presidency. Will you then burden him with the Ministry of External Affairs as well? In that case you tie the hands of the Executive Council too much. It may work very badly to the interest of the other Departments quite as important as the Ministry of External Affairs. As to the arguments used by Deputy Figgis, and as to the President's replies here, we may point out that the President on all important questions, whether at home or abroad, is expected to be heard by the Dáil and the country. Therefore, that is no argument. There was no suggestion that all those other Ministries should be merged in the Presidency, though he may have spoken for them at times. No real sound argument has been adduced to force the President to adopt this particular amendment.

The PRESIDENT: I should like to say that it appears to me that this amendment has been canvassed on every side rather than on the side which, I think, was originally intended, when it was put down. The last two Deputies, when addressing themselves to this question, appeared to me to have had a very clear conception of what was meant. In the first place, the point made by Deputy O'Sullivan is a point of very considerable importance. While to-day we may cite the case of Canada, Australia or England, or one of the other countries mentioned, and say that the Prime Minister, in any one of them, is the head of the Executive Council and has also got a portfolio of Foreign or of External Affairs, as the case may be, we must remember that there were examples also of remarkable statesmen in other countries having other portfolios which must have appealed to them in their judgment—and I presume their judgment was as good in their day as the judgments of the statesmen of Canada or of Australia in our time—of paramount importance to their own country at that particular time.

In this case should you have in the future a Prime Minister, let us say, of the profound depths of knowledge of Deputy Figgis, just imagine for a moment Deputy Figgis burdening himself with such an unimportant matter as the portfolio of External Affairs when such great questions as Finance, Industry and Commerce and Agriculture were to be taken up. I would expect him to take at least four or five of these Ministries, and even if he were to do that I think we would be limiting the capacity and the capabilities of a man of that type if we were to say that he shall only take the portfolio for External Affairs and that he was to be bound to it and could not get out of it. I may say for my own part that, in considering this question of offering portfolios to Ministers, or in asking members to take up the responsibilities of office, I had in mind always the man's own desires or capabilities for these particular posts. I have no hesitation in saying, for my own part, that I have no particular ability whatever of any sort or kind for External Affairs. Personally, I would feel very unhappy if I were offered, even supposing I were not in my present position, such a portfolio as that for External Affairs, and I would certainly have to refuse it.

It may be that there is some exception taken by Deputies to the fact that I have not got a Ministry at present. In answer to that I suppose I am entitled to say that I am not a free agent altogether. I would like very much to have one. I did give up the Ministry of Finance with some regret. Of all the Ministries, it was the one that I had, perhaps, the most aptitude for. There appears to me to be two questions put forward by certain Deputies in recommending this particular office for the President: either to get rid of the present Minister for External Affairs, or to saddle the office on a man who does not want it, or at least who feels that he has not any aptitude for it. I do not know whether that attitude can be general in the Dáil. I rather hesitate to think it would be. I do not under-rate the importance of this Ministry. I do think that in speaking of Foreign Affairs for some years past our minds have, perhaps, expanded a little more than the merits of the case warranted. When speaking of Foreign Affairs we hear now and again upon various platforms the question asked: "What does the world think of men being left on hunger-strike in Mountjoy?" or something of that kind. That, I suggest, is an unbalanced view to take on the question of Foreign Affairs.

If you were to ask me at this moment what I consider to be the most important duty in the State, I would say that the internal matters are of far more importance than the matter of External Affairs. But, if you want to pourtray before an audience something which would attract their imagination, or stir up their enthusiasm, and give them an inspiration, you will say: "What is the world thinking of us now?" My answer is that the world is just thinking whether we are managing to do well or ill the work that lies before us. There are other Departments of the State just at present which would need the attention of the President very much more than the Department for External Affairs, and more particularly in the present circumstances when the person who is occupying the position of President has no aptitude whatever for External Affairs.

During the last two or three months, when I should have been in another place, the Minister for External Affairs was in a position to represent this country. I understand he did it well, and it is not from himself that I have that information. The Minister for Education was also there, and he was very well pleased with the work that was done by the Minister for External Affairs. None of the other States, during that period, had their Parliament sitting, and I suppose I would have been told, perhaps not here but elsewhere, if I were absent from this Dáil during that time, that I was paying more attention to foreigners than I was to the people at home, so that I suggest we may take an unbalanced view of these matters.

With regard to the question of the saving of the Minister's salary, the saving of the Minister's salary may be a loss in other ways. I would not feel satisfied in the present instance, as I have said, in taking up this office, nor would I recommend the Dáil to adopt this amendment, because the time may come when other people occupying my position may feel that they themselves would be able to render much better service in that office of the State than in the office of External Affairs, and that if they were to be burdened with this particular Ministry in addition they would not be able to give the close attention to important matters of State, which these matters would warrant.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: My intention in bringing forward this amendment was not to do away with the department of External Affairs, but to retain it under the headship of the President of the Executive Council. Having heard the statement made by the President, in regard to his lack of ability and aptitude, or rather his alleged lack of ability and aptitude, for carrying on the business of External Affairs, I am rather inclined to think that I made a mistake. I feel perfectly confident, however, that he has all the necessary qualifications for the position, and I am sure that he is entirely too modest in regard to his estimate of his own ability. With regard to the point in reference to the matter of economy, I am quite aware of the comparatively small saving that would be made by this change if it were brought about. It would only mean a saving of £1,700 a year, or perhaps less, because if it happened that the Minister for External Affairs is removed and the Ministry put under the headship of the President of the Executive Council we would, no doubt, save the £1,700 a year attaching to that office, but very likely a Parliamentary Secretary would have to be appointed, with a salary attached approximating to the amount saved. But economy goes further than that, and one of the main things about economy is the example we give to the country. We would be then setting an example of economy from here, even if only on items of the very smallest importance. We, who are in close touch with the people of the country, find criticisms of that kind, when we go down into the country, brought to our notice. We hear that there are eleven Ministers, with very high salaries, and we are asked, "Why don't you cut these down?" I felt that, in moving this amendment, I was aiming at eliminating the Ministry of the least importance in the affairs of this country. I do not say that the Minister himself is of the least importance. What I say is that this Ministry of External Affairs is the one of least importance, and I am still of opinion, that from that point of view, it would be very desirable that my amendment should be accepted.

I am aware, at the same time, of the importance of this Ministry and of this Department to the farming industry of this country. I am sure it is very necessary that we should be in close touch with the different agricultural countries throughout Europe, but I feel there is considerable danger that in our new nationhood we may be liable to over-estimate our importance in the world, and that, like the frog in the fable, we are apt to blow ourselves out and regard our own opinion as of such importance in the affairs of the world that we may be in danger of bursting just with the sense of our own importance as the frog did. For that reason I think it might be advisable that the Ministry of External Affairs should be placed under the headship of the President of the Executive Council. I do not know any person who would be in a better position to judge the importance of the different matters which might come up with regard to the position of Ireland, and concerning its connection with foreign countries.

Another point I wish to mention is this, I would like to support Deputy Bryan Cooper with regard to the comparison made between the cost of the Irish High Commissioner in London, and that of Canada, New Zealand, and other Dominions.

Mr. DESMOND FITZGERALD: As a matter of explanation, may I say I did not institute a comparison between the cost of the Irish High Commissioner in London and other High Commissioners. I said that one branch of the Department of External Affairs of these various countries would cost more than the whole of our Ministry.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy was alluding to a statement by Deputy Bryan Cooper.

Major BRYAN COOPER: As a matter of fact, I understood the Minister to express himself when he spoke as he has expressed himself just now.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: I misunderstood. I will not go further with that now. Taking all this matter into account, I still think that my amendment is a good one and that it is advisable that we should in this Dáil 5 o'clock, abolish the Ministry of External Affairs, and place that Department under the headship of the President of the Executive Council.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE at this stage took the Chair.

Amendment declared lost.

Mr. MORRISSEY: On a point of order, there is a Deputy in the House who has not cast his vote.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy is not sitting on the benches. A vote could not be taken from a person sitting outside the benches. One Deputy has recently come in.

Mr. MORRISSEY: There was a Deputy in the House when the vote was being taken who did not vote. I thought that any Deputy in the House was supposed to cast his vote.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: Neither of the two Deputies is technically in the House. They are both in the passage outside.

Doctor KEOGH: On a point of order, is the Standing Order carried out by Deputies leaving the House before the roll call is announced, or has it become obsolete? I notice several members who were here have gone out.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputies are supposed to remain in their places until the result of the division is announced.

Amendment No. 2 not moved.

Mr. P. HOGAN (Clare): I beg to move:—

In sub-paragraph (iii), line 44, after the word "police" to insert the words "elections to each House of the Oirachtas, elections to local bodies and authorities, registration of voters."

There is nothing very drastic in the amendment I am proposing. It is merely an endeavour to transfer from the Ministry of Local Government what anybody would consider is not appropriate to that Ministry to what would appear to be its proper place—the Ministry of Justice. I do not propose to break up the present machinery that is there for the collection of such data as is necessary for the preparation of registers and the conduct of election work in general. I only propose to transfer the lever of Government from the hands of the Minister for Local Government to the hands of the Minister for Justice. If any Minister is in a position to see that justice is carried out during elections and in the preparation of the registers and such work, the Minister for Justice is that person. When a Ministry of Health was established in England on a more scientific basis, and different departments were set up under that Ministry, this matter of the preparation of registers and election procedure in general was transferred to the Home Office, which is equivalent to the Ministry of Justice in this Government. I suppose it may be argued that justice, either theoretical or applied, has very little to do with elections. That is a matter I will leave to the opinion of the different Deputies. But if any Minister is competent and in a position to see that justice is practised in electioneering work, and in the preparation of registers, I think the Minister for Justice is that person.

THE PRESIDENT: This is one of those services which it is possible to transfer, even after the Bill is passed. That matter has been considered. I do not think it would be right to say it has been under consideration. But the Minister for Home Affairs has considered it himself, and I am not clear as to whether the Minister for Local Government has considered it or not. But it is under consideration, and if this amendment were to be pressed and passed we would be committed to this particular alteration without being convinced that it is satisfactory. I incline to the view that it will be found necessary to make this alteration, but I think that the Deputy ought to leave it at that and I can assure him that it will get consideration.

MR. JOHNSON: It is delightful to hear the President express himself in the way he has done, but one would imagine that the Bill was presented to the Dáil simply for ratification without consideration. Surely, even though this matter is under consideration, or has been considered by Ministers, or some of them, that will not, or should not, deprive the Dáil of expressing its opinion as to the merits of this amendment. I think that the fact that the President has expressed himself in the way he has done rather encourages us to express the view more strongly that this particular function of government should be taken out of the hands of the Local Government Department and placed under the Ministry which is in charge of public order.

The Ministry for Local Government and Public Health, as it now will be, will tend more and more to deal with matters of public health. The function of preparing registers and looking after elections seems to be quite foreign to the work of Local Government and Public Health but is peculiarly fitting to that Department which is responsible for public order. A proposition was made. I think it will be remembered, at an earlier stage of the proceedings of the Dáil, that a functionary should be appointed specially for the purpose of looking after elections and all pertaining to elections. That did not meet with the approval of the Dáil. The Ministry for Justice, which is in charge of public order, seems very much more appropriate for the work of preparing registers and taking charge of the elections to the Houses of the Oireachtas and local bodies. I hope Deputies will express their views on this matter rather for the guidance of the Government than otherwise. If the matter is still open, perhaps even before the Bill passes finally, the Ministry will be able to make up its mind as to whether this particular Department should be transferred to the Ministry of Justice.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. K. O'Higgins): I take it that the main reason why this question of elections is at present conducted by the Local Government Department is that the register is prepared by the local bodies through the agency of the rate collectors and so on. That is a fairly substantial reason why the control should lie where it is at present. There has been a good deal of complaint and discontent about the manner in which the registers have been prepared and there is a feeling that they ought to be prepared by the police—the Civic Guard in the country and the Metropolitan Police in the city. If that change were to come about it would remove, in my opinion, the case for responsibility by the Local Government Minister for the franchise and for election work generally. If we were asked at the moment whether the Civic Guard could take responsibility for that work and could be relied upon to carry it out thoroughly, we would hesitate to accept the responsibility. At the moment you have not a full or a normal establishment in the country as there are about 150 more stations to be established. The question could only be considered when you would have a complete establishment, and when you would have less of a strain on the police forces than at present exists. In discussing the matter with the Minister for Local Government that seems to be the situation, that if responsibility for the preparation of the register were to pass to the police, and consequently to the Ministry for Home Affairs, or Ministry for Justice, as it will be when this Bill is passed, then the full control of elections should also pass.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I hope the change will be made and that the Ministry who it is said are thinking over the matter will bring about the change very soon. It is not directly to that, however, that I wish to address a question at this stage. It is to a statement made by the President which perhaps strictly arises at a later stage, as it undoubtedly will, but which should also be considered here because it is proper to the consideration of the sub-sections to this Section that we are now considering. The President stated it would be possible, if such a change were judged to be desirable, to transfer that function from the Local Government Department to the Ministry of Home Affairs or the Ministry of Justice as it then will be. I presume he is referring to sub-section 2 of Section 11 dealing with the power of the Executive Council to distribute public services amongst Ministers. That raises a question in regard to this Section, particularly in regard to all its sub-sections. Here is a definite allocation of service for a Department. If this Bill be passed, when it becomes an Act it will be the law of the land that these various functions shall be allocated to different Departments. Is it the intention that there may be within the purview of this Act, although these sections have set out definite boundaries to certain Departments, that these boundaries may afterwards be varied by the Executive Council? If so, and if that is the interpretation that is to be given in the consideration of these sub-sections, naturally a good deal of the discussion of these sub-sections would be very materially changed.

It is definitely stated here that these services that Deputy Hogan desires to transfer from the Local Government Department to the Ministry of Home Affairs are allocated to the Ministry of Local Government. When they are allocated there it becomes an Act, and surely if it is desirable to transfer them, if the Ministry think they should be transferred, they should be transferred while this Bill is before the Dáil.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: May I point out that the Bill, in Section 11, makes express provision enabling the redistribution of public services, and in a matter of this kind, which will probably require legislation, it would be very inconvenient to proceed to redistribute the functions before you have legislation providing new machinery. For instance, if the method of compiling registration lists is to be taken from one body of persons and put in the hands of another body it will require an Act. If in the meantime you allocate the function to the Minister for Justice he will, during that indefinite period, have to take charge of persons who are more naturally under the Minister for Local Government, so that if this reform is effected it will require legislation, and attendant on that legislation an order could be made, under Section 11, redistributing this and putting it under Justice.

Mr. JOHNSON: On the point of the practicability of this amendment, if I am not mistaken it was found that during the preparation of the lists of the register that certain officials of the Local Government Department were not doing their work satisfactorily, and provision was made for somebody else to do that work. It is quite possible that may be required again, and I can see that even within this amendment the satisfactory officials of the Local Government Department may still be employed, until the full machinery is at work, as agents for the Minister for Home Affairs or the Minister for Justice, as he may be. I do not think it is unknown in Government services for servants of one Ministry to do duty on behalf of another Ministry, and I think that that might well be accomplished even though this amendment were accepted.

The PRESIDENT: I cannot accept the amendment. This amendment and the next one are much the same. The next includes the charge of roads and highways. The mere selection of one Minister as regards another does not involve very many considerations other than one which might be put forward as regards their adaptability for a particular class of work, but the taking of the ordinary machinery for the registration of voters from Local Government and handing it over to the Ministry of Justice is a step for which no reason has been given that would convince me that it was a desirable improvement on the present situation. If there be anything wrong at all it is in the compilation, and that involves a number of very serious questions. There are people who consider that they have a vested interest in that particular class of work. Vested interests of persons occupying positions under local authorities are usually costly things to annul, unless there is a very grave reason for annulling them. You can dismiss, but if you simply take away, there must be compensation. The local authority would, in my view, hesitate to compensate in a case of that sort, and the question is really too complicated to be dealt with in the manner of an amendment such as that, and at the same time the fact of improving it is what I believe the Deputy has in mind in moving the amendment. No reason has been given as to how this would be better administered under one Minister than under another. No reason has been given as to any particular machinery that one Minister might bring into play that is not in play at present. If, on the other hand, there is to be an entire alteration of the system of registration that alteration is a big question, involving many considerations which I do not think would be disposed of by passing this amendment.

Amendment put, and declared lost.

Amendment by Mr. R. Corish:—In Sub-paragraph (iv.), lines 60-63, to delete the words, "elections to each House of the Oireachtas, elections to local bodies and authorities, registration of voters, maintenance of public roads, and highways."

Mr. CORISH: With the leave of the Dáil I would like to withdraw the first portion of this amendment, as it has been practically disposed of with the last amendment. The object of the latter part is to try to secure the attention of the National Government to the present condition of the roads. I am of the opinion that the local authorities are not in a position to give the attention to the roads warranted at this particular juncture. The roads in this country have been neglected very much during the past five or six years, with the result that the highways are, I daresay, about the worst in the world. All over the world to-day different States are giving this due attention, the attention it warrants in view of the heavy traffic in the way of motor haulage, and my proposal is that this matter should be taken from the local councils altogether and placed under a Ministry of Transport, as is proposed in the Railway Bill. I think everybody will agree that the roads have not got the attention they warrant, and the object of this amendment, as I have said, is to take all extraneous functions from the Local Government Ministry and to make it as much as possible a

Ministry of Health. I formally move the amendment.

Mr. WILSON: In view of the Bill brought forward to appoint a Minister for Transport, what will happen to the roads if they were taken from under the control of local authorities, as would be the case if this was expunged.

Mr. JOHNSON: Read down the amendments. There is a consequential amendment.

Mr. WILSON: If you take the power of maintaining the public roads and highways from the Local Government Department and this Transport Bill of yours does not pass, who will then look after them? That is the point I would like to have cleared up.

Mr. JOHNSON: Do not imagine impossibilities.

The PRESIDENT: This also, to my mind, raises other difficulties. At present the Minister for Local Government exercises control over the administration of local authorities, and in his capacity as supervisor of roads—I forget the exact term—is entitled to authorise the expenditure of certain moneys on roads. We take him away and we anticipate a larger amount of expenditure on certain roads, and there would be no authority that I know of to deal with the matter should this amendment pass. I have not observed any amendment placing the control under any other department, and then, in the event of the calamity of the failure of this other Bill to pass, as Deputy Wilson suggests, we would be left without any person in control of roads. I am sure the Deputy had not that in mind when he put down this amendment. There was a Ministry of Transport, or a Road Board, or some other organisation like that, but now the Local Government Department has taken over these various boards, which are now comprised in the one term, "Local Government," generally.

I do not know that there has been that opportunity for utilising the services of these institutions to their best. I think that we are on the eve of utilising them to their best, and of getting better value than up to this.

It would be unwise now to make another change, at least until an opportunity had been given to the Minister for Local Government for making good, but in any case if it were desirable to take control away from the Local Government you must first make up your minds as to whom it is to be given

Mr. JOHNSON: I am sorry to have to point out to the Minister his lack of attention to the Bill of which he is in charge. The same applies to Deputy Wilson. There are provisions in other amendments handing over this particular function of looking after highways and public roads to another Department, and if the Dáil would signify its desire to have that function taken from the Local Government Department, undoubtedly it would be sensible enough to put the work into the hands of somebody else. If the President would look at Amendment 11 he would find that what he thought an oversight has not been an oversight at all. The President has noted that there was a Ministry of Transport, and a Road Board. I think it is rather a pity that the fullest advantage was not taken of extending the functions of that Road Board. The roads are becoming more and more a matter of importance, and less and less are they becoming local, and it was in view of the expressed desire to place administrative affairs on a more scientific foundation than they had been that this attempt was made to put the highways and public roads under the charge of an authority whose function it would be to look after provisions for transport, and take them out of the hands of Local Government. Deputy Wilson has, I think, indicated more than once the difficulties that arise from the use of certain roads under one local authority by conveyances issuing out of another local authority's jurisdiction. We find very many complaints that heavy vehicles belonging to one town or district use roads of another district, and that will continue until you have some co-ordination of responsibility. It was with that desire this amendment was put forward. Whatever objections there may be to the amendment they are not the objections which have been stated.

Mr. WILSON: Might I point out that I think Deputy Johnson is putting the car before the horse. He takes away the authority of the local bodies, and before he sets up another authority he leaves these roads in the charge of nobody. In the proposed Bill of course the authority would be set up, but I maintain he should first have that authority, which he calls Transport and Communications, and then he could transfer, as was intended to be transferred before, their functions, by taking them away from Local Government, and giving them to this body which he proposes to start, but which is not in existence at the moment.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: May I point out that the amendment, and the consequential amendment, would not have the effect of removing these roads from their present custodians. The only effect would be that they would remain as at present statutorily administered under the various Local Government Acts, but that the different Ministers would be responsible for those branches of what are now the same system of Local Government. Again, this amendment would merely have the effect of putting two Ministers in charge of what are now under Statute branches of one subject matter, Local Government.

Mr. GOOD: May I point out that this is a matter that possibly ought to get more consideration than it appears to have had. I agree with Deputy Johnson that there are very sound grievances at the moment. In some of the local authorities we have road-ways which are very largely used, and from the traffic on which they derive no benefit at all. These heavy motors pay a motor tax, and under the old régime it was under consideration as to whether the main roads would not be taken over and administered by what was called the Road Board, and some of the main roads in Ireland have been so administered. Under the new régime these motor taxes are collected, and I do not know that any body has been set up corresponding with the Road Board. Consequently the heavy maintenance now falling on several of the local authorities will have to be borne by these authorities, and, I think, unfairly borne. It appears to me that this whole question of road transport is one that ought to have the serious consideration of the Government, and some considered proposals should be put before the Dáil with regard to it.

Mr. L. D'ALTON: I quite agree with Deputy Good in this matter as to the importance of the maintenance of the main and trunk roads, and that they should be under certain control, but I know of no control under which they can remain but that of the Department of Local Government. That matter is in their hands—the maintenance of these roads as they should be maintained—and the co-ordination that Deputy Johnson looks for can alone be had by the existing authorities, the Local Government Department, using the power which is in their hands to see that the co-ordination takes place, and that those who run the County Councils and the Corporations and Urban Councils should see how they can co-ordinate. I think at present we all see the necessity for an improvement in the roads, but now is not the time when the Local Government Department has framed a scheme dealing with these roads and which aims at seeing that the money expended and labour employed on these roads is done so to the advantage of the ratepayers, in the improvement of these roads and making them suitable for traffic, and place them in a position that those who pay their motor tax will have roads that can carry goods in competition with the railways. To change the authority at present, unless there is some solid reason given, would be a very great mistake.

Amendment put and declared lost.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I beg to propose the following amendment, No. 5:—

“In page 4, line 9, sub-paragraph V. to delete the words “vocational and technical training.”

This amendment, together with the consequential amendment No. 9, purports to withdraw technical and vocational training from the Ministry of Education, and give it instead to the Ministry for Industry and Commerce. Technical and vocational training, or technical instruction, as it is known, has never been under the Ministry of Education in the past. It is being transferred from the Ministry of Agriculture to the Ministry of Education, and I will try to persuade the Government that in making this change it should not be under the Ministry of Education but under the Ministry of Industry and Commerce. In spite of the devoted work done by very able men for technical education in this country I do not think that we can say it is in a satisfactory state. I think it was started on wrong lines. About the time the Department of Agriculture was started, Sir Horace Plunkett explained his intention in a reference which I have been unable to trace. As far as I can remember, he wanted every farmer to acquire a sufficient knowledge of carpentry to be able to mend a door or hang a gate. The result is that technical education has largely tended to produce a smattering of knowledge and, when a man has finished his ordinary education, sometimes he went to a technical school to learn to mend a door but more often to learn shorthand and typewriting, to get away from the farm. Some weeks ago the Minister for Agriculture complained that amongst the functions which came under him were the teaching of French, shorthand and typewriting. These are not part of technical education but rather are a part of secondary education. If they are technical education I can quite admit the case for bringing them under the Ministry of Education is a perfect one. To my mind technical education should be something very different from that and instead of following the footsteps of the past the moment has, I think, come to make a very great change because we cannot afford to go on producing elegant accomplishments, which is what most technical schools in this country have been doing. I remember about a dozen years ago—and I do not think the system has changed since—going over a technical school and discovering that for every girl learning cooking nine were learning to draw and shade cones and cylinders. That is a very excellent thing in its way, but why should the State pay for it? I want to make technical education an introduction to industry and as far as possible a branch of industry itself, and I think we should follow the lines adopted in Germany before the war. I am forced to take pre-war conditions because at present you cannot get information from Germany that is not propaganda on one side or the other. Before the war German technical education was very remarkable. Take Chemnitz, an industrial town in Saxony about the size of Cork. It would like to call itself the Manchester of Germany. In Chemnitz there were compulsory continuation schools to which children went from the age of fourteen to seventeen and paid fees. There were two general artisan schools for teaching general trades—one for boys and one for girls. There were trades schools run by trades guilds, and I wish our trades unions would think of taking up something of the same kind. These schools were for tailors, chemists, innkeepers—I do not know if anybody in this country would say that innkeeping is a trade to be taught.

Mr. WILSON: And barbers.

Major BRYAN COOPER: Yes, barbers. Surely nobody would like to be shaved by a barber who does not know his business. Chemnitz is mainly a textile town and a special textile school was established there. In 1900 it had about 60 students. It had an academy which taught chemistry, engineering, and architecture with power to give degrees. It had 404 students. There was also a trade school which taught milling and engineering. The students there were engaged in industry and commerce during the day and went to school at night to try and better their conditions. In this not very large German town, there were three technical schools directly connected with industry, and the working people thought it worth while to pay fees to go to them because the whole object of German technical education was not to train the rank and file, but to train officers. All who were educated there felt that they were qualifying themselves to work upwards. I should like to see something like that in this country, though I admit it would not be easy. It would take a good deal of thought, and would require co-operation between employers and labour so that I do not suppose it would succeed. Take Cork for instance. I believe it has a brewing industry. I should like to see a brewing school there. It has an industry for assembling motor cars, and I think the technical schools there should teach motor engineering in the hope of students turning out some improvements, for even the Ford car is capable of improvement. These are the lines we ought to go on in the future. That is the reason I am putting forward the amendment, and I believe that technical training should belong to the Ministry of Industry and Commerce and not to the Ministry of Education where it will become less practical and more academic.

Mr. GOOD: Deputy Cooper has pointed out one of the reasons why technical education has failed in this country. I am sorry, as one who has had a good deal to do with technical education, that I cannot agree with his reasons. The reason that those engaged in technical education assign for its failure, for it has been a failure in Ireland, is the low standard of primary education in Ireland. Owing to this low standard of primary education, boys and girls coming from primary schools are unable to pass the simple qualifying examination for entrance into technical schools. The result is while we have magnificent schools, not alone in the cities but all over Ireland, they are, comparatively speaking, empty. Technical education has been under a separate educational authority in Ireland since its inception. I am quite satisfied if technical education is to attain to that position in this country in the future in which we would all like to see it, it is only by having it and all other departments of education under one authority. I hope the Government will adhere to its proposal to place these different departments of education under one authority.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. P. Hogan): I think there is very little between Deputy Cooper and

Deputy Good. Deputy Cooper would like to see brewing and the technical side of brewing taught in Cork, and also the dyeing industry taught where there is a dyeing industry, and so on. That was not done in the past. There was no attempt whatever to make arrangements for the teaching in technical schools of particular industries to suit particular localities where the teaching of, let us say, special subjects would be appropriate. The reason probably was that there were very few industries, and there was not sufficient demand. There is nothing in the Bill to prevent—even though technical education, like primary, secondary and university education, is controlled and co-ordinated under the Minister for Education—the Ministry of Industry and Commerce, or, say the Ministry for Agriculture or any other Ministry who wish to develop any special branch of technical education, from making a special grant out of special funds to any technical school to develop that. I think that sort of arrangement is much sounder than to take technical education in bulk and say it shall be controlled by the Ministry for o'clock. Industry and Commerce.

What is technical education? Reading is part of technical education. Writing, arithmetic, algebra, other subjects of that sort are taught and will always be taught in technical schools. French could be taught, shorthand and book-keeping could be taught and will always be taught in technical schools.

What Deputy Cooper wants to provide for is, where there are special industries, and where it is necessary that special technical skill should be acquired for special industries in particular neighbourhoods the particular Ministry interested should be in a position to promote and develop them. In this Bill the Ministry for Industry and Commerce can provide in its estimates for a grant to technical schools somewhere and would be in a position to say to a given technical school: "We will give you so much per annum provided you give so many hours per week to this subject and provided you satisfy us as to the syllabus." That is the point Deputy Cooper makes. In the same way the Minister for Agriculture could say

[Mr. P. Hogan.] to any of the schools teaching agriculture through the country, and there are a number of them: "We will give you a certain amount of money provided you give a certain course of agriculture in your schools." That is provided for, but because it is necessary to provide for that, and to give a Minister who has an interest in such a subject a chance to develop it, we should not, because of that, hand over technical education as a whole to that Minister. The Minister for Education should control technical education in its proper aspect. There should be ample opportunities for any other Ministry, perhaps even the Ministry for Finance, which may be interested from its own point of view, to develop that in any school anywhere.

Mr. PETER HUGHES: To my mind nothing speaks so well as facts in most of those cases. I agree with Deputy Cooper when he said it is a good thing that industry should be taught in technical schools and that facilities should be given for the teaching of particular industries in any district. I venture to suggest that the fault lies greatly with the Committees of Technical Instruction, because I know that the Department are willing to help people to put up workshops of a particular kind suited to a particular locality. I know that in the town I come from they have given a grant to put up a workshop driven by electricity, and all the various machines are there to teach young men what they are supposed to learn in railway work and foundries. I think if the various Committees took up the class of work suitable to the district and asked the Department of Education for grants they would get them. As regards motor engineering, it is only a few days ago since I had an interview with an inspector of the Department, and he was anxious to push the motor business, because, he said, there were a great deal of motor mechanics in that area and he would be prepared to establish a class in connection with the school. I think it is a proper thing to do, but at the same time I believe that the Ministry for Education are the proper people to carry it out. If the other Departments wish to give grants for a special purpose, as Deputy Cooper has said, it is a good idea. The one great drawback, as far as technical schools are concerned, is the want of primary education. My experience is that very few boys and girls who get to 4th and 5th Standard and come to technical schools are fit to absorb what they get. I think if more attention were paid to this class it would be much better for technical education.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I rise to oppose this amendment. It is generally admitted that anyone who has a practical knowledge of educational matters knows that education in this country is at a low ebb. One of the principal reasons for that was the want of co-ordination in the past between the various education departments. Education was run in a series of water-tight departments with no relation whatever between one department and another. The result was that there was overlapping, waste of effort, and, on the whole, not at all the results that should have been obtained under a properly co-ordinated system.

We have heard from Deputy Good a reason for the failure of technical education. I do not admit at all that technical education, even as it has been administered for the past 20 years, is a failure. But I do say that it has not been as successful as it might have been under different circumstances. He rightly suggests that one of the reasons why that is so is that the pupils coming into technical schools have not reached the standard of education that they ought to have reached. I admit that fully and freely, but I want to point out that under the circumstances as they existed it was absolutely impossible that they would have reached that standard. What are the facts? There is no school-leaving standard at the present time. There is no standard which it is necessary that a pupil should reach before he or she leaves the primary school. They can leave when they like. The average school-leaving age is from 9 to 11 years. These pupils leave school, run about for two or three years, and it is only then that they begin to realise that they will want some smattering of education in order to get any employment. Then they turn their attention to the technical schools. They go into the technical schools and learn what they should have learned in the primary schools. That is the position, and it is well that the Deputies should know it. An improvement will not be effected unless there is co-ordination between the various systems—if we can call them systems. I say there should be only one system, and the Minister for Education should be responsible for the whole system of education in the country.

There are other important points. When the course of education in the primary school is completed, the boy has to make up his mind as to what he will do, whether he will go to the Intermediate school and enter a profession or turn his attention to industrial work and go to the technical school. I hold that it is the duty of the Minister for Education to make provision whereby the programmes and curricula of the schools will be so co-ordinated as to enable the pupil to go from one school to the other without a break. Deputy Cooper told us a lot of interesting things about what was done in a certain town in Germany. I was waiting to hear whether or not education in Germany was under the Minister for Industry and Commerce or the Minister for Education. That would be the real point of his statement. I certainly think that if we are to have improvement and progress in education, we must have one Minister and one Department responsible for education in the whole country.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: There is no doubt that Deputy O'Connell put his finger on the spot when he said that co-ordination is the one necessity for education in this country. It is not merely a matter of co-ordination in primary, secondary and technical schools—it runs right through up to the University. University professors will tell you that pupils come up to the Universities without having attained a standard that fits them to receive what ought to be University education. And so pupils going to the Universities are receiving what is really no more than a secondary education. Technical schools have had a non-educational authority in Ireland up to the present.

Now it is proposed to put them under an educational head, which will co-ordinate all the systems of education. In this connection, referring to what the Minister for Agriculture said, I may say that he had been speaking to me earlier with reference to his own Department. The Government is ready to introduce an amendment in reference to his Department—and I think the same would apply to the Department of Industry and Commerce—to permit the promotion in his case of agriculture, or in the case of the Minister for Industry and Commerce, of industry and trade, by way of education. By that means and in that way the point that Deputy Bryan Cooper made will be met.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I am not entirely convinced by the arguments of Deputy Hughes or the other Deputies who have spoken against this amendment. I am not convinced by the argument that because the state of primary education is bad, therefore technical education should be put under the same authority. It seems to me to be almost a paradox. Also, I am a little afraid that the Ministry of Education has so many problems in its own sphere that the transferring of the problem of technical education would be a rather heavy burden to place on its shoulders. I am impressed by the remarks of the Attorney-General, and also by those of the Minister for Agriculture. I think the amendment the Attorney-General is prepared to introduce on Report Stage would improve the Bill. We have had a valuable and useful debate on the subject, and I beg leave to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. GOOD: I would like to impress upon the Government the desirability of avoiding, as far as possible, the creating of a number of small schools. I quite agree with the Minister for Agriculture that if there is no possibility of providing the specialised education in connection with a particular industry in a particular district, then his Department should be given power to set up a special school for the specific purpose in that particular area.

If there should be a technical school in that particular area, and it is capable of adding an additional class and giving that specialised education in that technical school, it ought be done in that way rather than by setting up a series of schools. I think that is the point we should be careful to avoid, and we should aim at concentrating rather than segregating.

Mr. HOGAN (Minister for Agriculture): That was exactly the idea, and that was the idea to which the amendment will give expression.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move:

"In sub-paragraph (v.), line 9, after the words 'technical training,' to insert the words 'other than scientific and technical research in relation to economic development.'"

There is a question as to the intention of the Ministry in regard to this. I suggest it should be research, with a definite scientific purpose, a technological purpose. It may be undesirable that definite research work of that kind should be retained by the Ministry of Education.

I can understand, for instance, that the Minister for Agriculture would require to have authority over definite research work in reference to agriculture, as the Minister for Industry and Commerce should have responsibility for definite research work in relation to technology. There does not seem to be any department within this scheme actively interested in research, and I think it will be generally accepted that industrial development and, perhaps, agricultural development depend as much upon the research student as upon any other single factor.

Schedule 4 of this Bill places the Geological Survey under the Minister for Education. I do not know what the Survey comprises, but if it is confined to land in connection with agriculture, it should be under the administration of the Minister for Agriculture. The College of Science is used largely for definite and positive research. Inasmuch as it is mainly used for educational purposes, it should be under the Ministry of Education. But there are other operations possible in connection with it which should, I think, be under the control of the Ministry of Agriculture or the Ministry of Industry and Commerce. The object of the amendment is to ensure that that kind of inquiry should be definitely dissociated from the Ministry of Education.

Professor THRIFT: I hope this amendment will not be accepted. Even so far as technical research is concerned, it seems to me that the greatest hope lies in research conducted under the ægis of the Universities, rather than under the ægis of the Government. I do not think that we need to look long back into the history of other Governments—we have not a long history of our own to look back to—to find that the needs of research have not been attended to by these Governments and are not likely to be attended to by Governments, who have many other things claiming their attention. It seems to me that the hope of research, whether purely scientific or technical, lies in higher education and in the use of the laboratories connected with the Universities. I hope the amendment moved by Deputy Johnson with, I am sure, the best intentions, will not be accepted.

While speaking, I would like to mention a point in connection with this Sub-section, and to raise a question for the consideration of the Government. It may be argued that the wording of the Section goes further than is intended by the Government and leaves it open to some future Government to say that University Education has, through this Sub-section, lost that autonomy which, I am sure, the present Government does not wish to take from it. It would seem to place University education on the same basis as the other systems of education. I would ask the Attorney-General if he could not, on Report Stage, put in some words safeguarding University interests in that respect, and thereby remove the fears of those who, I think, reasonably regard the wording of the Section as ambiguous.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: As regards the last point, the position in connection with the Universities is that they are corporations under Charter and are self-governing units. It is not proposed by the Bill to touch their autonomy or their educational or chartered position. If there is any doubt about that, the matter can be made right by a small amendment on the Report Stage. The Section is rather directed to another aspect of the question. Apart from the existing, permanent revenues of the Universities, if public moneys are to be granted them, that should be done upon the recommendation of the Minister for Education, and on his satisfying the Minister for Finance and the Executive Council that the grant should be made. Otherwise it is not proposed to touch the Charters of the Universities.

Mr. HOGAN (Minister for Agriculture): As regards Deputy Johnson's point, the amendment the Attorney-General mentioned in connection with the last amendment moved by Deputy Major Cooper, will, I think, cover the matter he has in mind. The Dáil has to remember that the most important schools of the country—primary, secondary, technical and university—will not be controlled by the State at all. This Bill only deals with education and only controls education for which money is paid out of the taxes. If Deputy Johnson's amendment were inserted in this Section, it is quite possible that it would not be competent for the Minister for Education, or any other Minister, to make grants in connection with scientific and technical research in relation to economic development. Deputy Johnson will agree that if the Minister for Industry and Commerce be in a position to encourage scientific and technical research in relation to economic development, the Minister for Education and other Ministers should be also in that position. I think the amendment which the Attorney-General indicated in regard to Deputy Major Cooper's point will meet the case.

Mr. JOHNSON: The arguments of the Minister are, I think, sound. The object of this amendment was rather to leave it as a possibility for the Ministry of Agriculture or of Education or of Commerce, if funds were available, to do something positive for economic development in a specific line, which might not seem to be quite educational work. I realise that the effect of the amendment would be, perhaps, to deprive the Minister for Education of certain rights which I would like him to have. Therefore, I beg leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. DAVIN: I beg to move: "In sub-paragraph (vii.), line 38, to delete the word 'transport.'"

The powers and responsibilities of this Ministry, as detailed in Clause 7 of this Bill, and also in the Schedule, show quite clearly that it is already overburdened. It can be seen from the Schedule that the Ministry is really a combination of the Board of Trade, under the old regime, and the Ministry of Labour. If the Minister and his advisers were in a position to give that thought and consideration to the problem of unemployment which is requisite, they would have, in view of existing conditions, a job that would be quite sufficient to keep them going for the next twelve months. The functions of the Ministry are extraordinarily comprehensive and varied.

It is improbable, especially in view of the declarations that have been made by the Government that there is going to be a greater amount of Governmental control for the Irish Railways or the Railways in the Free State, that the Ministry will be able to give the attention in the future to the question of Transport that they are able to give at the present time. There is a case as a matter of fact for a separate Transport Ministry quite apart from the Transport and Communications Bill. Whatever the fate of that Bill may be, if we believe the statements that have been made in this Dáil with regard to Government policy, and with regard to the future of the Railways, then I think that that aspect of the problem dealing with Railway, Canal and Road Transport should be dealt with by a separate Ministry.

The Transport and Communications Bill does not add to the number of Ministers already in existence, but I think the amendment might be acceptable to the Government in view of their own declarations. I therefore move the amendment.

Mr. O'MAHONY: The desire of the Deputy appears to be to create an additional Ministry.

Mr. DAVIN: I distinctly stated that was not the position.

Mr. O'MAHONY: That was the deduction that I naturally, and I think most Deputies, drew from the Deputy's speech. The time has not yet arrived for a separate Minister for Transport. The Executive Government have not absolutely decided what they are going to do in regard to the railways. If they propose taking over the railways, then one could understand the necessity for creating a separate Ministry of Transport, but under existing circumstances all the arguments that were used this evening against a Ministry for Foreign Affairs could be used with much greater force against the proposed Ministry that would result if the Dáil were to fall in with the views that Deputy Davin has given expression to. Transport, in so far as it will be dealt with under existing conditions by the Minister for Industry and Commerce, will be a relatively small matter. Railway transport is at present in the hands of several companies. In all probability the same control will continue to be in operation, though the number of companies will probably disappear, and you will have one or two companies functioning as regards the control of the railways generally in Ireland. In these conditions I think there is no necessity for giving effect to the amendment that has been moved by Deputy Davin. We have not yet reached the time at which it is desirable that there should be a separate Ministry of Transport. On the Bill to which he is to speak this evening I am sure Deputy Johnson will air his views at length and effectively, and that will be the time, I should say, when the decision reached on that Bill will determine whether the necessity for having a Ministry of Transport will arise in the near future.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Might I suggest that this is one of a series of trial gallops in preparation for the great race which is to be run at 7 o'clock this evening, and that as it stands by itself, with this consequential amendment, the only effect of it would be to transfer Transport to the Postmaster-General and call him Transport.

The PRESIDENT: I think the Attorney-General has discovered the real point at issue in this matter. In the first place, as I understand, the proposal in this consequential amendment is to make the Postmaster-General Minister of Transport and Communications, and, I suppose, of the Post Office, because, as far as I can see, it is not intended to take away the Post Office, but to change the name so that the Post Office should be administered by the Ministry of Transport and Communications, and that there should be no mention whatever of that very important service in which the Postmaster-General has distinguished himself during the last eighteen months or two years. I regret that I was absent from the Dáil when the Deputy was making his case for this particular change, but it appears to me that Industry and Commerce, as a Ministry, has had now a very considerable experience of these particular activities, including railways. While Deputy O'Mahony is quite correct in saying that the Government has not a policy, he is correct to this extent that the Government has not disclosed its policy.

Mr. DAVIN: Even to its own supporters?

The PRESIDENT: I am sure Deputies would not wish to hasten unduly the bringing forward of proposals for dealing with such a very important matter. I am not at all satisfied that the Postmaster-General himself has a particular appetite for extending his activities in this direction, and I am not satisfied either that a case has been made to discount the work that has been done by the Ministry of Industry and Commerce in respect of these particular services.

I do not know that the amendment could be accepted by us; in fact it could scarcely be accepted by us, in view of the fact that a very important event is to take place at 7 o'clock this evening, and we would, to some extent, anticipate the discussions upon that very important measure if we were to give any consideration just now to the acceptance of this amendment.

During recent months, and, indeed, for many months past, I have had considerable experience myself of this very intricate service, and I am of opinion that it would be very unwise at present to change the administration of these services from one Minister to another. I have no doubt whatever but that the Postmaster-General is a very able and competent Minister, but I do say that he has a very large establishment to administer, and that it is quite large enough to tax the energies of even a very capable Minister like himself, and that there are opportunities, very big opportunities, I should say, for effecting some improvements even in that service. I should say, in common with other Deputies in the Dáil, that I admit the great improvements the Postmaster-General has effected already in that service. To bring now under his administration another service, and a very different service to the one that he has, would be certainly unduly to tax his ability.

Mr. HEWAT: I was sorry to hear Deputy O'Mahony say that the Government had not any mind on this question of transport, but I am glad that the President has corrected that by saying that they have not disclosed their decisions, and in connection with the important matters to be raised by Deputy Johnson's Bill, I think that is a wise course for the Government to take. I think that the Section as it stands should remain, including the word "Transport," so as not to confuse the issue.

Amendment put and negatived.

Mr. JOHNSON: Amendment No. 8, in my name, is consequential on the last amendment, so I do not move it.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: The same applies to amendment No. 9.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I beg to move amendment No. 10: To delete subparagraph (viii.). On the Second Reading I dealt with the question of this Department existing as a separate Ministry, and I should say, in moving this amendment now, that it does not mean that the Department of Fisheries as a separate Department should cease to exist, although I urge that it might be split up and made a sub-department of other departments, but that does not necessarily follow. The purpose of this amendment is to remove it as delineating apart for a separate existing Ministry in order that on the next reading the opportunity may be furnished for re-dividing the services enumerated in it amongst certain other Ministries. I stated, on Second Reading, and I repeat it, that if we were in the position to do so, the Department of Fisheries might be made one of the most important Departments of the State. It might be raised, if moneys were available to be allocated to it, into a position of such great importance that it would then justify the allocation to it of a separate Minister. I am now putting forward this amendment, not because I do not think the Department should be kept alive in view of that possibility of the future, but because there is no means at the present moment to make this Department of Fisheries a live department, to re-organise the whole of the national fisheries as they require to be re-organised, and particularly to organise export markets and home markets in the way in which they ought to be organised, so that I think that for the immediate purpose of this Bill the Department of Fisheries should be allocated elsewhere to another Ministry and not exist as a separate and distinct Department. Now, I am met already by the argument raised in one or two places that it lies within the functions of the Executive Council in this Bill to say that one Minister shall discharge two or three of these Departments. That, of course, is perfectly true; that is the text of the measure, but I imagine that it would be conceded that by setting up these departments under separate heads, and calling each a Department in the official language in which the word Department is used in the Constitution, the way is paved for the creation of separate Ministries as well as separate Departments.

It is a fact that the Ministers that exist at the present moment are the Ministers that exactly, in number and in function, agree with the Departments set out here in Section 1. I urge at the present moment that while the Department of Fisheries should be continued there is no need for a separate Minister for Fisheries. Therefore, the whole of the services as enumerated in this Sub-section should be removed from the separate Ministry mentioned and should be placed over in the charge of other Departments. And when that is being done I think a little previous examination might be desirable. I believe it is right that sea fisheries should not be allocated to the Department of Agriculture, and I would like in that regard to see the whole of that branch of this nation's service, depending, as it very largely does, on the organisation of export markets, taken over by Industry and Commerce. I do not stipulate for that, but I throw it out as a suggestion. But I do urge that because they both happen to be called Fisheries there is no necessary connection between the administration of Inland Fisheries and Sea Fisheries. I think that the administration of Inland Fisheries should continue to be exercised by the Minister for Agriculture because they naturally arise out of the operations of the Land Act; but the main question that I am placing here is this. This Sub-section should be deleted because there is no room and no time, and there is no money for a separate Minister of Fisheries, and, therefore, in this Bill the whole of this Section should be removed and the duties and services of this Department that exists, and will continue to exist, should be attached to the service of other Departments.

There is only one further matter that I want to deal with, and that is in reference to the argument put forward by the Minister for Agriculture himself on Second Reading. He spoke of this Bill as being a permanent measure. I think that the allocation of different services cannot be regarded as in any sense permanent. Different allocations are bound to be made as experience goes forward in the future. All that this Bill really can be said to achieve is, for immediate and for present purposes, until the necessity for change should be evident when certain departments should be so separated as to make room, and give justification for, the creation of Ministers in respect of them, and it is because of that conviction that I urge that Sub-section (8) should be removed and that the Ministry at the next opportunity should reapportion those services amongst other Departments, so saving the creation of this separate Ministry.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: In dealing with this amendment I should like to say, in the first place, as Deputy Figgis will admit, there is no such thing as a permanent Bill with a sovereign Parliament. Undoubtedly although this is not, on the face of it, a temporary measure nor were a number of other measures, still as things grow and develop, amending Bills will be passed, reorganisations made and subsequently, perhaps, a Consolidation Bill of a more permanent character devised. This is a Bill which organises the Departments of the State as they now stand, and puts them into their natural divisions, and Deputy Figgis answers that by saying that his amendment does not mean that the Department of Fisheries should cease to exist. Now the deletion which he proposes, I am afraid, would have that effect, whereas what he is really driving at is that there should not be a separate Minister at the head of this Department, but that the Fisheries Department should be assigned with some other Department to an individual Minister. I suggest that this is the wrong time to make that case. The time for making that case is at the creation of Ministries.

Deputy Figgis has stated that under the Bill one or two Departments may be combined by Executive Ministers. The position is that these great Departments of State may be combined by the Dáil when the Dáil is electing its Ministry.

MR. DARRELL FIGGIS: The Attorney-General, I think, was near the precincts of this House when the Ministers were created. We had not at that particular moment the honour of his presence on the benches themselves, but he may remember that when this question of the creation of a Minister was raised by three or four Deputies we were referred then to the introduction of this Bill.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I am afraid there must be some loose thinking somewhere. Ministers are elected under the Constitution. Under this Bill particular Departments of administration will be assigned to them. At the beginning of a new Ministry the President is elected by the Dáil. He proposes to the Dáil that he will appoint so many Ministers and assign them so many of the Departments of State. He may combine two or three under a particular Minister and the Dáil may not approve. The Dáil may refuse to approve of his nomination for that reason. Again, he decides to leave certain Departments of State as at present, as the President did at the commencement of this Dáil, outside the Executive Council. It would have been open then, for instance, as Fisheries and Agriculture were left by the President outside his nominations, for the Dáil to have combined Agriculture and Fisheries as two Departments in the same Ministry. The point I am making now is that this is not the time to raise this question. This question becomes appropriate at the creation of a particular Ministry. This Bill is not concerned with that particular matter. It is concerned simply with putting on paper, under headings, the various Departments of State—the natural divisions of administration. When the next Ministry comes to be chosen, then Deputy Figgis can romp home with his proposition about combining them, if the President of that day should not himself take the initiative in doing that.

Mr. O'CONNELL: The question at issue seems to be not whether or not we should have a particular Minister or a special Minister for Fisheries, but whether or not we should have a Department of Fisheries. I am strongly in favour of retaining the Department of Fisheries, inasmuch as I believe that the fishing industry is one of the most important that we have, next indeed to the agricultural industry itself. It is capable of even more development at the moment than the agricultural industry; at least there is more room for improvement there, seeing that practically nothing has been done during the last 20 years or so. I will, therefore, oppose the amendment, because I believe that the fishing industry is of such importance, and can be of such vital importance to the country, that it is essential that a special Department should be devoted to its administration and development.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I would like to clear away from Deputy O'Connell's mind any misconception he may have—I doubt if he had any—as to my disagreement with anything that he has said. I have stated, and I repeat, that I believe that if there was finance available to vote for the creation of a proper Ministry of Fisheries it might prove to be one of the most lucrative things that this country has done. I believe our fisheries are probably our greatest natural resource. It is a fact that at the present moment there is not that finance available. Whether that finance be available or not, it is surely obvious to everyone that that money will not be voted during the next financial year, and it is hardly likely to be voted in the financial year after the next. In view of that you have got merely the maintenance of an existing Department, without the inauguration of new policies, without the finance appropriate to the inauguration of this policy, without any chance of extension or expansion, without any opportunities for the organisation of markets. These things all cost money, and the money will not be available. Under the circumstances I argue that the Department should not exist as a separate Department, but that it should be put in with some other Department and administered by the Minister for that Department. I appreciate the strength of the argument of the Attorney-General when he says that this was not the proper time. I have all the greater reason for agreeing with the Attorney-General because I raised that very question when this matter was brought forward in the Dáil on an earlier occasion. I thought that was the right time and not this. But we were referred then to this occasion. We were told when we raised the question, as to whether a Minister for Fisheries should or should not be appointed, that that was not the time to consider it and that it ought to be postponed until the Ministers Bill came on, when we could raise the question as to whether there should or should not be a Ministry of Fisheries. I think the Attorney-General is right and that those who raised the question on an earlier occasion were right. We and he are in agreement on that matter, but seeing that that assurance was given that we could raise the question now and not then we have raised it now. I appreciate all that Deputy O'Connell has said as to the necessity for a proper Department of Fisheries with a Minister giving the whole of his time to it, when there would be enough finance brought into that Department to make it a living Department. But there is not the finance. There will be merely the continuation of the normal automatic functions of this Department until some time we hope in the very near future. During that intervening period this Department of Fisheries should not exist as a Department in the separate sense that it will be entitled to a Minister, but it should be included in this Bill with the services of another Department. It will be argued that because this Bill has set down in the Sub-sections of Section 1 certain separate Departments that each of these Departments will be Departments in the sense of the Constitution carrying separate Ministers.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. Hogan): Deputy Figgis has just announced that he is not open to argument. I had thought so.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I did not say that.

Mr. HOGAN: He evidently took advice which he should not take. He should not take advice slavishly. He ought to be well able to look after himself. He should have made his point on the last occasion and not now say that he did what he was told. The point is that a Ministry of Fisheries, according to Deputy Figgis, will be required later on, but that we have not enough of money to run this sort of ambitious Ministry of Fisheries that we would like to run at the present moment. His proposal is that because we cannot do that thing now we should not establish the machinery that enables it to be done later on when we have money.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Nonsense.

Mr. HOGAN: That is the sort of muddle-headedness—I do not know whether it is deliberate muddle-headedness—that Deputy Figgis has been the victim of since this Bill was introduced. This Bill does not aim at providing machinery for the situation that exists on the 5th December at five minutes to 7 o'clock. It aims at providing the machinery of Government for the next 20, 30 or 40 years.

That does not mean to say that we will not have to improve and amend it. At this stage at least we ought to know what we are aiming at. We are aiming to provide machinery of government for the future, and any argument that it is not appropriate at the moment, while admitting that it may be appropriate in a year or two, is simply giving away the whole case. It is common ground at least that in two or three years a very ambitious and a very costly, if you like, Ministry of Fisheries would justify itself. That is a common case. We are providing machinery here that would enable us in two or three years to do that. Deputy Figgis' amendment would mean that if in two or three years we wish to add a Ministry of Fisheries we would have to have a special Bill for it. If that is sound as far as Fisheries are concerned, why not apply it to every other provision of the Bill? The Deputy did not give the question any thought, and that is shown by the fact that he has not made a single suggestion as to what Ministry it should be attached to. It may be that I did not hear him.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: The Minister has suggested that I am guilty of muddle-headedness.

Mr. HOGAN: If the Deputy had an explanation to make—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE resumed the Chair at this Stage.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I will not charge the Minister with that, but I will say that he has addressed the Dáil as if it was a Petty Sessions Court.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is not a point of order or an explanation.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: In moving the amendment I gave a definite contribution, and made the point that the Minister is now raising, before the Minister came into the Dáil.

Mr. HOGAN: I listened to the Deputy stating expressly before he sat down that he did not propose to say what Ministry it should be attached to. It may be that, before I came to the Dáil, he suggested some Ministry. He certainly said before he sat down that he would not give the Dáil the benefit of his view as to what Ministry it should be attached to. I suggest that he should begin to think about that question. If he did, he might find reasons for establishing a separate Ministry of Fisheries more cogent than he thinks. The fact of the matter is, and you have got to realise it, there is a special problem in this country, and that is the problem of the congested districts. I think experience will show that you will require something like a Minister for the congested districts to deal with services that are peculiar to the congested districts, and that are not common to the congested districts and the other districts, such as

7 o'clock. land purchase. That is the reason why I am advocating that there should be a separate Ministry of Fisheries, and that the same Minister should deal with rural industries. We have the machinery in the Bill for the future developments which, I suggest to the Dáil, experience will show is necessary in that direction.

Mr. McBRIDE: I think both the Minister for Agriculture and Deputy Figgis have been wasting time.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputy McBride is in a very fortunate position. He has only one minute to waste.

Mr. McBRIDE: I was the first to object to the establishment of a Ministry of Fisheries, but the Dáil has already decided that one should be established. Having so decided, I do not think the Dáil can go back on that decision.

Mr. GOREY: I move to report progress.

Progress reported; Committee Stage to be resumed to-morrow.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

STAFF AT GREEN STREET COURTHOUSE.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I move for a return showing the number of the staff (other than clerical staff) employed at Green Street Courthouse, the duties they perform and the salaries (including all allowances) they receive.

From what the President said when a similar motion was moved about a fortnight ago, I should like to lay it down as my view, that so long as Ministers choose to be responsible only to the Dáil for financial expenditure, and so long as there is no Estimates Committee, and no Committee to review the expenditure of public departments, it will be not only the right but the duty of Deputies to move for returns of this nature when they think there may be a possibility of making economies. The motion is not put down in hostility to the Government. I realise that these returns cost a certain amount of money and take a certain amount of time to prepare. I think that if any Deputy has reason to believe that economies can be made in any department he has a right to ask for information on that point without being accused of hostile propaganda.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I beg to second. May I suggest that the return instead of being tabled should be circulated.

Motion put and agreed to.

PETITIONS TO THE DAIL.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Is it correct to say that Deputy Byrne and

[An Ceann Comhairle.]

Deputy Thrift have come to an agreement on item 6 on the Orders of the Day? If so, we could take that matter now.

Mr. ALFRED BYRNE: I move:

"That the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor of the City of Dublin be admitted to present petitions of the Lord Mayor and Corporation of the said city before Dáil Eireann."

I am asking the Dáil to confer upon the Dublin Corporation and the Lord Mayor of the city the same privilege that they had of presenting petitions at the Bar of the House in Westminster. Within the last ten or twelve years the Dublin Corporation, through its Lord Mayor, availed of this privilege on two occasions. One petition was presented by the then Lord Mayor, Alderman Farrell, in support of women suffrage. The other occasion was when a petition was presented on behalf of the citizens of Dublin in 1916, to protest against what was described at the time as the brutal murders in North King Street, and it was proved that British soldiers raided the house and shot occupants in their own bedrooms, and so that the crime could not be detected they buried the victims in the cellar. This matter leaked out. It was conveyed to myself, amongst others, by persons who heard the digging during the night. A visit was made to the house and it was discovered that bodies were buried there. The matter was then brought before the Dublin Corporation and, having heard the details, they decided upon availing of the right to present a petition at the Bar of the House of Commons. Sir James Gallagher was Lord Mayor at the time and he, with the officials of the Corporation, were received by the Speaker and the petition was accepted, with the result that a sworn enquiry was held into these shootings and, if I am not mistaken, a very reasonable verdict was brought in by those who held the enquiry, condemning the shootings and proving up to the hilt that certain actions had taken place which would not be allowed by any military authority in the world. I forget who held the enquiry, but I know that some time later, following it up, Sir John Simon visited this country to enquire into the death of, amongst others, the late Mr. Sheehy Skeffington.

In view of those two important occasions in which the Corporation succeeded in getting fairly satisfactory results in consequence of their right to present a petition, I ask the Dáil to accept this Motion. Arguments have been put up to me to-day that should it be carried there is nothing to prevent every other Deputy who had an interest in a county council or urban council from asking that the chairman of such a body should receive the same privilege. With reference to that, I might say that I think it is up to every Deputy, no matter what his pride in the area he represents may be, to remember that Dublin is the capital of the Irish Free State. I am satisfied to let this matter go before the Committee, but I would ask that Committee to consider the points raised by me and to remember that on the two occasions on which the Dublin Corporation presented these Petitions it was not so popular to attack that body as it is to-day. I quite agree that we have now a Parliament that can investigate all matters, but at that time it was admitted that the Dublin Corporation did good work when they presented the Petition which resulted in the enquiry into the terrible murders in North King Street. I move the Motion.

Mr. BAXTER: I second the Motion.

Professor THRIFT: I gather from what Deputy Byrne has said that he is prepared to accept the amendment which stands in my name and therefore I do not think I need do more than to say that it seems to me to be illogical to proceed to discuss part of this question. We have now appointed a Committee on Procedure to go into such questions, and therefore I simply content myself with moving the amendment, "To delete all words after the word 'That' and to substitute therefor the words: 'all questions connected with the presentation of Petitions before Dáil Eireann be referred to the Committee on Procedure and Privileges for report to the Dáil.'"

The PRESIDENT: In seconding that

I take the opportunity of stating that in connection with the first pilgrimage mentioned by Mr. Byrne I objected to the proceeding—the first occasion on which he states that the Dublin Corporation presented a Petition on behalf of Women's Suffrage. I think that the Party, of which I was a member at that time, also opposed it and I think what they said was that it was not Women's Suffrage at all but that it was certain interested women who got a particular chance of having certain advantages from the Parliament of Westminster, and we opposed this procession of the Lord Mayor's up the floor of the House. I understand he went up when the House was empty and that no notice was taken of it. The Committee on Procedure and Privileges is the proper body to regulate these matters. As far as Dublin City is concerned it has a fairly considerable representation in the Dáil—fifteen Deputies out of 150; one out of every ten—and I think what the City of Dublin may require in the future will be very well attended to by these Deputies.

If we are to allow the Dublin Corporation this privilege I am positively certain that the Postmaster-General would immediately stake a claim for Cork and that we would have every other local authority claiming the same right. To some extent that might possibly interfere with the independence of Deputies. We have recently seen an attempt by the Dublin Corporation—or certain members of it—to feature political propaganda. Certainly if that be the motion behind presenting Petitions here I will oppose it. It is not for the purpose of giving play to that kind of thing. We have no time for demonstrations of feminine excitement, and I hope we shall not have them.

Amendment put and declared passed.

Motion, as amended, put and agreed to.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS BILL, 1923.

SECOND STAGE.

Mr. JOHNSON: In asking the Dáil to give a Second Reading to this Bill I shall have to relate somewhat of the intentions and go into some detail with regard to its general purposes and its needs, but I want to say right at the outset that this Bill is not presented in the expectation that when it is passed it will make any great revolutionary change, or add any great extent to the well-being of the masses of the people. Further, I want to say that it is not put forward in deference to any preconception regarding nationalisation, or State ownership, or collectivism, or anything of that kind. It is put forward in its present form in the belief that necessity compels action of this kind if the most is to be made of the nation's transport conveniences. It has been asked why there should be any attempt to press forward such a Bill as this is at this moment; why should we not leave things as they are? The answer to that is, of course, that the public, traders, agriculturists, travellers, are pressing for some action to be taken regarding the future of the railways so that they, particularly the traders, will know where they stand. They are pressing for changes, because they believe that changes would result in a reduction in rates. The railway companies, too, are uncertain of their future, and are holding up necessary development because of that uncertainty. The need for urgency was present in the minds of the Government eighteen months ago. At that time they appointed a Commission and instructed it to sit day by day, if possible, with a view to making recommendations with regard to the future of the railways. Recommendations were made, but, as announced in the Dáil, the Government were not prepared to accept them. They recognised still in January of this year the urgency of the problem, and they said that they would give the railway companies a certain period within which to bring forward their own proposals regarding consolidation, or amalgamation, or grouping, and if within that time no agreed proposals could be brought forward by the railway companies then the Government would be prepared to bring forward their own proposals. That time expired six months ago, and the necessity for action, from the public point of view, seems to be as urgent to-day as it was then, so that I think no excuse is required to be made for presenting this Bill as an attempt to meet the case put forward by many sections of the community, regarding the railway problem particularly.

I want to lay stress at this stage upon this point, that this is not a matter of railway policy alone. It is because the railway position is so closely associated with the general economic condition of the country, and its future economic policy is so much bound up with the railway policy, that I ask the Dáil to look on this whole problem, not from the point of view of railway policy, but from the point of view of national economic policy. I think the Dáil will realise the necessity, if they are looking forward at all, for having at least a faint idea of what they propose this country should be; have some idea at least of the lines of policy on which it is intended that we should develop. We have a country to make the most of, and the question really is, what are we going to do with it? The railway policy might well be directed towards satisfying the requirements, the desires, of the railway shareholders, and the country and the Dáil may say that we have faith in the natural genius of the people, and as a State, as a Legislature, all we have to do is to stand aside and keep order and let who will, do what he wishes, in the belief and faith that by allowing everybody to do as he wishes within the law that good must certainly come. That is quite an understandable policy, and it is a view held by many Deputies, and those who hold that view will object no doubt strenuously to any proposals such as are in this Bill, but the appeal I am making is to the Dáil to set before itself at least a conception of the future, and to recognise that the transport problem is clearly bound up with any conception of the future of the country. Really we have to decide whether transport is to be subordinated to general public policy, or are we to allow those in charge and control of transport so to order and govern their affairs as detrimentally to affect national policy, provided it satisfies the desires of those in control of transport?

I think it will be admitted that railway policy may conflict with national economic betterment, and the basic question I am putting to the Dáil is whether national economic betterment should be the primary purpose of transport policy, or whether transport policy should be so directed as to satisfy the desires of those interested in the transport business, irrespective of its effect on the national well-being. To come down to a concrete illustration, it would be good railway policy, for instance, to encourage the transport of bacon through Dublin to Leicester—it is a long journey—and to bring back boots from Leicester to Limerick. It would be good national policy to limit transport, and if other things were satisfactory to direct the bacon from Limerick to Carlow, and transport boots from Carlow to Limerick. National policy would be served by the second, while railway policy would be better served by the first. I ask the Dáil to agree with this proposition, that if railway policy conflicts with national interest, railway policy must be subordinate; but speaking purely in general terms one would require to consider how best to ensure that railway policy will be subordinated to national policy. That is really the problem to be answered in the discussion on this Bill. It may be said that there are a variety of proposals before the country for consideration. It is urged by some, perhaps not very many, that the present arrangements should be continued, that there is no need to make any change, the companies will look after themselves, and incidentally the country will benefit. I think it will be generally agreed, here, at any rate, that that proposition is out of the question.

If we take merely the question of baronially guaranteed lines we are faced with a problem which must be solved, and which can only be solved, by some change. Representatives of those counties which have baronially guaranteed railways will not be satisfied to allow matters to remain as they are. The second proposition is that we should allow the absorption of selected lines by English companies. No legal change is required for that. Certainly no legal change is necessary. It can be done by Stock Exchange operations. I do not know how many members of the Dáil there are who will agree that that will be a desirable development. Then we have the views of the Farmers' Unions as indicated by their witness before the Railway Commission—that there should be a continuation of the present ownership, that there should be no restriction upon any body of persons coming together who would like to build a new railway in competition with existing railways, and that the present railways should not be allowed to continue their monopoly but that there should be an authority set up to control rates. That, I think, is a short and fair summary of the attitude of the Farmers' Union through their spokesman, Mr. Young, of Stradbally. I do not know whether that view of railway economics is likely to be acceptable. The proposition that any group of men should be free to build a new railway anywhere and that the Legislature should not exercise any control in such a matter, whether it is largely supported in this Dáil or not, certainly would not commend itself to men of average experience in economic matters. Then we have a proposal that we should leave the railway companies to enter into voluntary amalgamation, allowing them, if they desire, to leave aside, out of the amalgamation, the non-paying companies. I do not think that that either would commend itself to the Dáil. Non-paying companies have been set up by Acts of Parliament, and, rightly or wrongly, they are part of the transport system of the country and must be considered, and I do not think that the Oireachtas would agree to voluntary amalgamations which allowed the non-paying companies to be left entirely outside. Then there is the proposition which, it is suggested, was once, at least, the policy of the Government, that there should be compulsory amalgamation. Such schemes would have to be submitted to the Oireachtas for consideration and approval, and then there is the scheme of State ownership and ultimate control. The proposal which I have put before the Dáil is, of course, the last, and it is not by any means a new proposal. It is neither revolutionary, radical, bolshevik, or anything of an abnormal nature.

It has been recommended by the most staid conservative Commissions, and no one will allege at this stage that State ownership of railways has anything of a radical or revolutionary character about it. There have been Commissions on this question of Irish railways running from 1836, 1865, 1881, 1906 and 1922, and, without exception, these Commissions have recommended State intervention of one kind or another. They have recommended changes in the administration of the railways, recommending Government action of one kind or another, and in reporting the history of railways in this country one reads the refrain, "No Government action was taken." Commission after Commission, and Inquiry after Inquiry, and still the continuous refrain, "No Government action was taken." I have a sort of notion that if Government action is not taken the railways will get into such a position in this country as detrimentally to affect the course of development. I have said that this proposal is not revolutionary, nor is it new. Even Adam Smith wrote so many years ago, "The tolls for the maintenance of a high road cannot with any safety be made the property of private persons." John Stuart Mill said: "The charge made for services which cannot be dispensed with is, in substance, quite as much compulsory taxation as if imposed by law. This applies to the case of a road, canal or railway. These are always in a great degree practical monopolies, and the Government which sets such monopolies in the hands of private companies is in much the same position as if it allowed individuals or associations to levy any taxes they chose for their benefit on all malt produced in the country, or on all cotton imported into it." The opposition to the proposal in this Bill is, in the main, an opposition to the principle of State ownership. It is, I would point out, not an opposition to the principle of State subsidies. Most of the opponents of the proposal, whether within railway circles or within mercantile circles, do not oppose, but rather suggest, the necessity for State subsidies in one form or another.

They vary in their suggestions regarding the amount of control which such a substitute would carry with it, but none is consistent in taking this line that the State should neither have anything to do with railways financially nor in management. I am very doubtful whether an efficient railway system can, in this country, be provided without some form of public assistance. While I believe that is true, it is not intended in this Bill to provide for such public assistance. We are suggesting that every effort should be made within State control to provide a railway service on commercial lines without any subsidy, leaving the users of the railways to pay all the charges that are incurred in the running of the railways. Whether that will succeed or not, either under State ownership or under private ownership, is a matter for the future. I will say this though, that the State has, as a matter of fact, in Ireland, come to the assistance of privately owned railways to the extent practically of seven million pounds. Most of it, no doubt, has been refunded, but the fact remains that State assistance, to the extent of £6,873,653, a sum equal to over fourteen per cent. of the total capital of the railways, has been provided by the State. These figures are taken from the Scotter Commission Report, which Commission concluded its labours, I think, in 1910. Of course we must bear in mind in speaking of the question of the ability of railways to maintain themselves without external aid, that there was pre-war for many, many years that kind of assistance, which arose from the underpayment of the railway servants. Every witness practically, on the railway side, admits that before the war railway servants were underpaid. True, they say, they were only in line with the rest of the community. Nevertheless, the conclusion is that shareholders obtain their dividends by virtue of the fact that railways servants were underpaid.

Now let us assume that the proposal for State ownership is not accepted, and that we are bound to the principle of unification. Without public ownership it is the only practical alternative to the proposals of this Bill. I have referred to the baronially guaranteed lines. The railway companies' view of that is expressed by the General Manager of the Midland Great Western, speaking on behalf of the companies as a whole, and not merely of his own company, that if the railway companies were to be expected to take over the baronially guaranteed lines then there must be a subsidy from the State. They also have the view that that subsidy shall not carry with it any representation on the board or any control over the management. Even the minority of the Scotter Commission advocated a State subsidy. Now, I am stressing this case, because I want you to have in mind, when you are thinking of the merits of this Bill or the principle involved, that the alternative is some form of railway organisation which involves a State subsidy. It is suggested that there might be some kind of control over the rates by means of a Rates Commission, some kind of control from outside. That is the view of the representatives of Chambers of Commerce, Farmers' Unions and the trading public generally, from all one can hear. It is urged on every hand that there must be a tribunal to determine what the rates on merchandise shall be, that a body may be set up to make representations. Rather in the language of the Scotter Commission minority they might make representations to the companies regarding the adjustment of rates. On that I would like to stress the evidence of a very high authority, Mr. Acworth, who is a member of the minority of the Scotter Commission reporting against nationalisation. He wrote in a book called "The Railways and the Traders" these words:—

"For every shilling cut by an expeditious tribunal off a rate, it is easy for the railway companies, if they are agreed to act in harmony with each other, to withdraw two shillings' worth of facilities; and the traders may make up their minds that this is what must inevitably happen if the railway companies are confronted with lower rates, simultaneously with the rapid rise of working expenses."

"Assume that your tribunal can fix a reasonable rate, what is the use of it unless it can schedule to its judgment a minute specification of the quality of service to be given in return for the rate? The railways can bring down troops of expert witnesses. How can the tribunal refuse to hear them when every student of railway economics knows that the reasonableness of each particular rate depends not merely on its own individual circumstances, but on a comparison with all the other rates and a consideration of the company's business? But for a farmer or shopkeeper, with the assistance possibly of the local attorney, to undertake to fight trained railway experts with a lifetime's experience and with every fact and figure at their finger's ends, is only to court defeat."

The Railway Rates Tribunal, which is merely an attempt to adjust rates on merchandise, is a broken reed, entirely unfitted to secure the needs which the trading community desire. The late Chairman of the Brighton Railway Company goes so far as to declare that even successful action is futile before a Rates Commission. He says:—

"The Companies could easily retaliate, under a sense of injury, by measures which no control could prevent unless it was prepared to take on itself the entire responsibility of the detailed management of the line."

There is the classic case of the Chatterly Colliery Company:—

"Thinking they were illegally overcharged by the North Staffordshire Railway Company, they took them before the Railway Commission, proved their case and secured an order confining the railway within the legal maximum. Thereupon the railway company flatly declined to carry the traffic of the Chatterly Company. They were again taken before the Commission and at once ordered to resume the traffic, subject to a penalty of £50 a day for refusing. They complied with the letter of the order, but 'under as awkward and inconvenient circumstances for the Chatterly Company as the railway company could possibly arrange.' And Sir Alfred Hickman declares that though, technically, the Chatterly Company won everything, they could not compel the railway company to afford them ordinary facilities such as were necessary to carry on their business, and they were obliged to compromise the matter upon worse terms than the Commissioners had allowed."

That is the experience, I think, of many traders, even in this country. I am quoting this case to show that the reliance upon the Railway Rates Commission to ensure that the traders' interests shall be safeguarded against the railway companies' attempts to make fish of one and flesh of another, in their efforts to make traffic pay, is quite unsatisfactory so far as influence on privately-owned companies is concerned. I ask the Dáil to conclude from that that the interests of the mercantile community, the manufacturing community that may come, the agricultural community, and the general travelling public cannot be secured by outside control. The logical end of that argument is that a public service, such as the railway service, should be publicly owned and controlled in the interests of the public.

I hope that every Deputy has carefully examined the provisions of the Bill and satisfied himself or herself as to where the defects, if any, lie. Some, no doubt, will say the defects lie in the principle of public ownership. Others will say that they agree with the principle of public ownership, but that the methods of control and management are not satisfactory.

Others will say that, granted the desirability of public ownership, the method of acquiring is not satisfactory to their views, or that the price to be paid is too generous or the method of fixing the price unfair. I hope that Deputies will give vent to their opinions on these various points before the Bill leaves the Dáil. In the main, I would like to say that we have taken the lead of the Minister for Agriculture in regard to the financial proposals of the Bill. We desire to be at least as fair as the Government. We acknowledge that they set us a very good example as to the method of acquisition and the terms of purchase and rate of interest.

Mr. GOREY: What about the arrears?

Mr. JOHNSON: Deputy Gorey reminds me that there are arrears even in connection with railway service. I may give the Deputy an assurance—if that is what he is seeking—that the arrears of payment from the County Councils to the railway companies will be completely wiped out by this Bill. Our desire in regard to finance and management of the railways under this scheme is that the railways should be run in such a way as to make the receipts cover all expenses, and to avoid the necessity for any State subvention. I hope that will be possible. I hope, no matter what be the future of the railways, it may be found unnecessary to provide a State subvention. But, as I said earlier, I am personally doubtful of the possibility of making the fullest use of railway transport without some form of State subvention. But that may be a matter of future State policy. I hope that if ever it is decided that State assistance is required, that it will be for a definite, specific purpose, and not to make up deficits. I would hope, for instance, that railway policy might be directed towards encouraging transport between points within the country, as distinct from the encouragement of transport from within the country to outside the country. That encouragement may involve eventually some form of State subsidy in the earlier stages. But that may be entailed, whether railways are nationalised or whether they remain under private ownership. I have said that we have taken the Land Act as a precedent for our financial proposals and, differing from the report of the last Railway Commission, we are not proposing to deal with individual stockholders, but rather with the companies as corporate bodies. We propose that there shall be a Railways Tribunal to fix the price, and that Railways Tribunal may be paralleled by the Land Commission. The Tribunal will value the undertaking, taking all the circumstances into account, and that Tribunal will also decide how the purchase price of any company might be distributed amongst the various grades of stockholders. The intention is that the undertaking shall be valued on a net revenue-earning basis. In doing that, it will be necessary to have regard to the amount of such earnings in the past, and to take into account the possibilities of maintaining these net earnings, having regard to all the circumstances, including the demands of the trading community for lower charges and the demand of the employees of the railway companies for a reasonable livelihood. We also lay down that the maximum shall be based upon the average of the five best years in railway history—the five years preceding December 31st, 1913. I have a suspicion—almost a conviction—that no matter what Tribunal would be set up, it would be found in practice that the maximum of fifteen years' purchase of the average of those five years would be the normal, one might almost say the minimum. We propose that railway stock should be issued in exchange for the stock of the company, such railway stock to be guaranteed by the Central Fund, in addition to the earnings of the companies. The stock would carry in one case 4½ per cent. for 67 years, and 4½ per cent. for the first five years. Terminable annuity certificates will be issued, carrying, as I say, 4½ per cent. for 67 years. At the end of that time the debt will be paid. At the option of the stockholders, redeemable stock certificates, carrying 4½ per cent. for 72 years, with a quarter per cent. sinking fund for 67 years, would be issued. The financial effect of these two methods would be identical, so far as s o'clock. the State is concerned, and, as I have said already, it is proposed that the debt due to the companies for the arrears of baronial guarantees would be wiped out.

In regard to these financial proposals I would just like to draw attention to two or three figures. The total capital of the railways is round about £47,000,000 or so, according to the last figures I have been able to see, and for the five years preceding 1914 it may be said that the total yield of the dividend paying stock of the Irish railways was round about £1,700,000. I have made an estimate, and I mention this to reassure certain timid Deputies who own railway stock or who have aunts or mothers-in-law who own railway stock and are afraid of the widows and the orphans, that assuming the revenue to be on the basis of, say, the year 1920, and assuming the expenditure to be on the basis of the most recent returns we have been able to find, there is ample margin not only for paying out of railway revenue all the requirements of this stock, but enough to leave at least a little for reductions in rates. The reassurance I want to convey is, that from the calculations I have been able to make, the plan we have embodied in the Bill would allow debenture holders to receive, on State guarantee, 85 per cent. of the 1913 income from debentures, and that, bear in mind, was the best year in railway history. Preference stock holders would receive, or could receive if so allocated, 75 per cent. of their 1913 income, and ordinary shareholders about 60 per cent. of the 1913 income, bearing in mind that that would be a State guaranteed income for 72 years. Now that is even better than was guaranteed to the landlords by the Bill introduced by the Minister for Agriculture and passed through the Dáil and into law, and which was generally acclaimed by the country as most satisfactory. We cannot, then, be charged with being niggardly or unfair to railway stock holders when we have done as well for them in this Bill as the Government is prepared to do for the landlords.

This Bill does more than deal with the transfer of railways from the present companies to the State. It proposes a scheme of management which, I submit, meets the requirements of the mercantile community as expressed through their witnesses before the recent Commission, and meets the requirements of the railway companies through their spokesmen in so far as they demanded something like a single control, without interference from busybodies or political activities of one kind and another. Our proposal is that the railway system should be fitted into a general transport system, a system which has to do with all the means of communication in the country. We have suggested, but have left the details to be worked out, that a road transport system, a canal transport system, and a postal communication system should be brought under one effective ultimate Government control. We do not think, for instance, that the Post Office is the kind of service which requires a political head by itself. We conceive that the transport and communications of the country should be fitted into the general social economy, and should be finally controlled by a single Minister, but that the actual working of those various departments should be under expert guidance. That is the conception that is attempted to be applied in the Bill.

We are looking ahead, and we are asking the Dáil to think not merely for the next two or three years or five or ten years, but to lay plans for the building up of the nation, and one of the most important factors in that building up will be the means of communication and transport, and we are trying to persuade the Dáil to agree to a system which would enable all those various means to be co-ordinated under one Minister. There is just one other point of minor importance that I wish to refer to. That is the effect of this scheme upon the railways which are outside the present jurisdiction of the Saorstát. We have conceived of the railway system of Ireland as a single system, and we look forward to the time, not far ahead, when that system will be, in effect and in fact, a single system under a single head nationally controlled. We recognise the facts of the present day and we suggest that the appointed day, again following the Minister of Agriculture, for the transfer of the railways which run into the six Northern Counties should be a day to be appointed when convenient.

It is quite within the purview of the Bill that if the necessity should arise such portions of the railways as are in the area of jurisdiction of the Saorstát should be transferred. We prefer that a cutting of that kind should not take place unless it is found to be absolutely necessary, and hence we have suggested the delay of the transfer of the Northern Railways to a more

[Mr. Johnson.] convenient season. There are, of course, innumerable points that will be raised in discussion, or shall I say, that could be raised in discussion, and no doubt most of them will be; but I think that to the broad principle underlying the Bill—State purchase, control of the railways in the interest of the nation as contrasted with control of the railways in the interests of railway shareholders—the Dáil should assent and further, perhaps I would have no difficulty in persuading the Dáil that if the principle of State ownership is accepted then the principle of purchase will be accepted also. I, therefore, ask the Dáil to agree to give this Bill a Second Reading.

Mr. DAVIN: I beg to second the motion.

Mr. HEWAT: We have listened to Deputy Johnson in proposing the Second Reading of this Bill, as we always listen to him, with pleasure. As a novice in political matters, it strikes me as strange that a Bill of this public importance should be introduced as a Private Bill. I think it has been recognised generally that the particular activities of an opposition is to take advantage of the slips that come from the Government benches, and when we find Deputy Johnson and the Labour Party bringing forward a Bill of this importance it seems to me very much like as if they did not anticipate, in the near future, at all events, occupying the Government benches, and that the opinion they must have come to is that in risking their reputation in the production of this Bill they are not doing their Party very much harm. I think another consideration in this matter is this:—Whereas the Bill is brought forward by the leader of the opposition the attitude of the Government seems to be open to question. They have given us very little guidance in the matter, and it seems to me that the Government are in the happy position of looking on while the opposition exploits the proposition to find out how far it will go down with the country. That, I think, is the rather happy position the Government find themselves in. In other words they are letting Deputy Johnson and his party pull a few chestnuts out of the fire for them, and I congratulate him upon that.

In connection with the railways we have had some experience of Government control. During the war it was considered necessary that the Government should take control of the railways, and speaking as a commercial man, I do not think the result of that experience has convinced very many traders that they are going to benefit by the change. I am not prepared at present to take up the cudgels on behalf of railway administration. It would not be politic to do so because to-morrow or the next day I may have various complaints against the railway companies. But I do say that from a trading point of view, with all their defects—and they are many no doubt—I prefer the devil I know to the devil I do not know. Any experience we have to rely upon in connection with the Government management of trading concerns is not, I think, a happy augury for the proposals of this Bill.

What are railways? It seems to me that not only in this country but in other countries railways have been made a stalking horse for all sorts of unsound propositions. What is the difference between the railways and other ordinary trading concerns? Railways have been built on a capital supplied by the shareholders to do a certain work. In an ordinary business way these people put their money into the railways with the hope and prospect of getting a return for their money. The Government are necessarily interested in the railways because of the powers which they hand over to the railway companies and consequently it is necessary for them to keep a certain amount of control as they would have a right to keep control of any form of industrial undertaking which required administration. But why glorify the railways? Why propose to nationalise the railways? Have they a monopoly? I think not. They are a means of transport; so are steamships; so are your roads; so are motors on the roads; so is the air, or, at least, it will be in the course of time. Trading concerns and trade are, no doubt, to some extent, dependent on railway traffic, but, from my point of view, I would rather see the trading community taking a stand themselves in the matter of organisation so as to be at any moment independent of the railways, if the railways were unreasonable. There is nothing to prevent it. If the rate from here to Cork is unreasonable what is to prevent the trading community having a boat to run down by sea or putting on motors to run down by road? Personally I would rather see the trading community in the position of being able to tell the railway companies as far as the rates are concerned, that the rates were unreasonable and that they would take the matter into their own hands. What is Government control going to do for us? Is it going to reduce the rates? I think not. Is it going to better the service? I think not. What we want is not unification. We want the railways kept in a position to give us alternate routes for our traffic and—I am not saying they will do it—I hope they will take care of their own affairs.

The shareholders are the proprietors in this case. They ventured their money in the undertaking. Where railways have been a failure I think you will find that mostly they have been a failure because they have been promoted and subsidised by the Government. In connection with these baronial railways which we hear about as being non-paying, if the country and the Government wish to put up an uneconomic proposition for the good of the country, I do not think they have a right afterwards to saddle the failure on anyone else. In the same way, if a body of shareholders come forward and put money into a concern, and it is a failure, I do not think you will find many people coming in to sympathise with them to the extent of recouping them for money they put into the business. That is the main thing I want to emphasise, and that is why I object to the glorification of the railways any more than any other business or trading concern in the country. In taking up this attitude Labour points to the fact that they were particularly interested in railways. Through the operation of political forces which they were able to manipulate, they have secured a preferential and a peculiar position for railway servants that would never have applied to this country under ordinary conditions, and that would never apply to trading concerns as a whole on purely economic grounds. That is the difficulty our railways are in at the present time—the inflation of the charges which were forced upon the railways against the recommendation of the railway managements and in spite of any representation that could be made so far as they were concerned. That is the difficulty as far as the railway companies are concerned to-day, and it is not, I think, due to anything else but the operations of a law that cannot and will not apply ultimately to this country.

Following the principles of this Bill, I think I may describe it as nationalisation of the railways mainly. If I may speak on behalf of the traders, and, I think, of the public generally, either the Labour Party or the Government will have to put forward very much more cogent reasons for the change they propose to make than they have done in this Bill, in order to get the support of the people who will have to pay the piper if the Bill came into operation.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: If Deputy Hewat will move the adjournment of the debate now he will have the right to speak again.

Mr. HEWAT: I move the adjournment of the debate.

Debate adjourned until Friday, at 2 p.m.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I move the adjournment of the Dáil until 3 o'clock to-morrow.

The Dáil adjourned at 8.25 p.m.

ORAL ANSWERS.

AUXILIARIES' DEBTS IN KILLALOE.

PADRAIG O HOGAIN (An Clár) asked the President if he is aware that on the withdrawal of the Auxiliaries from Killaloe consequent on the British evacuation, several merchants in that town were forced to accept on an average 50 per cent. of the debts owed to them by that Force, that they were told in these cases they should take the amount tendered or receive nothing at all, and whether there are now any means available for the recovery of these debts.

The PRESIDENT: I have no specific information on the matter referred to by the Deputy. I assume, however, that he refers to private debts contracted by members of the British Auxiliary Forces, in which case it is open to any merchant to take such legal proceedings as he may be advised for the recovery of amounts due to him. The Government cannot advise in private law-suits.

Mr. HOGAN: I did not refer to private debts, but to public debts contracted by the Auxiliary Forces.

The PRESIDENT: I take it that the Deputy means debts contracted in public by Auxiliary Forces. If they were contracted on behalf of the British Army or the British War Office, or the Chief Secretary at the time, I have no information on that subject; and, unless I had more information than is given in the question, I would not be in a position to answer satisfactorily what the Deputy asks.

Mr. HOGAN: I will supply the particulars.

DEPUTY RANGER OF THE CURRAGH.

Mr. JOHN CONLAN asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether the office of Deputy Ranger of the Curragh is a sinecure post; whether the holder of same is paid an annual salary of £300, together with a residence provided out of public funds, which residence he has been in the habit of letting to military officers; and, if so, whether, taking into account the fact that the administration of the Curragh involves a loss to the taxpayers of the country, he will direct the abolition of said office; also, if the Turf Club, a reputedly wealthy corporation, should not, in view of the advantages afforded it, contribute an adequate yearly sum towards the expense of caretaking, etc.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. E. Blythe): The reply to the first part of the question is in the negative. The Deputy Ranger of the Curragh performs important duties in connection with the management and preservation of State rights over the Curragh lands. He is paid an annual salary of £200 per annum, without bonus. Since 1910 he has had no official residence. Consequently no question of his letting such a residence now arises. There is at the present moment no intention to abolish the office of Deputy Ranger.

By his references to the advantages enjoyed by the Turf Club, I presume the Deputy intends those rights enjoyed by the Club under leases granted in accordance with the provisions of the Curragh Act of 1868. In accordance with the terms of those leases the Turf Club pays an annual rental, for details of which I must refer the Deputy to my previous answer on the subject in reply to a question addressed to me on the 21st ultimo. The rentals are fixed by the terms of the leases and the amounts can only be altered in accordance with them.

Mr. WOULFE: Arising out of the Minister's answer, may I ask if the Minister is aware that a most anomalous state of affairs exists with regard to the management of the Curragh, in that the Ranger, who is senior officer, has no control whatever over the Deputy Ranger, either as to appointment or the appointment of bailiffs, and that he is responsible for everything that the Deputy Ranger does. That, of course, is a most anomalous state of affairs, and I would like to know if the Minister will look into the matter and see that it is remedied.

Mr. BLYTHE: I am not aware that the state of affairs is as the Deputy suggests, but I will look into the matter and see if it is.

REPLACEMENT OF MILITARY BY GÁRDA SÍOCHÁNA.

Mr. DAVID HALL asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether, in view of the fact that the military have been transferred from Oldeastle, Co. Meath, to Mullingar, he will have them replaced by the Gárda Síochána.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. K. O'Higgins): It is intended to station a unit of the Gárda Síochána at Oldeastle as soon as suitable accommodation can be obtained.

UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFIT IN CO. CORK.

TADHG O MURCHADHA asked the Minister for Industry and Commerce whether he is aware that in Co. Cork much hardship has been caused by the delay in certifying the accounts of claimants to unemployment benefit, and if he will state what are the arrangements at Headquarters of the Ministry for the certification of such accounts.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. P. Hogan), replying for Minister for Industry and Commerce: It is a fact that in some of the Employment Exchanges a few weeks' delay in dealing with claims occurred at the beginning of the new Benefit Year on October 17th last, when, in accordance with the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1923, the accounts of every individual insured contributor had to be balanced so as to ascertain the number of contributions to his credit upon which his rights to benefit depend. Some delay, therefore, was inevitable, but the work was completed in three weeks.

Mr. MURPHY: Arising out of that answer, is the Minister aware that many claims lodged on the 17th October are not yet to hand, and will he take steps to expedite the settlement or certification of them?

Mr. HOGAN: I will bring to the Minister's notice what the Deputy says.

BARYTES MINES (CLONAKILTY).

TADHG O MURCHADHA asked the Minister for Industry and Commerce whether he is aware that the Duneen Bay Barytes Mines (Clonakilty, Co. Cork), owned by the Cookson Barytes Co., Ltd., closed down early in 1922, that thereby over one hundred hands were unemployed, that the Company has no intention of re-opening, and that it now proposes to dispose of its plant; whether all the late employees of the Company are now practically destitute through being deprived of Unemployment Benefit under Section 8 (4) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, and, if so, what steps, if any the Ministry intend to take to ensure that the plant is not sold to persons other than those who are willing to use the plant for working the mine as heretofore.

Mr. HOGAN (for Minister for Industry and Commerce): The Minister has no power to prevent the disposal of its plant by this Company in whatever way it may be advised, but is communicating with the Company on the matter.

HIRAGE OF A MOTOR CAR.

Mr. DAVID HALL asked the Minister for Defence whether a claim for the hirage of a motor car has been received from Mr. John Malone, Railway Street, Navan; whether Sergeant Nicholas Harman, National Army, requisitioned the said car in July, 1922, and that it was not returned to Mr.

[Mr. David Hall.]
Malone until December, 1922; whether Mr. Malone supplied and paid a driver for said car in July and August, 1922, and again on the 28th of January, 1923; whether the claim of Mr. Malone was certified by Captain McCann, Trim Barracks, and Sergeant Harman, Navan Barracks, and whether in view of the fact that this account of £95 is a long outstanding one, payment will be expedited.

MINISTER for FISHERIES (Mr. F. Lynch), for Minister for Defence: Mr. Malone's claim has been received and is being dealt with. Its consideration is being expedited.

KERRY TRADER'S CLAIM.

Captain WILLIAM A. REDMOND asked the Minister for Defence if the business premises belonging to Denis McMahon, 15 Ballymullin Place, Tralee, Co. Kerry, was entered by the Military on the 27th May, 1923; whether a claim has been lodged in regard to it, and, if so, when this claim will be paid.

Mr. LYNCH (for Minister for Defence): Nothing is known at Headquarters regarding the matter of Mr. McMahon's premises, and no claim in connection with it can be traced.

ROAD ADMINISTRATION IN CAVAN.

PADRAIG BAXTER asked the Minister for Local Government if he will consider the advisability of holding a sworn inquiry into the road administration in Cavan, so that the responsibility for the present dangerous condition of the roads in that county may be fixed on the proper people; whether, pending the holding of such inquiry, the Local Government Ministry will take some action to see that the more dangerous of the main roads are so improved as to make them safe for traffic.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. Burke): The duty of maintaining the roads in Cavan County devolves on the County Council, subject to the proposals put forward by the Rural District Councils. If any particular road is in a dangerous condition, representations should be made to the County Council. I have called for a special report on the condition of the roads in the county and will consider what action is necessary and whether a sworn inquiry should be held.

Mr. BAXTER: Am I to understand from the Minister's answer that he is sending somebody down there from his Department, or is he asking for a report from somebody in the County Cavan?

Mr. BURKE: If we find it necessary we will send down an Inspector.

Mr. JOHNSON: Will the Minister arrange that the Inspector is sent down in a motor car so as to test the roads?

PAYMENT OF CO. MAYO ELECTION OFFICIALS.

Captain REDMOND asked the Minister for Local Government whether the Presiding Officers, Poll Clerks, and those engaged in the counting of votes at the recent Parliamentary Election of the County Mayo, have been yet paid; and, if not, whether he will have them paid without further delay.

Mr. BLYTHE: I have been asked by the Minister for Local Government to answer this question.

No vouchers have yet been received from the Returning Officer showing that the services indicated have not yet been paid for, but advances have been made by the Ministry of Finance to him which should be ample to enable him to pay to the officials mentioned their fees, which are fixed by a prescribed scale. I am having inquiries made in the matter.

FIDDOWN BRIDGE.

Captain WILLIAM A. REDMOND asked the Minister for Local Government whether the loss of use of the bridge at Fiddown is very severely felt, as there is a great deal of traffic between the counties of Kilkenny and Waterford, and there is no bridge available over the River Suir between Waterford and Carrick-on-Suir for a distance of over twenty miles, and when it is proposed to start re-construction of this bridge, which is badly wanted and would give a good deal of employment.

Mr. BURKE: The reconstruction of railway bridges is not a matter which comes within the functions of the Ministry of Local Government. Some representations on the matter have been received, and the Ministry of Industry and Commerce have been asked to communicate with the Railway Company and to point out to them the urgency of carrying out the work. The Deputy will be informed of the result.

Mr. GOREY: Arising out of that answer, may I ask the Minister whether he is aware that this is not a railway bridge at all? It is a bridge across a river.

Mr. BURKE: It is a bridge that was put up by the Railway Company in consideration of getting the concession of changing the railway from one side of the river to the other.

Captain REDMOND: It is not a question of who erected the bridge. Is the Minister aware that this is a passenger bridge, and may I suggest, with all due respect, that it is? I would like to know what steps are being taken for the restoration of traffic across it.

Mr. BURKE: This bridge was put up by the Railway Company and maintained by the Railway Company, and I assume that they are responsible for remedying any damage.

Captain REDMOND: Is it not proposed that the Local Government Department should take any steps in regard to this matter?

Mr. BURKE: We have taken the steps I have mentioned.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: But if the Railway Company does not replace the damage done, surely the Local Government Department has powers to see that the bridge is put into immediate repair by the people responsible for it—by whom will these powers be exercised?

Mr. BURKE: When they refuse, that question will arise.

Captain REDMOND: Will the Local Government Department make representations to the Railway Company to see if they will replace the bridge?

Mr. BURKE: We have done so, through the Ministry of Industry and Commerce. I answered that at first.

WRITTEN ANSWERS.

CO. CORK ARMY ACCOUNT.

TADHG O MURCHADHA asked the Minister for Defence if he can state when Mr. Thomas J. Beamish, of Drumleague, Co. Cork, might expect payment of an Army account amounting to £316 odd.

MINISTER for DEFENCE (General Mulcahy): Accounts amounting to £308 16s. 5d. have been received from Mr. Beamish, and payments in respect of them have been made as follows:—

£145	6	11	on the 15th June, 1923.
78	2	0	„ 12th Oct., 1923.
44	7	8	„ 5th Dec., 1923.

The remainder (£40 19s. 10d.) has been disallowed.

RENT OF CLARE BARRACKS.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN asked the Minister for Finance if payment of rent accruing for over a year in respect of the Gárda Síochána Barracks, Killee, Co. Clare, will be expedited to the owner of the premises.

Mr. BLYTHE: The question of the rent payable for the accommodation provided in this case is at present being investigated, and it is expected that a decision will shortly be reached and payment of the rent due, at the rate as settled, will be made.

CLARE COMPENSATION AWARD.

PADRAIG O HOGAIN asked the Minister for Finance whether any compensation award has yet been made in respect of the late Patrick Morrissey, Lysaght's Lane, Ennis, who was killed by Black and Tans on June 24th, 1921, at Ennis; and whether, in view of the circumstances of the parents of the deceased, the matter will now receive immediate attention.

Mr. BLYTHE: This claim is already receiving attention, and there will be no avoidable delay in reaching a decision.

QUESTION ON THE ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CORISH: I beg to give notice that I intend to raise on the motion for the adjournment the effects of the Unemployment Insurance on unemployed people in the Free State.

CANAL COMMISSION'S REPORT.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I desire to draw attention to a question that I raised yesterday with regard to the report of the Canal Commission, which we were informed was available in the Reading Room for Deputies. The Report is not there now; presumably someone has taken it, seeing that it was put there. In any case, I would ask that another copy would be put in the Reading Room so that Deputies might have access to it.

FOOT AND MOUTH DISEASE.

Mr. GOREY: I desire to give notice that I intend to raise on the motion for the adjournment a question as to the precautions taken to prevent foot and mouth disease entering the country and as to the enforcement of these precautions, and also as to the treatment and detention of our live stock at the ports.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It has been the practice to allow only one matter to be raised on the adjournment, and Deputy Corish has already given notice. Deputy Gorey must postpone his question until to-morrow.

Mr. WILSON: The question is one of urgent public importance.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputy Gorey stated that he intended to raise a question on the motion for the adjournment, but not as a matter of urgent public importance. We must take the matter as stated by the Deputy who raised it.

Mr. GOREY: It was as a matter of public importance that I raised it.

Mr. WILSON: I desire to raise this as a matter of urgent public importance, and I ask twelve Deputies to rise and support me in my demand.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: If I had been given any notice that a matter of urgent public importance was to be raised, I would have been able to decide whether it was urgent and of public importance. Deputy Gorey cannot raise this matter on the motion for the adjournment to-day, and it would not appear to be a matter of urgent public importance in so far as it was not raised as such.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Progress was reported in Committee yesterday on the Ministers and Secretaries Bill. It, therefore, arises to-day before we take up the business on the Order Paper, I presume?

The PRESIDENT: I would be prepared to give away to Number 3 on the Order Paper, the Local Authorities Indemnity Bill, as I understand from the Minister in charge of that measure that it is urgent.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Very well, we will take the Order Paper as it is printed.

INTERPRETATION BILL—NOMINATION OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

Mr. HUGHES: The Sessional Committee of Selection to nominate Deputies to serve on a special Committee to consider the Interpretation Bill, 1923, met to-day and made the following selection of Deputies to act on the Special Committee to consider this Bill—Deputies Magennis, McGilligan, Dugan, Kennedy, Woulfe, Egan, Thrift, Figgis, Johnson, P. Hogan (Clare), Conlan, and Heffernan, with An Leas-Cheann Comhairle as Chairman. The Committee suggest that the quorum of the Special Committee should be fixed at seven, and that the date for reporting back should be not later than Wednesday, 19th instant. The first meeting of the Special Committee to be fixed for Wednesday, the 12th instant, at 11 a.m.

I move the adoption of the Report.

Mr. C. M. BYRNE: I second the motion.

Report adopted.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: If the Committee meets on Wednesday, the 12th instant, at 11 a.m., amendments will have to be handed in before noon on Saturday.

DAIL LOAN AND FUNDS BILL, 1923—SECOND STAGE.

Mr. GOREY: Before this Bill is taken up, I desire to protest against the method by which it is brought before the Dáil.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: What is the Deputy's complaint?

Mr. GOREY: My complaint is that sufficient notice was not given of this Bill. I understand that copies of it were not sent out until last night, and that some Deputies have not yet received a copy of the Bill. Only a short time ago I was handed a copy of it, and I desire to protest against such unbusinesslike methods and procedure.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. Blythe): I was not aware that the Bill had not been circulated. I have no desire to rush the Bill, and Deputy Gorey need not get heated about the matter. I am quite ready to have consideration of the Bill postponed.

Mr. GOREY: I do not object to the Bill, but I object to the procedure adopted in having copies of it circulated.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Bill was read a first time, and the Second Stage was ordered for to-day. The Bill was sent out from the office, when it was received, at the very earliest possible moment. The difficulty is, reading a Bill a first time without having the Bill itself in complete form ready for circulation. I take it that the Second Stage of the Bill is now postponed?

Mr. GOREY: I do not ask for its postponement. What I object to is the procedure adopted.

Mr. BLYTHE: I think it is better to have consideration of the Bill postponed for a week, as some Deputies do not appear to have received copies of it.

Bill ordered for Second Reading on Thursday, 13th December.

DAIL IN COMMITTEE.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES (INDEMNITY) BILL, 1923—THIRD STAGE.

Sections 1, 2, 3, and 4 agreed to.

TITLE.

Ordered that the title of the Bill be:—"An Act to establish the validity of certain acts done and omissions made by Local Authorities during the period between the 31st day of March, 1920, and the 6th day of December, 1922."

Bill ordered to be reported without amendments.

DAIL RESUMES.

Bill reported.

Mr. BURKE: I should like to get the remaining stages of the Bill now, as it would be well to get it through before the Christmas holidays if possible, as many important matters may arise on it.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Is there any objection to taking the remaining stages to-day?

DEPUTIES: "Agreed."

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: May I suggest it would be desirable that in adopting this course, if not to-day, at any rate in the future, that the formality of moving the suspension of Standing Orders be complied with. The question may arise some day or another,

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I am taking the attitude that if objection comes from any single Deputy the remaining stages cannot be taken. Unanimous consent is required.

There being no objection, the Standing Orders are suspended to enable the Minister to move the motion for the Fourth Stage.

Mr. BURKE: I move that the Bill be now taken for final consideration.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. O'Higgins): I beg to second.

Mr. CORISH: May I ask, at this stage, if the Minister has yet considered the question raised by me: that is the question of the Local Authorities being responsible for the Superannuation of Rate Collectors who refused to do what they were told to do by the Local Authorities in the year 1920. The President is here and perhaps he could enlighten the Dáil on that matter. On the last occasion that I spoke on this matter I told the Dáil that this cost the County Council of Wexford 3d. in the £. I found I made a great mistake, because it cost them 9d. in the £, and as this is a national matter—I do not want to keep these people out of anything they are entitled to in law—and as the Council acted on the express directions given by the Government of the time, which was recognised by the Wexford County Council, the present Government, I think, ought to be responsible for the superannuation of these men.

Mr. BURKE: Before I could give a final decision on this matter, I should have all the evidence before me. On the fact stated by the Deputy, I am very sympathetically inclined towards this attitude, and I intend to bring the matter before the Minister for Finance. It is not altogether in my hands.

Mr. CORISH: I want to know will this Bill give the Minister power to act?

Mr. BURKE: I understand this matter has been the subject of arbitration, and that will complicate the situation, and I do not know exactly what effect it will have.

Captain REDMOND: Am I to understand from the Minister's reply to Deputy Corish that he does not in any way propose to deprive these Rate Collectors of the decision already come to, and that he does not intend to deprive them of the rights which follow upon the decision which has already been given by this Arbitration Court, but rather that it is a question as to the source from which they shall receive it—whether it shall be from the County Council or from the Government?

The PRESIDENT: The question was where the compensation was to come from, and I understand Deputy Corish's claim is that the Local Authorities should be relieved from all liability with regard to this. There are two sides, I think, to this question. First of all the Local Authority got service from these officers, in some cases over a great number of years, and it has a certain contingent liability for the services that had been rendered during that time, and the only case the Deputy can possibly make is whether or not, in view of the special circumstances of the times, it should make up the difference between the normal moral liability of the Local Authority and that which was imposed upon the Local Authority by reason of certain action having been dictated from Headquarters. In reviewing that particular aspect of the situation it ought to be borne in mind that Local Authorities generally were faced with bankruptcy, were it not for the action of the Government of the day—Dáil Eireann—advising and directing that certain action should be taken by the Local Authorities, and by reason of the action taken the Local Authorities have not sustained one farthing of a loss during the whole of that war period. Whoever else lost, and many lost money and property, the Local Authorities lost nothing, and supposing this was a slightly unfair impost to ask from them now, I say it is an impost for which they have been very well safeguarded, and for which their interests were at no time in jeopardy.

Looking at the matter entirely from the point of view of the State, what has happened? Something like, I suppose, ten million pounds' worth of damage was done. In the ordinary way that damage would have been a State loss, but through the action of the State Government which directed Local Authorities to take these actions and through the negotiations which this Government undertook with the British Government, not alone were Local Authorities reimbursed in respect of the grants that had been withheld, but also liability was undertaken by the British Government for the damage inflicted on the country, and generally speaking, looking over the awards that have been made and the amounts that have been paid by the British on the one side, and by the Irish Government on the other, their proportion of it is in the ratio of 2 to 1. That is to say, that out of every three pounds' worth of damage done, we are liable for one pound, and the British Government for two pounds. I think, in view of that fact, that for two years, or possibly three years, no Local Authority was called upon to pay any contribution towards criminal and malicious injuries, and no Local Authority during that period lost a single sixpence. I think, therefore, that this claim on behalf of Local Authorities is not made with a good grace, and I think that on reflection the Deputy will not press it.

Mr. CORISH: What the President has said is all very well, but I think he will admit that a special rate of ninepence in the pound, imposed by a Local Authority on the ratepayers of a county at a time when they are put to the very pin of their collar to make ends meet, is a very big impost. The people in the County Wexford expect, in view of the fact that the Irish Government at the time issued these orders, that the Government at least should bear their share of the cost. I want to know at this stage if the Government is prepared to receive representations from the Wexford Co. Council in connection with this matter. What I want to know is if the Government is taking power under this Bill which will enable it to consider representations in connection with this very important matter. I do not think that is an unreasonable request to make.

Mr. BLYTHE: I could undertake to receive representations, but, as Deputy Figgis says, it must be without prejudice.

Captain REDMOND: As far as I am concerned I do not quarrel with Deputy Corish's request. What I would like to get a perfectly clear answer about is this, whether it is the intention of the Government to deprive these Rate Collectors of the rights they have received as a result of the decision of this Arbitration Court? That is my concern.

The PRESIDENT: As far as that question is concerned, the Government has no intention now, or at any time, of contravening the law.

Mr. CORISH: On a point of explanation, I desire to make this clear: That not now, or at any other time, have I approached this question from the point of view of doing these people out of anything they are entitled to. It is the source from which the superannuation is to come that I am principally concerned with.

Question: "That the Bill be received for final consideration," put and agreed to.

Mr. BURKE: I move that the Bill do now pass.

Agreed.

Ordered—That the Bill be sent to the Seanad.

DAIL IN COMMITTEE.

MINISTERS AND SECRETARIES BILL—THIRD STAGE (RESUMED).

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Progress was reported last evening during debate on Amendment No. 10 (Mr. Darrell Figgis) to delete paragraph viii. of Clause I.

Mr. GOREY: We are all acquainted with the phrase, "There's a bee in his bonnet." It strikes me in the case of Deputy Figgis he has a fish in his bonnet, and judging by the number of times that this matter has been brought up here by him it is not a very fresh fish at the moment. Now, the question of economy in this case resolves itself into how many men can we spare? How much money can we spare? Provided you abolish the Ministry and hand it over to another Department, that Department will have to be staffed as efficiently and fully as if there was no Minister. It means that all you can spare is the Minister's salary, minus what you pay to the head of the other Department, and how much economy in pounds Deputy Figgis proposes to save to the tax-payer is what I would like to know. It would also be very important information for the Dáil. There is no field of labour in any of the Ministries so undeveloped or that needs attention so much as this question of inland and sea fisheries. The whole matter has to be built up. Scarcely anything has been done in the past. This whole Ministry and industry have to be developed, and there is nothing in the Saorstát that requires more attention and more initiative, and I will also say that more requires funds at its disposal. The only fault I have to find with the Ministry is that the Government do not propose to place enough money at its disposal to develop the inland and sea fisheries as they should be developed. Money can be found for every other thing; money can be found for salaries and for every other matter; but when it is a question of national development of this description we are told that money cannot be found. That is, I think, a very mistaken attitude on behalf of the Minister for Finance and the Government, because this is one of the cases crying out for development, and I hope in connection with it that the Executive Council will seriously consider the advisability of putting enough funds at the disposal of the Minister for Fisheries to develop this industry as it should be developed. Money, as I said, can be found for everything else. Everybody drawing his salary gets his cheque and there is no question of money being found for all these things. I, and the party with which I am associated, are prepared to begin with ourselves if nothing else can be done to try and finance this Ministry, and we are prepared and will propose a cut of 10 per cent. in the salaries of members of the Oireachtas. I hope that will be approved by Deputy O'Connell who is rather interested in these 10 per cent. cuts.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I would like to say one or two things. I would like to note the conversion that has already been effected in Deputy Gorey. He who, in the first instance, was the bell-wether of the flock has now changed, and he believes that the post that he has advocated the elimination of earlier should be maintained.

Mr. GOREY: On a point of personal explanation, I think the Deputy is making a great mistake. I consistently advocated the continuance of this particular Minister, and I refer him to the records.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: If I am wrong I am very sorry, but my recollection was as I stated. The Minister for Agriculture yesterday laboured a point that was not quite so candid as it might have been. He stated that this Bill was establishing—he used the very word “establishing”—a Department of Fisheries, not a Ministry. The Bill, of course, does nothing whatever of the kind. He went further and said that it established a Department of Fisheries with a view to future development in six or seven years' time. The Bill does nothing of the kind. The Department of Fisheries that exists to-day—although this Bill is not enacted—is substantially the same Department as was taken over from the earlier British regime, when it was worked in connection with the Department of Agriculture. I would like to say that when I urged that the Department as a separate Ministry—not as a separate Department—should be merged with some other Ministry and should be merged under the actual provisions of this Bill, I did so because it had been made evident to this Dáil at an earlier stage that the money would not be available for pressing forward reconstructive schemes, including the reconstruction of the national fisheries in the manner which that reconstruction will very clearly require. The Ministry argued against it. They will retain the Ministry. Very well, be it so. Then I hope that the alternative which they have accepted is an alternative which they will prosecute as it ought to be prosecuted. If that be the effect that will be achieved no one will be more delighted than I will be to see the Department of Fisheries remain not only a separate Department, but carrying its own Minister in this Dáil, if money will be put into that Ministry sufficient to make it a really live Ministry. I do believe that such money will be a very profitable expenditure for this State and people. I did only argue for the elimination of this separate Ministry and for the merging of this Department with other Departments on the supposition that money would not be available.

If the separate Ministry be maintained, then I say that it is the responsibility for the Minister for Fisheries, according to the provisions of the Constitution, whether the Executive Council likes it or whether the Executive Council does not like it, to come down here with proposals to this Dáil and ask this Dáil to approve of those proposals, and then let it be put up to the Minister for Finance to accept those proposals by which this Ministry will be made a live Ministry in future, as it has not been a live Ministry while it existed already. That is an alternative. There are two alternatives. I had only taken the first, because I thought that was the alternative that the Ministry most favoured. They are opposed to it. I willingly accept their decision in the matter. I only indicate that their decision does place upon them certain responsibilities, which I hope they will accept. There is at the present moment very considerable hardship throughout the entire fishery population. In every constituency with a sea-board, people want not only material with which to conduct their industry, but even if that material were provided—as it is not within their means to provide it themselves, as they are dependent upon State funds, State loans and State allowances to do it, and as these loans, allowances and funds have been available in the past—they would still be in the same position that they are now. The fundamental requirement of this industry is the opening up of proper markets. The opening up of proper markets takes money. If this Ministry is going to be retained, if this proposed amendment of mine be defeated, I shall not be at all sorry; I shall be glad. But I do say that in that case the Minister—not the Ministry, because we are dealing with an individual Minister here who has no responsibility whatever to the Executive Council, but is directly responsible to this Dáil—will have the responsibility placed upon him to bring before this Dáil some definite reconstructive scheme, and to ask this Dáil to let him put it through in order that the responsibility may then be placed upon the Minister for Finance to make good the schemes which this Dáil has approved, so that the Ministry as a separate Ministry may be a live Ministry.

Mr. O'DOHERTY: I think Deputy Figgis has given proof of his interest in fisheries, because I find on inquiry that the report of the Commission which he presided over was most important and informative. It has been necessary for me during the last month to look deeply into this fishing question, as a large portion of the constituency which I represent is interested in the matter.

There is no doubt whatever of the grave distress that exists amongst the fishing community, and there is no doubt that the present system of conducting the fishing industry must be radically altered. It seems to me that the arguments of Deputy Figgis have defeated the purpose of his amendment. The amendment objects to the appointment of a Minister, but the ground he set forth was that he would not object to a Minister, if funds were placed at his disposal. I think if the Dáil came to the conclusion that the fishing industry should be taken up as a national one, and its possibilities thoroughly developed—and there is no doubt that it can be done—no Government, no matter how parsimonious, would refuse to provide the necessary funds. I have had some relations with the Minister for Fisheries in connection with my constituency, and I must say, speaking from actual knowledge, that I found him willing to give his assistance, which was most valuable. If this Department is developed in the direction that Deputy Figgis indicated, by providing the funds, the necessity for a Minister will be so apparent that the Dáil cannot but agree. I have, therefore, much as I value Deputy Figgis's remarks on the fishery question, to side against his amendment.

Mr. O'MAHONY: Deputy Figgis has conceded the necessity for such a Ministry. His complaint is that under existing conditions the Ministry is not as efficient as it ought to be. I think nearly all of us will agree with him in that respect, but we have to walk before we run. The Minister for Agriculture made it clear that the present purpose of the Ministry is to complete the machinery that will enable it to take effective action in the near future for developing fishing as it ought to be developed so as to make it a big national industry. Deputy Figgis in his remarks last evening admitted that in the course of a couple of years, even if the Ministry were merged into one of the other Departments, the necessity would arise of having a separate Ministry. Why not concede that that position exists at present, and that it is of such vast importance to the people that, from the very outset, it ought to function as a separate and independent Department, concentrating all its energies and knowledge and tabulating everything with a view to development? That is possible, and only possible when it is worked as an absolutely independent Department. The internal fisheries and the external fisheries of Ireland have a big future before them. I submit that we should more readily realise the vast possibilities of this Department by working it as it has been worked, as an independent unit, concentrating all its energies on that work alone. Everybody knows that a good deal of attention will have to be paid immediately to the internal fisheries of Ireland, as owing to the way in which the poacher has been dominant for the last few years there are hardly any fish left in the rivers or lakes. To my mind, the Deputy was himself the most eloquent advocate in opposition to the amendment. He has admitted the necessity, in the near future, of having a separate Department functioning for this particular purpose. That future will be rendered nearer by having the Department in being, not controlled as a sectional Department of another Ministry, but devoting all its energies and powers to the development of what I believe will, in the near future, be one of the chief sources, not alone of employment, but of income to the State.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. Blythe): After the speech of Deputy Figgis I do not think it is necessary to say much in opposition to the amendment. There has always been a fishery service of a sort. We had until recently a fisheries section or Department attached to the Congested Districts Board and a fishery section attached to the Department of Agriculture. It is undoubtedly desirable and necessary, now that the Congested Districts Board has gone, and that the Department of Agriculture has been divided, that the particular branches of administration dealing with fisheries should be joined together. I believe that the hopes some people have of the ease with which the fisheries of Ireland can be developed are too rosy. Undoubtedly the whole question is one of immense importance. In a country like this, to simply put fisheries in the background, as an unnamed section of some Department dealing with either agriculture or industries, is not, I think, giving to such a question the attention that it ought to get. I believe that there can be very little serious opposition to having some department of administration charged solely with the developing and safeguarding of the Irish fishing industry. If that is so there is very little to be said with regard to the amendment, because the Bill, as it stands, does not necessitate the appointment or the continuance of a Minister for Fisheries. It simply provides for the establishment of a Department of Fisheries. If it were thought desirable it would be quite possible, under the Bill, to give that Department of Fisheries to some Minister who also had another Department, and to appoint, if it were thought desirable, a Parliamentary Secretary to take charge of the Department of Fisheries. It seems to me to be beyond doubt that little attention has been given to the matter of fisheries in the past. The 4 o'clock. Fisheries sections in the Department and in the Congested Districts Board were the Cinderellas. Very little attention has really been given to the possibilities and the needs of the fishing industry and, to my mind, now more than at any other time is it desirable to have a Minister solely charged with the consideration of what can be done, and with the formulation of proposals for the development of fisheries. The fact that there will be great financial stringency this year and next year is not an argument against that. We have got over the great difficulties that caused our present financial situation. I have no doubt at all that after a year or two we will have a steadily improving financial situation. If at that time money is available, and you have a Minister who has been giving attention to the whole question of the needs of the industry, putting forward its claims and making a good case, you will have the likelihood that what could and ought to be done for the development of the fisheries will be done. If, on the other hand, you keep the matter of fisheries in the background, then even when we get to the state when a good deal of money might be available, nothing would be likely to be done and no considerable result achieved for a long time.

I do not think that the Minister could do all that Deputy Figgis suggested he ought to do. If we are to have a Minister for Fisheries, at least he could see that there is no neglect, and that is a very important matter. He can see that this matter is kept in the forefront, and he will be expected to do so. It will be expected that something will be done, and it will be expected that some consideration will be given to fisheries. It will be expected that the money available will be well spent if we have this Department and a Minister in charge of it. If, on the other hand, you put it into the background, as in the past, you will probably spend the same money as before. It will probably be spent almost anyhow, because the Minister for Agriculture will not have the time or the energy to give very close guidance to policy in the matter of fisheries. If you were to give the matter to the Minister for Industry and Commerce, he would not have the time nor the energy to give very much consideration to it. If there was actually a line of policy in operation; if a big expenditure was going on; if there were schemes carried through and in operation for a considerable time, it is easier to assume that work would be much better done under some other Minister, such as the Minister for Agriculture, than it would be at present when we are at the beginning and the work has to be done, when we really have to consider the whole matter from the foundations, because I do think that heretofore there has been no thinking-out of the matter and no formulation of a sound plan that would bear criticism. In the old days Dáil Éireann plunged into some fishery developments as the result of adopting popular notions at the time, and the results were disastrous indeed. It simply resulted in the complete loss of a considerable sum of money, and it convinced me that this needed far more attention than it had received. Probably the Deputy who proposed the amendment had in mind that the Bill as it stands necessitates for all time the having of a Minister for Fisheries, or that it necessitates having a Ministry of Fisheries at any time. It does not, and the question of whether we should have a Minister for Fisheries or not is one that can be considered and decided on at some other time. The real thing that the Bill proposes is to have a separate Department of Fisheries, and I think that there can be no doubt that we should have such a Department, standing on its own feet and open to criticism, dealing with fisheries, and not simply some obscure branch of a bigger department. I do not think much argument is required against the amendment.

Mr. ALTON: I do not think that it requires much penetration to see that a Department of Fisheries is necessary. It is a Department likely to be of increasing importance, and now is the time to establish it. So far am I from curtailing the responsibilities of the Department that I would like to suggest to the Minister that he might enlarge its functions, and as we have gone out of our way to put under the surveillance of this Department, the matter of rural industries, I think we should also put under it the administration of the smaller harbours. The well-being of the fisheries is so intimately connected with the provision and upkeep of these harbours that I think that some day it will be absolutely necessary for the Minister, or whoever is in charge of this Department, to have control over the harbours. As far as I know—the question has always been a very vexed one—our small harbours are sometimes under the control of several bodies, and there seems to be no central body to determine what repairs shall be done or how much money shall be expended on them, and to determine the claims of rival harbours that are perhaps only twenty miles apart. I would suggest to the Ministry that they should enlarge the scope of this Department so as to include the smaller harbours.

MR. DARRELL FIGGIS: I would like to ask permission to withdraw the amendment. I do so because it has achieved much of the purpose I sought in putting it down.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Is the Deputy going to make another speech on the amendment?

MR. DARRELL FIGGIS: I just want to state what the purpose is, and I will do so in three sentences.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy has made three speeches on the amendment, and I think that is really all he can be allowed to make. If we are to go beyond that number we are lost.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments 11 (Mr. Davin) and 12 (Mr. P. Hogan, Clare) not moved.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Amendments 13 and 14 are precisely the same. They aim at the deletion of the words at the end of paragraph IX.—“and shall be assisted by Council for Defence as hereinafter provided.” I would like to point out that there are motions down to delete Section 8 which provides for the Council, and a discussion on amendment 13 or 14 gives us a double discussion on the same thing. The effective discussion would take place on Section 8, I think.

MR. DARRELL FIGGIS: I was aware of the point you mentioned. In putting amendment 13 down, my only intention was to draw attention to the fact that passing these words will not prejudice any objection one may want to raise when the actual Section comes under discussion.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: No, it will not.

Amendments 13 (Mr. Darrell Figgis) and 14 (Mr. Davin) not moved.

MR. DARRELL FIGGIS: Amendment No. 15 is involved in amendment No. 1, which has been discussed and decided.

Amendment not moved.

Question: “That Section 1 stand part of the Bill,” put and agreed to.

SECTION 2.

(1.) Each of the Ministers, heads of the respective Departments of State mentioned in Section 1 of this Act, shall be a corporation sole under his style or name aforesaid (which may be lawfully expressed with equal validity and effect whether in the Irish Language or in its English equivalent as set out in the preceding section), and shall have perpetual succession and an official seal (which shall be officially and judicially noticed), and may sue and (subject to the fiat of the Attorney-General having been in each case first granted) be sued under his style or name aforesaid, and may acquire and hold land for the purposes of the functions; powers or duties of the Department of State of which he is head or of any branch thereof.

(2.) The Executive Council shall on the recommendation of the Minister appoint the principal officer of each of the said Departments and each of the said Ministers may appoint such other officers and servants to serve in the Department of which he is the head, as such Minister may, with the sanction of the Minister for Finance, determine.

(3.) The terms and conditions of appointment of all officers and servants appointed by any Minister shall be prescribed by the Minister for Finance and there shall be paid out of moneys provided by the Oireachtas, or if there be any fund properly applicable by law to such payment, then out of such fund to such officers and servants such salaries or remunerations as the Minister for Finance may from time to time determine.

(4.) The expenses of each of the Departments of State established under this Act, to such amount as may be sanctioned by the Minister for Finance, shall be paid out of moneys provided by the Oireachtas.

Mr. P. HOGAN (Clare): I move:—

“In sub-section (1), lines 29 and 30, to delete the words ‘subject to the fiat of the Attorney-General having been in each case first granted.’”

In putting forward this amendment I had in mind that for some time past we have been considering the Courts of Justice Bill, and every party in the Dáil has given its time in endeavouring to make justice as easy of access as possible for every citizen. Whilst of course that is just and right we cannot refrain from thinking that Ministers are citizens of the State, even if privileged citizens. I am sure they would not renounce their citizenship for the sake of being Ministers. I cannot conceive why a Minister should be hedged around with privileges that are not the privileges of other citizens. In other words, I cannot conceive why the Attorney-General should have a veto on actions or litigation that may be brought against a Minister of State, why he should constitute himself so to speak a fairy godfather for the Ministry, to protect them from litigation. Of course it may be argued that frivolous actions may be brought against Ministers, but no citizen is free from such actions, and our courts of justice are just as competent to deal with frivolous actions brought against a Minister as against any other citizen. In reading the Section what occurs to one's mind possibly is the old tag, “The king is dead; long live the king,” and that we have not yet got away from the divine right of kings. But in our day I think we have no place for such relics of antiquity even where these rights are vested in reigning monarchs or where they are sought to be vested perhaps in the descendants of a king who cultivated a particular animosity towards the natives of Denmark. I do not think that there is any place in our Constitution or in the courts of justice for such a thing.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Might I point out that this Section makes a tremendous advance in this regard upon the previous existing position. In England no action can be brought against a Minister first of all without a fiat, and, secondly, certain kinds of action are excluded altogether; that is to say, one can only proceed by petition of right, and can only proceed in actions raised on contract. No action in respect of wrong can be brought against a Minister with or without a fiat in England. This section has advanced to the far more democratic position of permitting actions to be brought against Ministers, as such, requiring only that there should be a check upon such actions in order that frivolous actions may not be brought, and that actions cannot be launched against a Minister in his Ministerial capacity as Minister of the State, which perhaps could not be brought against him in his personal capacity.

Amendment put and negatived.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: The following amendment stands in my name:—

In Sub-section (2), line 39, after the word “determine,” to insert the words “provided that any officers so appointed have satisfied the Civil Service Commissioners as to their qualifications and general fitness to perform the duties which will be assigned to them.”

Am I to understand that the Minister for Finance is willing to accept this amendment?

Mr. BLYTHE: I accept the principle.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: In that case I am willing to withdraw the amendment and thank the Minister for the consideration he has given us.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question—"That Section 2 stand part of the Bill"—put and agreed to.

SECTION 3.

(1) The President of the Executive Council for the time being shall, so soon as may be after his appointment as such President, determine and declare how many and which of the said Departments of State established by this Act shall be assigned to and administered by the members of the Executive Council to be appointed on his nomination pursuant to the Constitution: Provided, however, that the Department of Finance shall always be one of the Departments of State so assigned and administered.

(2) It shall be lawful to assign two or more of the said Departments of State to a single person who in such case shall be appointed to be the Minister head of each of such Departments.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move the following amendment:

To delete Sub-section (1) and to substitute therefor as follows:—

"As soon as conveniently may be after the first meeting of a newly-elected Dáil Eireann, that House shall direct the Committee to be appointed in pursuance of Article 55 of the Constitution as to how many and which Departments of State shall be assigned to Ministers not members of the Executive Council and subject to the provisions of Article 52 of the Constitution, those Departments shall be so assigned, and the remaining Departments shall be assigned to Ministers who shall be members of the Executive Council."

The question raised by this amendment is, first, that the proviso is unnecessary inasmuch as it is a constitutional provision, and I wish to suggest it is undesirable to insert in general Acts provisions of this kind which are inevitably under the Constitution.

There is also a question raised as to the relative positions of the Dáil and the President of the Executive Council in the selection of Ministries which shall be controlled by Ministers who are or are not members of the Executive Council. If the Section is passed in its present form it will have the effect as regards the Ministries, which the Dáil desires to select as the Ministries which shall be directly controlled by the Dáil through the Ministers responsible only to the Dáil, that the region of selection left in the hands of the Dáil will be minimised. The proposal in the Bill is to say to the President, "You may now select Departments and then appoint persons to these Departments, which may mean seven out of such number as may be defined, and the area of selection left to the Dáil will be reduced." The effect, further, is that the Dáil is practically in a position of subordination to the President, for the time being in regard to such matters as these. To illustrate—and I do not want to refer to it more than as an illustration—the Department of Education is clearly a Department in which it was generally admitted, a year ago, that apart from the personnel of the Ministry, the Department of Education should not be within the control of the Executive Council; that is to say, it would not be a political office in the same way as other Departments might be. A Minister for Education, for instance, should not be subject to the chances of a change of Ministry. The object of the Constitution regarding external Ministers clearly was to make it possible to have selected persons, who would not be in the hurly-burly of political fight, who could be placed in charge of Departments such as Education. The Dáil may decide that Education, Fisheries, of which we have just been speaking, and any other Department outside Finance should be reserved to Ministers who would be responsible to the Dáil directly. That, I think, was clearly the intention of the Constitution, but the Section, as it is written down, says that the President shall determine how many and which of the Departments of State shall be assigned to and administered by Ministers of the Executive Council. I think that is going past the intentions of the Constitution. After all, when a President selects his Executive Council it is persons he is looking for, rather than Departments, and I desire to ask the Dáil to agree to the principle that the Dáil should be left to choose the Departments of State, the head of which shall be responsible directly to the Dáil. The contrary, which is proposed by the Bill, would leave the Dáil either to declare no confidence in the President or its area of selection would be very much confined. I therefore beg to move the amendment.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: As regards the proviso to which Deputy Johnson refers that was clearly necessary in order to prevent any suggestion that the section, as it would stand without the proviso, might affect the provisions of the Constitution. I suggest that this amendment of Deputy Johnson's so far from being in accordance with the idea of the Constitution is really distinctly against it, and would be unconstitutional and probably bad. Clearly an Executive Council is a council of persons responsible for the executive government. If the Bill is first to determine that Ministries and Departments of State, where large questions of policy may be concerned, are to be outside the Executive it may become quite futile to appoint an Executive Council at all.

In the way in which I understand the provisions of the Constitution, I should say that a President is elected by the Dáil because he has a certain policy and he associates with him the particular departments of State in which there are questions of policy involved—that is to say, questions of policy as regards executive government. It may be possible to leave certain departments outside the Executive Council because they are more matters of administration than of executive action. But it seems to me that the provisions of the Constitution would be entirely neutralised by the amendment of Deputy Johnson. It would really amount to the Dáil electing a President who would be a mere puppet. Even if he had a sufficient number of departments of State left to him to supply the minimum of Ministers with occupation, they would be simply a body of puppets. Instead of being responsible to the Dáil the Executive would be—as I believe some people advocate—scattered amongst the body of Parliament as a whole, and you would cease to have the idea of Executive Government. In my opinion this amendment cuts across the whole basis of the Constitution and would neutralise its operation.

Amendment put and declared lost.

Mr. COLOHAN: I beg to move amendment 19:—

In Sub-Section (1), lines 57 and 58, to delete the words, "Provided, however, that the Department of Finance shall always be one of the Departments of State so assigned and administered."

The last sentence of the Sub-Section is merely a re-enactment of Article 52 of the Constitution. It is, therefore, unnecessary and also objectionable, in so far as it lends colour to the inference that the provisions of the Constitution can be varied incidentally in the course of ordinary legislation. I formally move the deletion of this sentence.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The object of the proviso is to prevent anybody suggesting that by the breadth of the terms of the Section there might be a constitutional amendment involved; that is to say, if it left at large the question of the Ministry of Finance, that suggestion might be possible. The proviso, so far from varying the Constitution, simply prevents anybody suggesting that the Section does interfere with it in any way.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Does the objection of the Attorney-General—that if the words were not there a constitutional amendment might be involved—mean that it is his opinion that a constitutional amendment can be involved incidentally?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: No.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: If there be a constitutional amendment during the eight years it must be by definite and specific procedure. Obviously there can be no constitutional question involved by the elimination of these words.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The only justification for the proviso is that unless you except Finance from the Departments mentioned in the earlier part of the Section there is the suggestion that it is swept in. If it were open to anybody to hold that it was possible to leave it out of the Executive or that there was any intention to make it possible to leave it out, somebody might suggest the proviso was bad and contravened the Constitution. With the proviso, nobody can suggest that there was any attempt to vary the Constitution.

Mr. JOHNSON: This must be read with a similar proviso in the previous Section. One might possibly infer—the habit might easily be developed—that if a proviso of this kind were not inserted in the Bill then the Constitution is open to amendment.

I think that it is rather bad policy to insert such phrases as these in a Bill—“Provided it does not conflict with Article so-and-so of the Constitution.” Surely a condition of that kind ought not to be placed in incidental enactments, enactments of a minor character comparatively. The Constitution ought to be presumed to govern all these enactments. I do not think the Attorney-General has given any valid reason for inserting such phrases as these in a Bill of this kind, when the Constitution must inevitably govern such legislation.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Its only object is to prevent the question being raised.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Does the Attorney-General recollect an interesting example of this which occurred in the last Dáil, when an endeavour was made to insert words to the effect “that nothing in this Bill shall be construed as contravening the Constitution,” or “shall be construed as amending the Constitution”? That was ruled out of order on the ground that the Constitution could not be amended except by specific legislation directed to that end. If the Preamble of one Bill could contain a statement that nothing in the Bill was to be construed as contravening the Constitution, it might be also applied to other Bills. This is not quite the same thing; but, nevertheless, it is a matter that needs some consideration, I think.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: With all respect, it is not quite the same thing as a general Preamble providing that an Act is not to be a violation of the Constitution; but, look at the words: “That the President of the Executive shall, after his appointment, declare how many and which of the Departments of State . . .” This proviso is really nothing more than to say “how many and which of the Departments of State, including the Ministry of Finance.” It really is no more than that.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I did not state that the question of the Preamble was the same as this; I suggested the matter was something similar.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I was going to suggest that surely the President is not supposed to do things that would be unconstitutional. It is assumed he would proceed in accordance with the terms of the Constitution when he is making his suggestions. I think it is not at all advisable to put in a proviso of this kind, because if there are any other Acts which are in doubt we will look for the proviso, and if it is not there we will say it should be there, and we assume its absence means a certain thing.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I would be disposed to discourage lawyers and litigation.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I would suggest, as this is a rather important matter and involves certain considerations for the future, that if one sees a buttress placed against a wall, one assumes weakness somewhere in the wall. That would be the inclination of one's mind. When these buttresses are put in here so as to hold up the wall of the Constitution, one assumes that there is a weakness. It would be much better not to have that assumption.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The weakness is in the words “how many and which of the State Departments, including the Ministry of Finance." If the form of the proviso is objectionable to some sensibilities, it can be easily altered to read, after "Departments of State," "including the Ministry of Finance."

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Would it not be better that it should read "that the President may, subject to the provisions of the Constitution."

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: No.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I think the objection is identical in that case. I would suggest that the amendment be withdrawn, that the matter be further considered, and that other words such as the Attorney-General now suggested be brought up later on.

Mr. JOHNSON: I would be inclined to advise that. Let me draw attention to the last four words of the sentence, if this were acceptable—"pursuant to the Constitution." To put in a further proviso which necessarily draws attention to the Constitution seems to be very undesirable.

Mr. COLOHAN: I beg to withdraw the amendment in view of the promise of the Attorney-General.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question—"That Section 3 stand part of the Bill"—put and agreed to.

SECTION 4.

There shall be paid out of moneys provided by the Oireachtas to the President of the Executive Council an annual sum by way of salary not exceeding £2,500, and to each of the members of the Executive Council an annual sum by way of salary not exceeding £1,700, and to each Minister not a member of the Executive Council an annual sum by way of salary not exceeding £1,700, but so that no person shall be paid more than one such salary.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: I beg to move the following amendment:—

"In lines 2 and 4, page 6, to delete the figures £1,700 and to substitute in lieu thereof in each case the figures £1,500."

In view of the present conditions ex Vol. 5.

isting in the country and the demand for economy which we hear every day, and which has been made with regard to certain Departments of State, I feel this amendment should be self explanatory. Possibly it would have been better if this amendment had come from the Government benches rather than from those benches. In view of the fact that the Ministers appear to have made up their minds that economy shall be effected in all Departments of State, it seems to me that it would be a matter of the utmost importance that those Ministers should set an example by first getting their own houses in order and effecting economies in their salaries.

A statement recently brought before the Dáil caused a great deal of controversy. It was a statement by the Minister for Finance that the salaries of the National Teachers were to be reduced by 10 per cent., and that 1/- a week was to be taken off the dole which the Old-age Pensioners get. I think it would be extremely wrong for the Government making those cuts to maintain that the Ministers were entitled to retain the salaries which were fixed when conditions were more prosperous and the future of the country, from a financial point of view, more hopeful. The amendment I have moved is a very reasonable one. The reduction I suggest is £200, and in reaching that figure I made a cut of something close to 10 per cent. It is a little more than 10 per cent., but in all probability a demand will be made to cut salaries in Departments of State further, and I think I may be forgiven for this slight increase over 10 per cent.

In the case of a New State like the Free State there is a great tendency for the Government to take example by old-established States, in the matter of salaries amongst other things. I think the salaries paid to Ministers in England and other countries should be no criterion to what we should pay our Ministers here.

There are many considerations, and there is one matter of considerable importance I would draw attention to. It is that our Ministers are men who, by a lucky turn of the wheel of fortune, and without any great previous preparation, have found themselves Ministers of State. In such circumstances it would be advisable that they should start in a moderate way and as the finances of the State improve their salaries could be increased, just as in a business concern the salaries of men are increased as the financial position gets better. We Deputies are constantly up against statements such as this: "Why are not Ministers making cuts in their own salaries and the salaries of heads of Departments?" How can we go to the country and tell our constituents that cuts ought to be made in the wages of men working on the roads or elsewhere while at the same time we do not make cuts in the salaries of Ministers, heads of Departments, and other officials? Yesterday one of the Ministers stated it was possible, in the event of certain things happening, that the salary paid to the head of a Department might be greater than the salary of a Minister. That could be rectified by the salary of the head of a Department being reduced in proportion to the salary of the Minister. The salary of one Minister, even with the reduction I suggest, amounts to what 60 Old-Age Pensioners would draw. It also represents the wages paid to about 20 farm workers. Much as I appreciate the value of the work done by the Ministers, and the personality of our present Ministers, I do not know if in a democratic State it could be considered that one Minister is equal to 20 farm workers. In all probability those farm labourers would have an average family of five and then it would amount to considering whether or not one Minister was equal to 100 people in a rural district.

It is to be noticed that I did not put in an amendment to reduce the salary of the head of the Executive Council, because I think that the President of the Executive Council occupies a position of dignity and honour, and it would not be worthy of our country, no matter what its finances would be, that we should attempt to reduce the salary of the head of the Council below what it is. I do believe, in view of the present financial conditions, conditions that are not likely to improve for a considerable time, and taking into account the comparative youth of many of our Ministers, and the probability they have of an increase in their salaries, that they should now state their willingness to accept this amendment, and to accept the reduced salaries which have been offered in this amendment. Accordingly, I have pleasure in proposing it.

Mr. BLYTHE: I object to eye-wash. There have been people who have invited us to announce reductions in Ministerial salaries when we were effecting economies necessary to balance the Budget. They said it would enable the country to swallow the economies that were necessary; that the amount saved was of no consequence, but that it would enable the country to swallow the economies. I have no belief in dealing with the country in that way. I have no belief that a man should not be able to insist on economies without beginning by saying: "Here I am doing something; I am going to coax you to do the other thing." I certainly think that you cannot put Ministers, or anybody, in the position of being able to insist on economies without reductions in whatever stipends they are receiving themselves. I regard the whole suggestion as a suggestion that we should, so to speak, throw dust in the eyes of the country. I think this question of the Ministers' salaries is a question that should be dealt with on the merits, and that it should not be done as some sort of apology for effecting needed economies in expenditure. I simply will deal with it in that way. It is a question of whether this salary is one that is too much in the circumstances that exist in the country. We fixed, the other day, the salaries for the judges. We fixed the salaries, including those of the Circuit Judges. We fixed these salaries fairly high, so that judges might be independent and so that they might not be subject to corruption. Now those judges have a life tenure and they have pensions. In the existing circumstances, a Minister could do far more, if he choose, in the way of graft than most judges.

You want to be able to get a fairly good class of man as Minister. You do not want to confine Ministerial office solely to what you might call the leisured rich or simply to the professional politician, who goes into politics solely for the purpose of getting office. You would find a difficulty in getting any business man of standing to take up Ministerial office with the present salary, because there is this to be remembered, that every year a Minister is in office, and every year a Government is in office, the more enemies that Minister and that Government have. What happens is, suppose you have a man who has a profession or a business and he becomes a Minister. His practice goes to pieces or his profession goes to pieces, if he has a profession. After four years, which is as long as anybody is likely to continue, he goes out. He has to start then again. If you do not give something reasonable as salary you will not get the right type of people willing to come in. At any rate, you will confine it to a certain class of people.

In this country, where we do not want to confine Ministerial office to the leisured rich, or to confine it to some people who are simply and purely professional politicians, that salary of £1,700, in all the circumstances, and having regard to the fact that a man's whole time is taken up by it, and that he is cut off from any business interests during the time, is not too much, and I do not think that any proposal to cut it down to soothe the feelings of the national teachers, or any other person either that might be affected in the economies, is wrong. We look at it in this way. These are important offices. There is no Minister who, day after day, has not to give decisions that offend people who are friends of his own. The decisions that they do give are in the interests of the State, and if a Minister is to maintain his integrity he must be prepared to do that. You want the sort of person who will do it, and in the same way, as you must be prepared to pay for ability and integrity in Judges, you should be prepared to pay for it in Ministers. This Bill is not for the present, but for the future. I do not say anything about the actual present, because I am looking definitely at the future. I would not care two pence whether this amount came off or not. As far as I am concerned, it will be easier for me to say: "Let it come off." For the sake of the amount, it would be easier for me to agree to it. But I think it is necessary to face this, having in view what the interests of the State demand. You cannot cut down the salaries of lots of heads of departments. Otherwise you come in for heavy responsibility under the Clause of the Treaty which deals with that matter. You might attempt to do that and the result would be that you would cast a heavier burden on the State.

I will say this, that the heads of Departments are not overpaid. There may be individual men who are overpaid. But take the Post Office, for a moment. It is a big concern employing 12,000 employees. What you might call the General Manager of that, the Secretary, is paid £1,000 a year. I think in commercial life any man who is controlling a big organisation, doing the work that the Post Office is doing, and with the number of employees that the Post Office has, would be paid far more than he is. I think if you turn to the Department of Finance, and then if you looked to the banking world, and found men who have the same responsibility that the Secretary of the Minister for Finance has, you would find he would be paid a higher salary. It is these people who are in the key positions. By the least lapse or the least neglect of duty they would cost the State very big sums. It is necessary that you should have people of ability, and that you should attract people of a certain type, and that you should not be confined to people who cannot do much good in other walks of life. I think the worst thing in which to economise is economising in a sphere from which affairs are directed. You might save £100 by some economy, and if you failed to get or to keep the right sort of man it might cost you £100,000 easily. I think that this sort of attitude that we have, that anybody who is paid more than £500 a year, is, of course, a plutocrat and ought be immediately cut down, irrespective of any other cuts or economies, is ridiculous. If you are going to have big affairs conducted rightly, you must have men of ability, and if you are to have men of ability you have to pay for them. I do not believe that the heads of De-

[Mr. Blythe.]

Departments are overpaid. I do not think you can reduce them, and there is the fact that even at present you would have Ministers, with actual salaries less than the heads of Departments. I think this is entirely wrong, and it is the product of a sort of parrot cry that has been going round of late. I think that it is entirely wrong and should not be adopted by the Dáil. For my own part, it would be easing my own task to agree to it, but I do not think it is well to do so.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: On a point of order I desire to ask, a Chinn Chomhairle, if such an amendment is in order under the Constitution. Article 39 reads:—"Ministers shall receive such remuneration as may from time to time be prescribed by law but the remuneration to any Minister shall not be diminished during his term of office."

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: There is no proposal in this amendment to decrease the remuneration of Ministers as fixed by law during term of office?

Mr. O'CONNELL: It may come as a surprise to the Minister for Finance and possibly to others if I say that I am against this amendment. I do not believe in a policy of economy which has only as its foundation simply the cutting down of salaries irrespective altogether of whether they are just and proper salaries or not; that is not the sort of economy I am thinking of in any case. I had occasion to object some weeks ago to a proposition of the Minister for Finance in regard to National Teachers. I do not think it will soothe the feeling of national teachers if a wrong is done to other people in other circumstances. I consider that in the Government of the country, and in the management of the country, we want the best possible people we can get, and we must remember that in looking out for these people we are competing with the business world and with the professional world. It may be just at the moment that people, as Deputy Heffernan said, are perhaps more or less suddenly put into these positions, but that is not going to happen always and even such as it is, they have, because of the suddenness with which they find themselves in these positions, very much increased responsibility which will not be there for people who come after them in six or eight or ten years time; I think it is only reasonable that the matter should be looked at from that point of view, but later on men will be coming into political life and before they enter political life they will naturally, perhaps, look to what prospects political life gives them. We are competing with the business world, as I say, and the professional world for men who will undertake the responsibilities of Ministerial positions and run the country and manage the country as it ought to be run and managed. We do not want duds in business life, and we do not want them in professional life, and even more so we do not want them in political life. I can only regret that the admirable principles enunciated by the Minister for Finance were not carried out in practice in respect of the key-positions in national life. These are key-positions undoubtedly, but there are other key-positions which the Minister seems to have forgotten.

Captain REDMOND: I would like on this occasion to endorse the attitude taken up by the Minister for Finance as one who, to a certain extent, preaches economy at the present time. I never suggested that the various Ministries which are in existence should have as their heads men who would not be sufficiently remunerated for the task that is before them. What I have suggested rather has been that there should be a diminution of those Ministries, and especially a diminution of the staffs in those various Ministries. What I have objected to has been redundancy rather than a proper and sufficient remuneration for the servants of the State. Now in this regard I think I may say that the amount proposed by way of salaries to our Ministers are by no means excessive, and I thoroughly agree with the Minister for Finance when he says that the State should be in a position to secure the best intellects and the best ability in the country. The mere cutting down of these salaries by a couple of hundred pounds would not effect a very great economy, and I do not think it would either effect efficiency, certainly not in the right direction. I, for one, am strongly in favour of the reduction as far as possible of the numbers and personnel of the various Ministries and the various staffs, but I believe that in these staffs and these Ministries which are necessary for the carrying on of the Government of the country we should have the best possible ability, and that the various people who undertake those duties should be properly remunerated, and for these reasons I certainly shall oppose the amendment.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I hope that Deputy O'Connell's speech will be broadcasted to all branches of his organisation, because I was attacked by the secretary of one branch of that organisation for voting for the Second Reading of this Bill. I did not vote for the second reading of this Bill because there are provisions in it which I did not wish to make myself responsible for, and I did not vote at all, but I was attacked by this gentleman, who alleged that I was voting for swollen expenditure. I will, however, vote for this amendment not because I sympathise with all the mover said. I recognise the great force of what was said by the Minister for Finance, and the whole House knows he is absolutely disinterested, but I think it is significant that he was far more eloquent in that part of his speech when he was defending subordinates than when he was speaking for the particular Ministers. I agree that those at the head of the State should be adequately paid. I do not think that Ministers are grossly overpaid, and I do not think that the difference between £1,700 and £1,500 is going to make all the difference between getting a party hack who thinks only of himself and the man who could stand outside without such a position. But beside all this there is a principle at stake. We should not ask others to do what we are not prepared to do ourselves. When I was a soldier I was taught that an officer should never ask a man to do what he would not do himself, but I am afraid that Ministers in the present instance are not on that high ground. I feel perfectly sure we would be in a far better position to face the old age pensioners whose allowance we are reducing, and we would be in a far better position to face the National teachers if we began by cutting down not only the salaries of the Ministers but also the salaries of members of the Oireachtas. I understand there is to be a Bill introduced by a Deputy upon this subject, and if so, I shall certainly support it because, as I have said already, I do not ask any man to do what I am not prepared to do myself.

Professor MAGENNIS: There is a very obvious fallacy in the argument we have just heard. It pre-
5 o'clock. supposes what is not the case, that these salaries set down originally for Ministers were sufficiently excessive to allow of a cut. If the Ministers' salaries, as originally fixed, were correct, something might be said for the argument, but we know that it is not at all a correct description to say that they were adequate. They are, and always were, hopelessly inadequate, and I am glad that I registered my personal protest against the fixation of them in the beginning at this ridiculous amount. I charged the President at the time that the sum was computed somewhat in this fashion, the only way of computation that I could imagine that would reach such a result. It was this, that inquiry was made as to how much the Ministers were paid in the Six-County Parliament. It was found that they were paid £2,000 a year. Then, I suppose, it was said: "Very well, let us fix the Free State Ministers' salaries at a figure less than that." I cannot imagine any other basis of calculation than that, because the salary bears no relation whatever in reason, either to the status of the Ministerial Officer or to the character of the work that he is to do. It certainly does not indicate in terms of money value the dignity of the office; it certainly does not indicate either, the quality or the ability that is demanded for its proper discharge, and it has no relation whatsoever in proportion or in ratio to the type of work that the Minister is called upon to do, or as to the responsibilities that he must shoulder, or, in other words, as to the courage, character and intelligence that he must put into his work.

It is possible now, perhaps, in these days of sacrifice, when sacrifice for the nation is the fashion, and when the wave of enthusiasm that swept through the land in the last few years was sufficient to carry hosts of men along that in normal times would have shrunk from self-sacrifice, to get men of ability to fill these Ministerial offices now, but it needs very little prophetic vision to see that in normal times, and when stabilisation has been reached, that no man of first-class ability would accept a Ministry of the Free State at such a salary. Deputy O'Connell struck the right note, and spoke what is absolutely the truth. The men who are to fill these offices would have a very much larger income if they turned their backs upon the national service and went into business or followed their professions. There are many professional men who are quite willing to be here as private members of the Dáil, but who are not willing to be Ministers simply because they could not afford to throw away so much of their own income and take the miserable pittance, for that is really what it is to regard it comparatively, that is allotted to a Minister. It is the fashion always to look to men in high places, to officials and to others, and to complain that they are overpaid, just as members of a religious order are spoken of in newspaper reports as "the good nuns." In the newspaper account of a luncheon it is always "the good sisters" who are referred to as having provided a hospitable and delightful dejeuner, or when a clergyman dies he is usually referred to as "a saintly and scholarly gentleman." I am referring now to a Minister, and not to Ministries. A man is always saintly and scholarly when he is dead. So long as a Minister fills a responsible office, and so long as his office carries big responsibilities, then he is a public enemy and everyone's criticism may be levelled at him, and the fashionable type of criticism is to allege that he is overpaid. I believe "bloated official" is the correct description. Just as the established phrase for a deceased clergyman is "a saintly and scholarly gentleman," so I understand the proper phrase in this case is "bloated official." Anyone acquainted with life, anyone who has come to adult years, knows well how the big combines prosper in the United States. The reason is because they spare no money to get at the head of their corporations the man, whoever he is or wherever he comes from, who is able to work successfully a business combine, and a salary of £60,000 a year in pounds sterling is not too much for such a man.

I know of a certain American manufacturing firm that looked round and saw in London in the service of a rival English company a distinguished product of the London University. They offered him a high salary which fidelity to his own employers made him refuse. What did the American company do? They bought out the English company and then said: "Now we are your employers and we will take you over to America and provide you with all the laboratories you require." That is how big businesses are conducted successfully, and is there any bigger business in this nation than the business of the nation itself? It is absurd to come along with this petty criticism and suggest that economy requires a reduction of expenditure in regard to Ministerial salaries. Economy, to my mind, requires an increase in those salaries, and it is in the interest of economy that I stand here to say—and I say it with the utmost conviction—that unless those salaries are increased by some future measure you will not have at the service of the nation the best ability and the most experienced brains.

Professor O'SULLIVAN: Might I just point out one thing about this amendment? If it is intended to set an example to the nation, it is doing so by deceiving the nation. This amendment, as you have clearly pointed out, does not propose an immediate cut in the Ministers' salaries—it cannot take place for four years if the Ministry remains in office. Therefore, to pretend to the nation that you are cutting them £200 while in reality you are not doing it is, as the Minister for Finance pointed out, mere eyewash.

Mr. GOREY: I want to assure the Minister for Finance that this is not eyewash. The amendment was not put up with the intention of throwing dust in the eyes of the public. It was put up honestly. We put it up from the same point of view as the Ministers who have been asking the public to subscribe to the loan as an act of faith in the future of the Saorstát. This amendment was put up to ask the Executive Council to show an act of faith in their own economies, and in the economies they have been preaching wholesale throughout the country. A good case has been made by Deputy Magennis in showing why a good man should receive a good salary, and why the best men should be drawn into the service. But a good case also can be made for every man in every other service. The same case can be made for other men who are receiving salaries and for men who are receiving no salaries but are trying to eke out an existence all over the Saorstát. This is not eyewash. It is a genuine plea that the cut should come from the top as well as from the bottom, but I see very little disposition to make the cuts at the top. It is all very well to preach economy to men who are not able to defend themselves, who are not here to defend themselves, but if there is economy needed—and it is needed—it ought to be economy all round. We Deputies here are not getting a huge salary, and some of us give all our time to the business of the Dáil during its sittings. There are some Deputies here who are prepared for a cut, and it ought to be a cut all round. When men preach economy they ought to show an act of faith in what they preach. Deputy Heffernan said that he did not like to interfere with the salary of the President by reason of the dignity of his office. I agree, and I hope that in future the President will do honour to the office and let us have the usual hospitalities associated with such an office. For that reason only I agree with Deputy Heffernan.

Mr. JOHNSON: Is that an act of faith?

Mr. GOREY: Yes, it is an act of faith. I am not surprised at Deputy O'Connell. I knew Deputy O'Connell would try to make a good case for the people whom he represents, but in making that case he made a case for the Ministers. He was not thinking of the Ministers at all. Like a wise man he was thinking of something else. I want to assure Ministers that this is not meant for eyewash or to throw dust in the eyes of the public. It is trying to show the public that we believe in what we preach, and the sooner we all start showing an example the better for this country.

Mr. MCGILLIGAN: This is a sham battle from the start. It seems to me that the psychology of Deputy Gorey's surname is that he must always be engaged in a conflict, always in a battle. It does not matter, as long as there is turmoil and a certain amount of dust arising from that conflict, whether there is any object to be gained or not. If Deputy Gorey insists that we must practise what we preach he should first of all see that he knows what the object of preaching is. Nobody has set out in this country to effect economies merely to penalise certain people. It was done in order to accumulate money and to save money. What money is going to be saved by Deputy Heffernan's amendment? A sum of £2,200, to come into force this time four years. There is a phrase which occurs in a play—I think it is by Wm. Boyle—which is sometimes acted in this city, where a canvasser calls on a begging expedition and the gentleman on whom he calls says he will halve his entire fortune and at the end presents a shilling. The shilling is refused and the phrase is used, that this beastly conglomeration of twelve miserable coppers cannot be accepted as a decent result of the interview. Does this £2,200 seem an economy to be effected in the present state? That is where I think the Minister for Finance's references to eyewash seem to be applicable. The sum to be saved is £2,200. We are told that the psychological effect of the lesson is going to be that the teachers will accept more readily the cut imposed upon them, not for the sake of penalising them but for the sake of the great money there will be saved by it. The same thing, of course, applies to old-age pension money.

[Mr. McGilligan.]

It is not merely to penalise. Deputy Heffernan's amendment does not set out to effect any economy. I cannot understand whether it is a fine on the Ministers for insisting that money should be taken from somebody else or whether it is meant as a reasonable contribution to balance the Budget next year. Personally, I have the feeling, that Professor Magennis has given expression to, that Ministers here are not well enough paid, and the analogy that was made by the Minister for Finance when he spoke of the salaries paid to the heads of Departments was not a full statement of the case. The head of a Department at present may not only be getting the same as the Minister but he has also pension rights and security that a Minister does not hope to have. Deputy Heffernan referred to those young men who at present hold Ministerial office. The effect of this amendment is not to deprive these young men, but to deprive any one who holds Ministerial office, of £200 a year. He did refer to the fact that these were young men and had many opportunities before them. That is another point in my argument against Deputy Heffernan's amendment. They are young men, most of them at the period of their career when, if they turned their faces aside from this assembly to some other business, they could certainly accumulate much more than anything they are likely to accumulate from their present office. The other argument of Professor Magennis I need not stress. We must see in this country that the occupants of the Ministerial benches are not going to be confined to the leisured class or to those with money. We pretend we are a democratic country and we should have some belief in what we preach in that respect. The Ministerial occupation at the moment is a blind alley of the worst form. If we are going to reduce salaries and leave Ministers unpensionable, as they are in this country, and without any idea of a lengthened period of office, then you do mark out these posts only for those who are wealthy.

There is one other attitude that I think Deputy Gorey might consider.

He might soon transfer himself by merely crossing the floor of the Dáil. Let him treat those people who were at one time called Deputies, and who are now called Ministers, as if they were on the same level as the rest of the members. I have in mind a phrase that was used, or was put into the mouth of the late President Roosevelt when he took his army to Cuba. He said that there he was with those brave boys going out in the boat. He said he talked to them as if they were his own equals, which indeed they were, in every way, except in point of education, wealth, rank and courage. Let us treat Ministers as we would wish to be treated ourselves, if efficiency were to be demanded from us when we sit on those benches. I object to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think the discussion shows the difficulty of assessing the amount of salary that should be paid to a Minister. I have not yet heard from anyone any good reason for fixing the amount at £1,700 or £1,500. I do not think the stressing of the commercial argument was a good one. I do not think it is good to say that a man capable of carrying on the business of a Department of State would be able to earn three times as much if he went into banking or agriculture. I do not think the argument that because he would be able to earn three times as much as an agriculturalist or a banker he should get as much or something approximate to it as a Minister, is a sound one. If that is to be the criterion it seems to me that we have got to find out what would be the worth of such a man in an administrative capacity after going through a business career or professional career. I suppose the idea would be to endeavour to obtain the services of a man who for love of the State would throw himself heart and soul into its service, relying only upon a minimum livelihood. One may take the example of some of the monastic orders and say that here you have men who are prepared to sacrifice themselves utterly to service. We are not likely to attain that position in this country within the next five years. I think some of the criticism we have heard in the Dáil and outside is personal, and is coloured by the fact that the critics were closely associated with the men who have been placed in the position of responsibility. If, as is the case in most countries, the Ministerial elements were far apart from the people there would be no such criticism. There is a certain amount, not of jealousy but sycophancy behind a good deal of the criticism, a feeling that these men are not good enough for high office, or at least, they may be good enough for high office, but they are not good enough for high pay. I do not think that should affect the discussion or the judgment of the Dáil, in this matter. I want to say that we are not dealing with this Ministry. We are dealing with the office of Ministers of State and trying to assess the amount of salary, pay, stipend, or as Deputy Professor Magennis would like to call it, honorarium, that we should give to these Ministers. I did not like to hear the Minister for Finance saying that you must pay a certain high salary to remove to some degree at any rate the risk of graft. There is a suggestion in that, and I have heard it more than once, that the temptation to illicit payment is greater amongst those who receive small payment for work done, than amongst those who receive high payment. I think evidence would be conclusive if one tried to adduce it, to show that the danger of graft lies, at least equally as much, amongst those who have been in the habit of receiving high pay.

Mr. BLYTHE: I think Deputy Johnson slightly misunderstood me. I said that if you did not get men who were equal to the office there was greater danger of corruption. I certainly did not mean to say what Deputy Johnson has taken me as saying. My point was that if you get men who are unfit for the office, owing to people who are fitted being unwilling or unable to take office at the rates or salaries offered, you run risks in that direction.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think the risks are no greater amongst those who have not been in receipt of anything like these salaries than those who have been in receipt of high salaries. Deputy Cooper and Deputy Gorey, I think, made some references that if we were to preach economy and "cuts" and be consistent we should lower salaries in the Ministerial ranks and elsewhere. If I thought there was anything in that argument I would retort that because I have resisted "cuts," therefore I will continue to resist "cuts." I do not think you are going to have economy, and I do not think you are going to get the ends you seek by simply making the "cuts." I do not think that is the direction in which economy should proceed at all. In arriving at the rate of salary to be paid to Ministers I think we have not got to take into account their competitive worth, their worth in the field of commerce, or in the professions. We have to take into account the circumstances of social life of the community in which we are living, the qualifications and preparation necessary for the work that has to be done, and the risks of being thrown entirely upon their savings, after office has been vacated.

Deputies ought to recognise that that is a very considerable risk. A Minister cannot speak of the future because, under this Bill, which will operate until it is repealed or amended, Ministers would be chosen from those who have had at least some preparation for Ministerial office and not merely a preparation in the commercial world, because usually I think it has been found that that kind of preparation does not qualify for Ministerial office. The preparation required would entail a considerable amount of reading and training which involves expense, and after one, two, or four years that a man may occupy a Ministry and receive a salary, perhaps twice as much as he would have been receiving in other walks of life, the surplus might easily be lost in one year after he had vacated office. One or two years after he might be thrown entirely upon his own resources, having lost his prospects and being dependent upon what he has been able to save during his years of office. I do not see yet any argument for fixing the sum at less than £1,700; I have not, in fact, heard any argument for fixing it at £1,700, but until I hear some effective argument that satisfies me that the sum should be reduced from what it has been fixed in the Bill I will oppose the amendment. I think that we have to recognise that a citizen upon whom has been imposed the duty and responsibility of the charge of a Department of State has taken upon himself a tremendous responsibility, and I think we ought to endeavour to impress upon the country that it is a responsibility. It is not a reward; it is the request of his fellow-citizens that he should do certain work, give certain services, and absolutely immerse himself in the service of the State, and every Deputy knows that even in their own associations—and it is to a much greater degree to be found in Ministerial posts—that responsibilities are imposed upon Deputies, and more so on Ministers because of their position, that are not imposed upon the average citizen, and those are monetary responsibilities. For these reasons I am not prepared to approve of the amendment. I do not think any case has been made except the case for cutting, and that is not conclusive, either in this case or any other cases put forward here.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: I would like to assure the Minister for Finance that this amendment was not put forward in any sense as eyewash. It was seriously intended and was not in any way meant to reflect on the Minister for Finance. I would also like to assure Deputy Johnson that I was not in any way inspired by such motives as petty jealousy, or spite, or personal ill-will against the Minister.

Mr. JOHNSON: May I say that I never thought that that was in the mind of the Deputy. I was thinking of general loose talk outside.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That was made clear, I think, Deputy Heffernan.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: I accept that statement, but in any case I wish to say that I was not inspired by these motives, even if Deputy Johnson did not suggest them, because I have the greatest possible regard for the capabilities and capacities of the Ministers, as far as I know of them, and I was greatly impressed and almost convinced by the thoroughly honest statement made by the Minister for Finance in regard to this matter. But I must say that I am not sufficiently convinced and I still retain, to a large extent, the opinions I originally started on. I was perfectly well aware, when putting forward this amendment, that the actual economies which would be effected on its acceptance would be trivial and would have no effect on the general finances of the country. But I was also inspired by the ideas of other Deputies that no man should ask a subordinate to do what he is not prepared to do himself, and I felt that Ministers, having asked their subordinate Departments to make cuts and to make reductions, are in duty bound to make similar reductions in their own salaries. A difficulty seems to arise with regard to an estimate of the value of the services of the Ministers, and we find it difficult to arrive at a standard on which to judge their financial worth. I am not responsible for that; if a mistake was made when the salaries were originally fixed, if these salaries were fixed at too low an amount, that is not my fault. I take it for granted that they were fixed at an amount which it was thought was the worth of the Ministers' services, and if the Dáil fixed them at too low an amount, I cannot be responsible for that. I take it for granted that they were fixed on the value of the Ministers' services of the time. The Minister for Finance made a certain statement about the value of the services of certain heads of departments, and he referred particularly to the low salaries of the Postmaster-General and the Secretary. I agree with him to a large extent. I am well aware that a man who is responsible for the conduct of such an enormous institution should be well remunerated, and I think it is quite possible that the actual civil servant he referred to does not receive a sufficient salary. But I would also remind the Minister for Finance that there are many other departments. If he looks at the Estimates he will find about 60 votes with the heads of almost all Departments getting probably £1,000 a year, and in a great many cases over that. I think there seems to be some magic in that figure of £1,000 a year. When I was a young fellow I thought that if I ever reached the enormous salary of £100 a year I would be made for life, but now the ambition of all school children is £1,000 a year, and although the value of money has considerably depreciated, I do not think it has depreciated to that extent. I do consider that although the heads of some departments may not be sufficiently paid, the heads of a great number of departments are altogether overpaid.

I deal with this largely from the point of view of agriculture, and the thing which impressed me most in hearing the speeches made in this debate was the strong, solid wall of opposition which we farmers are up against in our attempts to economise. As far as I can judge from what I hear in the Dáil, economies are very admirable things, provided it is the other fellow who is to make them. We are all willing to economise out of the other man's pocket, but when it comes to touching our own we rather dislike having our salaries reduced. We all know that agriculture at present is in a very parlous condition, that there are no profits from it, and that the people we represent are enjoying practically no salaries whatever, and there is also a grave danger that there would be built up on this superstructure of Ministers a bureaucracy which will bear down upon the country's impoverished foundation. That is what we are fighting against. My idea in bringing forward this is that the example should be set by the Ministers, and should percolate down all through the Departments of State, and that it should affect every Civil Servant, and every servant of the State who is getting a salary, and also that notice should be taken of it by other members of the community, and that they should be prepared to accept less for their services. If the present heavy superstructure is maintained agriculture, which is its basis, will not be able to support the country in the manner in which things are being carried on. Having stated these arguments, I am convinced that it would be a wise thing and a popular gesture, if the Ministers accepted the amendment instead of putting it to a vote.

Professor MAGENNIS: I should like to say I had not the advantage of hearing Deputy Heffernan when introducing the motion. I have heard him now, and I cannot at all understand the attitude he has taken up. He says the Ministers should set an example. I quite agree. Let me correct his history. The Ministers have set an example. In spite of the protest of an Independent Deputy, such as I was, the Ministers fixed a scale of salaries at quite too low a figure, utterly inadequate. I called it, and still call it, ridiculous in the circumstances. Consequently, if the sole ground on which he rests his case be that the Ministers should set an example, he is already fully met. They have set the example. Not only has the axe of economy been applied to various departments of administration, but it was applied earlier to the Universities. That was accepted, I will not say without any murmur, but there was no protest made except by University representatives. I quite agree that agriculture is in a bad way. Is agriculture to be taken out of the wretched state in which it finds itself by introducing a scheme of Ministries, and of remuneration for Ministries, which will make us a fifth-rate State? Is the head of the national administration purposely arranged to be a man of inferior standing in any of the various walks of life? That is really what it amounts to. The fabric of government, the fabric of State administration, is being created by this Bill, and in the name of restoring to its much desired prosperity one of the stable industries of the country we should see to it now, according to the Deputy speaking for agriculture, that it shall be an inferior fabric. It is a most extraordinary idea to say when the State is being arranged that it shall be inferior. I never thought to hear in actual life the argument with which ancient logicians regaled their pupils: "Who drives fat oxen should himself be fat." Here it is enunciated: "Who makes a cut must make a cut with regard to himself."

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE took the chair at this stage.

The PRESIDENT: The question of

the payment of Ministers and Deputies was left last year, in the first instance, to a Committee to decide. The Committee was composed of Deputies, I think, from all sections of the Dáil as it then stood, and it took into consideration questions affecting other countries and salaries paid in other countries. I do not know whether it had in mind salaries then paid, or salaries which had been paid to certain officials, Civil Servants, who were in office here at the time when the Treaty was passed, and who actually were in receipt and enjoyment of those salaries after the Dáil met, certainly in one case, and possibly in two or three. There was one civil servant whose salary was either £3,000 or £3,500 a year, with residence; another civil servant had a salary of £1,800, and another a salary in the neighbourhood of £1,700 a year. Since the establishment of the Saorstát, and in fact during the time of the third Dáil, no appointment was made by the Government of any official at a higher salary than £1,500 a year. These salaries carry with them what are called Civil Service bonuses which bring up the salary, I think, to a round figure of £1,700. The position has with it all the advantages which civil servants enjoy, such as pension rights, and I am sure that the Committee in considering the salaries of Ministers at that time had that in mind when recommending a salary of £1,700 a year. I stated when I was introducing the Bill that I would entertain an amendment to reduce my own salary. Personally, I have seen no reason why there should be any differentiation. The Committee thought otherwise. I conveyed my views to the Committee, but they in their judgment and wisdom recommended the large salary for my office. I do not think it is a salary on which a person having no other sources of income would be able to keep up what is properly supposed to be the dignity of that office. It would call for very much more expenditure than is allotted in the salary of £2,500 a year, when income tax and super tax is charged on that figure. Ministers pay income tax, and I understand that the salary is somewhere about £1,400 a year when income tax has been deducted, so that in that respect they are on much the same level as officers in the Civil Service who have not, as far as I know, many of the charges on their income which attach to that of Ministers, and who have permanency of occupation, and none of those disadvantages which Ministers occasionally experience in their pilgrimages throughout the country. I would say as regards salaries, that even though there are a number of Ministers, and even though the salaries are £1,700 a year, and even though it may appear to be a superstructure of a certain amount of extravagance, it cannot be considered extravagant when they have rendered good service for the money they have received, and that ought to be one of the principal tests one would apply to a consideration of this sort. I mentioned, when introducing this Bill, that as far as the salary of the President is concerned there was a difference of somewhere about £100 a year in the net amount received in salary by the President, and that paid to the Lord Mayor of the city of Dublin, and the Lord Mayor has a residence which is not provided for the President. If the State cannot afford to pay the Ministers at the head of departments, the average responsibility of which far exceeds that of the Lord Mayor at the same rate, I think we are a poor country. If, on the other hand, by reason of a large number of Ministers certain economies can be effected, and that the State can be placed on a very secure and sound foundation, even perhaps at the expense of the political existence of some of the Ministers, I think they are rendering good services for the money they receive.

Some years ago, in discussing the possible future of politics in this country, a very able man said to me that he would not give much for the lifetime of the first Government or of the second, but that he would put his money on the third. I think we have lived that down. But Deputies generally will admit that, having regard to the difficulties of the time, there is a certain limitation to the political future of those who are placed in responsible positions just now. The public may possibly say that they have achieved some good work. As time goes on, people will say that they ought to have achieved it at a much lesser price and at less cost, one way or other. But it must be remembered that the majority of those comprising the Government at the moment are very young men who, in the ordinary way, might possibly be devoting their attention to their own future. From my experience of them—as I said during the election campaign—I had never received more loyal service or had read in any country of more loyal service or of such disinterested service as these men rendered. That is so far as they are concerned in their offices as Ministers and in their work and support in founding this new State. It does not take into consideration the future. We do not know what the future may hold for us. It may be possible within a few years, as soon as reorganisation has been completed, to conduct the affairs of this State with a smaller number of Ministers who, in turn, may be able to administer their particular Departments at much less cost of time than is at present the case. But I do say that, in considering the question of the salaries that may be paid to Ministers, that one ought now and then stand up against an unbalanced public view. If there be such, it must be nurtured to a large extent by the weakness of persons who are not able to appreciate the size of the job Ministers have got and the size of the job they have accomplished.

We are not placing in comparison a Minister's salary with the allowance of an Old-age Pensioner. We regret—every member of the Ministry regrets—very much indeed the necessity for effecting economies from such a service of the State. You would not get any economy worthy of the name by a deduction of 10 per cent. from the Ministers' salaries, and in effect it would be misleading the public to say that we had ourselves borne the same cut. The proportion would not be the same. The actual effect upon the pockets of the Ministers would not be the same. At no time, I suppose, would it be necessary to cut their expenditure to the extent that they would be short of, say, a glass of wine or a cigarette or a meal, whereas the same thing may happen in regard to the old age pensioners. In this matter of Government, one must consider all the complexities of the case and one must remember that, while a Minister is reputed to have £1,700 a year, and actually handles something like £1,400, the drains and demands on that £1,400 make his salary not very much more than the ordinary Higher Executive Officer of the Civil Service. And possibly the Civil Servant has the amount with much greater certainty, because a Minister never knows what demands may be made on his purse. Some of these demands he cannot possibly refuse. The question to my mind has been admirably—and I may say very generously—dealt with by the Leader of the Opposition.

If there is one man in this assembly who has a serious responsibility to those who placed him there it is the Leader of the Labour Party, Deputy Johnson, because those who returned him here, and who worked for him may, I think, resent persons having salaries running into four figures when their own terms of employment may be very insecure, if there are any at all. It ought not to be forgotten that to the service of the State and to either Houses comprising the Oireachtas there ought to be attracted the very best material there is in the country, and it must be remembered that even good material is not always free from some taint or some complaint. If you get really honest and able men attracted to the service of the State I say they ought to be paid, and it would be very poor reward for the service these men rendered during 6 o'clock. strenuous and hard times to say at the end of that period: "You have done your job fairly well, but your salary must be reduced."

Amendment put.

Amendment declared lost.

Question—"That Section 4 stand part of the Bill"—put and agreed to.

SECTION 5.

"Nothing in this Act contained shall derogate from the collective responsibility of the Executive Council as provided by the Constitution notwithstanding that members of the Executive Council may be appointed individually to be Ministers, heads of particular Departments of State."

Mr. COLOHAN: I move to delete this Section. This Section merely re-enacts Article 54 of the Constitution and is open to the same objection as the last sentence in Sub-section (1), Section 3. I hope there are no doubts in the Attorney-General's mind as to some of these Sections not infringing the Articles of the Constitution. It seems to me that this Section is unnecessary. Therefore I move its deletion.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: This is even more necessary than the proviso to which Deputy Johnson took exception, and for this reason: it would be a bad thing to lay down any such rule as that we must not mention the Constitution in any of our Acts. For my part, responsible for the drafting of Acts here, I could not accept that principle. The reason for this particular provision, and what makes it quite necessary is this: For the convenience of the administration of the various Departments, the Minister who is at the head of the Department is given an individual capacity in relation to doing a number of acts, which for the most part he does by order under seal. The property of the State vests in him, as an individual corporation. It is necessary, while giving him that individual capacity and status for dealing departmentally, to show that that is not in conflict with the political collectivism of the Executive Council, and in my opinion this provision is absolutely necessary.

Mr. JOHNSON: That is a legal opinion. I bow. I cannot understand it.

Amendment put and negatived.

Question: "That Section 5 stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

SECTION 6.

"There shall be vested in the Attorney-General of Saorstát Éireann (who shall be styled in Irish Priomh-Aithne 'Shaorstáit Éireann and shall be appointed by the Governor-General on the nomination of the Executive Council) the business, powers, authorities, duties and functions formerly vested in or exercised by the Attorney-General for Ireland, the Solicitor-General for Ireland, the Attorney-General for Southern Ireland, the Solicitor-General for Southern Ireland, the Law Adviser to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and any or all of them respectively, and the administration and control of the business, powers, authorities, duties and functions of the branches and officers of the public services specified in the Ninth Part of the Schedule to this Act, and also the administration and business generally of public services in connection with the representation of the Government of Saorstát Éireann and of the public in all legal proceedings for the enforcement of law, the punishment of offenders and the assertion or protection of public rights and all powers, duties and functions connected with the same respectively, together with the duty of advising the Executive Council and the several Executive Ministers in matters of law and of legal opinion."

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I move amendment 22, to delete the Section. The amendment is that the Section be deleted, not that it should be merely amended. I want to make it clear that in moving for the deletion of this Section I am not touching at all, or dealing in any way, with the existence of the office of the Attorney-General, but merely that if it should be judged wise and necessary for a good reason that such an office shall exist, as distinct from the Minister for Justice, then that office should be provided for separately in a Bill of its own. I do not propose to develop this at very great length. I am rather reminded of a story of a French mayor who was called on to show cause why he surrendered his town without firing his cannon. He filed fifty-two reasons, and the fifty-second reason was that he had no cannon to fire. I will dispense with fifty-one reasons and come to the last, which is that I am fortified in my conclusion that this Section should not form part of the Bill by the opinion to that effect of the Attorney-General himself, as the drafter of this Bill, because the Bill is entitled, "The Ministers and Secretaries Bill." That is the short title. The other title is:

"an Act for constituting the Ministers and Departments of State in Saorstát Éireann pursuant to the Constitution, and for enabling the appointment of Parliamentary Secretaries and other purposes incidental thereto."

I have already put it before the Ceann Comhairle that if this Section were to stand, as part of the Bill, the title would have to be amended, but inasmuch as the title stands, as it does, it was clearly the belief of the original drafter that this Section should not stand part of the Bill, because this Section is not consonant with the title.

I do therefore urge, on separate grounds altogether, that any creation of the Office of Attorney-General should be a creation with its own Bill. It should be under its own separate Bill, and it would deal with the matter far more fully, setting forth the services and functions to be attended to by such an officer, far more completely than could possibly be done under one single section of a Bill mainly devoted to other purposes and the title of which is confined to other purposes, not including the purposes set forth in the Section. For this reason I urge that this Section should be deleted from [Mr. Darrell Figgis.] this Bill, and that the whole question of the work to be done by the Attorney-General, and the creation of the office of Attorney-General and a matter that is not dealt with in this Bill at all, a matter that the Attorney-General would be inclined reluctantly to admit—the remuneration of the Attorney-General—would be dealt with in such a Bill, dealing separately with the existence of such an Officer of State. I think it was the President himself, or it may have been the Attorney-General, who stated that the Attorney-General was not a Minister and was not a Parliamentary Secretary. But in a Bill dealing with Ministers and Secretaries it is a very excellent thing that the Bill should be confined to Ministers and Secretaries, and that the Attorney-General should be given the privilege, which he could so well fill, of taking an entire Bill to himself.

MR. O'CONNELL: I also had an amendment to this matter, and my reason for putting down the amendment has been practically stated by Deputy Figgis. It is because it does not seem to fit in with the provisions of the Bill. The Attorney-General is not a Minister. Or is he a Minister? We do not know; it is not clear to us. It is a Ministers and Secretaries Bill. The Attorney-General has the status of a Minister or Judge inasmuch as he is appointed by the Governor-General, on the nomination of the Executive Council, but there is nothing to show whether he is, or is not, to be a member of the Oireachtas, or in what other way he is eligible, or must he be a member of the Oireachtas in all cases? That is not stated, nor what is to be the length of his office, or whether he would go out of office with the Executive Government, whether it is a political appointment or a purely legal appointment. There is, too, the question of remuneration, which is absent from this Bill. On the whole, I think that while I agree that there is a necessity for such an officer, his position should be defined, and defined at much more length, in a special Bill.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: This Section does not create the office of Attorney-General. The office itself is an old common law office that has existed, under the system of law that we have taken over, for a very long period of centuries. I believe that it dates back to the earlier part of the 13th century. It has no statutory origin whatever. Its functions practically are represented by its name. The Attorney-General was an agent originally for the King, and now represents the Crown and State in all legal proceedings. I did say that the Attorney-General was not a Minister, not because he is Attorney-General. That does not make him one of the Ministers named in the Constitution. He may be a Minister, or he may not. In England, however, the Attorney-General is, in point of fact, called a Minister. He is given in the list of Ministers. He may not be a Cabinet Minister. Here he is not necessarily one of the twelve ministers named in the Constitution, unless he happens to be one that is selected by the President of the day to be one of his Executive Council.

Therefore, what I meant, in the statement to which Deputy Figgis refers, is this, that his office does not in itself make him one of the twelve Ministers. He may be outside the Dáil altogether. The functions of the office are settled and clear. He represents the Executive in all legal proceedings; he prosecutes on behalf of the Executive in all criminal matters, and in prosecutions for State he is responsible for defending public rights. For instance, in any matter that may affect a public right of way, or a public highway, no one can proceed without his intervention on behalf of the public.

What this Section does is, it transfers to him a number of functions that were formerly vested in the previous Attorneys-General, first for all Ireland, and then for what was called Southern Ireland, and so on. A great number of these functions are statutory, and it appeared right that they should be transferred and vested in the Attorney-General of the Free State by Statute. It is an office closely attached to the Executive. It is a Ministerial office, and it is properly in this Bill, though I agree with Deputy Figgis that probably it would be nicer, as a matter of draftsmanship, to amend the title by inserting a reference to it, though I doubt if that is necessary. However, I propose, in order to meet these particular finesses, to put that matter right by introducing an amendment in reference to the title.

The appointment by the Governor-General follows on the advice of the Executive Council, because it is essential to have the office to complete the Executive, so that it may not be possible in Court to take, as a point of objection, that the whole Executive authority is not represented in the Attorney-General in any particular proceeding. This Section is really one which transfers, so far as may be necessary, the various duties and functions and business of that office as it has existed. It would be an enormous task to go through all the Statutes. There are an immense number of Statutes in which the office of Attorney-General is referred to for one purpose or another. I think this Section effectually completes the office as it is necessary now in the Constitution.

Major COOPER: There is one point which neither the Bill nor the speech of the Attorney-General has made clear, and that is whether the Attorney-General is or is not a Minister. I think the proposed amendment, which the Attorney-General has spoken of introducing, would make it more clear that he is not a Minister. If this is called a Minister, an Attorney-General and Secretaries Bill, it would be obvious that the Attorney-General is something different from a Minister. The matter is one of considerable importance, because under Article 57 of the Constitution every Minister shall have the right to attend and be heard in Seanad Éireann. If the Attorney-General is not a Minister, then when the Courts of Justice Bill comes before the Seanad next week, he will have no right to go in there and explain it, and we know he is best able to do that. I think it should be made clear that he is a Minister attached to the Executive Council. He had better give that point some consideration before the Report Stage.

On the Second Reading of this Bill the Attorney-General referred Deputy Redmond to Anson's "Law of the Constitution."

stitution" for information as to the functions of the Attorney-General. I have no doubt that Deputy Redmond, being a barrister, did not need the references. I am always grateful to the Attorney-General for his efforts to direct me. I got hold of Sir William Anson's "Law of the Constitution," and I found, as the Attorney-General pointed out, that he is really the King's Attorney-General, which is an historical position. He is not the President's Attorney-General; he is the Governor-General's Attorney-General. The reason the post of Attorney-General exists is, according to Anson, because the King or his representative were not competent to plead in Court as they did not know the law. That scarcely exists in this case. I think Sir William Anson did not contemplate such a case as now exists here. The deduction I draw is that we are facing a new Constitution which Sir William Anson never contemplated when he wrote his book, and it is not profitable for us to go delving about in a constitutional past with reference to a Constitution which has no connection with ours.

Sir William Anson's dictum is that the Attorney-General should not be a member of the Inner Council. That has since been violated in Great Britain, and it is violated here. The Attorney-General is really wasting our time when he refers to archaic works of that description. We might be better employed in studying Whittaker's Almanac.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: In point of fact Sir William Anson's Book is not an archaic work. It is the most recent work on the British Constitution, but, of course, not on the Constitution of the Free State. The next edition, I should think, will bring it up-to-date. I referred to Anson with reference to the position of the Attorney-General in England, which was referred to here by Deputy Redmond. He referred to the knowledge he had gained by sitting on the Benches in Westminster, where he came in contact with that great personage. He tested our debate by the knowledge he had gained that way. I suggested he might have made his knowledge more accurate by reference to the standard work of Sir William

[Attorney-General.]

Anson. The position of the Attorney-General in the Dominions is slightly different. The Attorney-General in England is directly the Attorney-General for the King, appointed by Letters Patent. The Attorney-General in the Dominions is the Attorney-General of the Executive Government of the Dominions. That is stated in other authoritative works on the subject. I do not quite know to what point Deputy Cooper was directing his remarks—whether or not it was to the deletion of the office from this Bill. As regards the position of the Minister, it would be impossible for me to introduce an amendment in this Bill providing that the Attorney-General shall be a Minister, because I should be assuming to myself two prerogatives of the President, one the power of appointing Ministers, and the other the power of removing them, his quota being complete. It is impossible to put in a provision of that kind. The fact is he is not of necessity a Minister, but may be a Minister, while at the same time it is a Ministerial office.

Now, as regards the Privy Council, the Attorney-General in England never used to be a member of the Privy Council, and the great distinction in Ireland was that the Attorney-General always was of the Privy Council; and that accounts for the peculiar difference between the position of Judges in Ireland and Judges in England. They are members of the Privy Council in Ireland because they first filled the office of Attorney-General, and consequently, on appointment to the Bench they remain members of the Privy Council, and in that way become associated, most improperly, with the Executive Government. In England they are not members of the Privy Council and consequently are not in touch with the Executive Government. For that reason, Judges in England have Knighthoods, but not in Ireland, because the precedence attached to the office of Privy Council was greater than that attached to the holding of a Knighthood. I do not think I could introduce an amendment, or suggest to the President an amendment to make the Attorney-General necessarily a Minister, because he is not necessarily a member of this Dáil. But if some future President has in his Cabinet a person capable of being Attorney-General, then, when constituting his Ministry, that future President may make the Attorney-General a member of the Executive.

Major BRYAN COOPER: A Minister may not necessarily be a member of the Dáil.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: But an Executive Minister?

Major BRYAN COOPER: My point was that the whole thing requires more exact definition than it can get in this clause, and that the deletion of this clause would render the substitution of another clause necessary on Report Stage, where we could have a much fuller and more intelligent understanding than merely being referred to constitutional works.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: This Section does not refer to constitutional works. Save by an amendment of the Constitution—I do not think it would be by this or that Bill—would it be possible to provide that the Attorney-General must be an Executive Minister because he must be an Executive Minister or one outside. It would be impossible to have the Attorney-General appointed by the Dáil in the way of an outside Minister if he is to be a legal Attorney or representative of the Executive.

Mr. HEWAT: I have always looked with great respect upon the law, as being formidable to the ordinary layman; but, in connection with the discussion here in respect to the Attorney-General, my respect for the law has largely increased, and my awe of the position of the Attorney-General is more profound than it was ever before. The Attorney-General, I gather from him, is and is not, was and was not an illusory person with undefined power going back to prehistoric times, derived from no Statute. Altogether, he is a most interesting personality, and, as I say, I shall look upon him with greater awe and greater respect than ever before.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Section as it stands followed by the explanation of its meaning by the Attorney-General rather bewilders me more than any other Section in the Bill. I gather from the Attorney-General's statement that, whether we knew it or not, there was always an Attorney-General. I wonder am I right in saying that when we had a Legal Adviser we had an Attorney-General; that when we had no Legal Adviser we still had an Attorney-General. May I ask the Attorney-General whether I am right or not?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Does Deputy Johnson refer to a period when my title was that of Legal Adviser to the Provisional Government? Because, during that period I had an express appointment of Legal Adviser to the Provisional Government, and also exercised the functions of Attorney-General.

Mr. JOHNSON: Who exercised the functions of the late Attorney-General? There had been an Attorney-General appointed after the usual method by the British authorities. The functions of the Attorney-General were carried through by the legal advisor to the Provisional Government. The Attorney-General now tells us that this office is a continuous office, that he was the advisor in general to the Government for the time being, the Crown, as it might have been, or the Executive for the time being. We are asked to assume now that there has been, in some informal way, an appointment of Attorney-General. This Bill says nothing about a Department of the Attorney-General, but says that the Attorney-General, who has not been created by the Oireachtas in any way, as far as I can understand, is assumed to exist there, I was going to risk saying, from the beginning of time. He is assumed to have existed and continued, notwithstanding the fact that the Dáil or the Oireachtas never appointed him, and that person is to take upon himself certain duties. There is a parenthesis here that the Attorney-General, who is presumed to have existed always, shall be appointed by the Governor-General on the nomination of the Executive Council. The casual way in which this appointment is referred to is rather amusing, and I think if any section of this kind is to be inserted in the Bill, it ought to take the place of a formal declaration, to the effect that the Oireachtas intends to appoint, or at least to institute, the office of Attorney-General. That is not done in the Bill, but we are led to believe by the Attorney-General that we are to assume the existence of this office, and then say that whoever is placed in that office shall have certain duties, including the duties and functions formerly vested in the Attorney-General for Southern Ireland.

I wonder could we have some information as to who that person was when he was appointed, or is it again that there always was such a person, that he was never appointed and was never created, but existed from time eternal. I think that the Dáil would be interested to know whether that is the position, and if it is not the position why are we asked to insert this phrase: "The Attorney-General for Southern Ireland, and the Solicitor-General for Southern Ireland." There may be legal and constitutional reasons for putting in this phrase describing persons who, I believe, never existed, but I think there is no reason for assuming the existence of the Attorney-General of Saorstát Éireann who was neither appointed nor created.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: With reference to the unfortunate necessity for referring to the so-called Attorney-General for Southern Ireland, the geographical place, Southern Ireland as such, none of us ever accepted, but certain Statutes were passed by the British Parliament, and under a certain Statute which we never recognised here, but still it was on their Statute Book, certain individuals did claim to hold this particular office.

Mr. JOHNSON: Name.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I think the last holder who claimed to be Attorney-General for Southern Ireland was Mr. T. W. Brown, who is now a Judge in Northern Ireland.

Mr. JOHNSON: Was he appointed by the Government of Southern Ireland?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: He was appointed by the Lord Lieutenant. He certainly claimed that office under that particular Statute, and by that Statute the functions of the former Attorney-General for Ireland went to him. When one says that the office existed, as regards the Provisional Government period, the matter is readily explained. In the Dominion Constitutions the Crown has an Attorney-General in every Dominion technically. It is important that that Attorney-General shall be the Attorney-General of the Executive of the Dominion. During the Provisional Government period the position that was always taken was that the Provisional Government itself had all the functions vested in it of government administration, and that the Lord Lieutenant had no function that he could exercise during that period; and the particular designation or style of the office which I had the honour to hold under the Provisional Government, owes its explanation to that fact.

The office existed of necessity, that is to say the necessity of the Executive taking executive action in the Courts being parties to proceedings and prosecutions, and in that sense it has grown up and become recognised, as legal people say, by the common law as distinguished from having any statutory origin. It is in that sense that I am to be understood to have said that it previously existed. It is now claimed here that as in the case of other Dominions the officer will be appointed on the recommendation of the Executive of the Saorstát.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I think the discussion on this amendment has rather proved the desirability of the purpose that inspired it, and that is that this matter being, as the Attorney-General has admitted, so vague it ought to be more clearly defined, and ought to be dealt with more fully than it can be dealt with under a section of a Bill dealing with another subject. No one could have a higher respect than I have for the common law; the respect can strictly be described as vast, because it must be commensurate with the subject itself, which is vast and also inchoate. But because there is such a thing as common law in existence for a body of law that has no statutory origin, I think it would be difficult to argue that the same justification can be made for the existence of an officer that has no statutory origin. This is purporting to give statutory origin to that officer. He cannot, after the enactment of this Bill, claim a non-statutory origin. If this Bill passes with this Section in it, he will clearly take a statutory origin as from its passage in this Dáil. Clearly then, if he is going to take his stand on a Statute hereafter, as distinguished from his stand before in common law, then let that Statute be ample, complete and adequate enough for the existence of his office, and that is why I urge that seeing that this matter is now going to be taken away from these Ansonian methods, and is going to be brought clearly into a statutory definition, that that statutory definition be sharper and more precise than it is here in this Section, sharper and more precise than it could possibly be in a Bill dedicated to entirely different objects as set out in its title; let a separate Bill be enacted and if it is decided that there should be an Attorney-General, then let it be decided that he should be an Attorney-General of the Executive Council appearing for the Executive Council. That is a matter that I need not develop at any length, because it touches on subjects of some contention, but let him be the Attorney-General of the Executive Council, appearing purely on behalf of the Executive Council. For whomsoever he appears, and in whatever capacity he appears, seeing that he is now going to stand distinct from the Attorney-Generals in other States, let his status be clearly defined in a separate enactment, and it should set out the Attorney-General's exact prerogatives and duties such as has not been done in this Section.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: It has been stated that the Section does not cover all the functions that appertain to this office. Let anyone point to anything that has been omitted. I submit that the Section is so worded as to cover in efficient and descriptive fashion the functions, powers and duties and so on attached to the office. I will defer and bow to Deputy Figgis if he will produce to me something that has been omitted. I submit this Section is a complete description of the office that exists. This Section defines the manner of the appointment and the manner in which it is to be made. The office exists, and as such has been recognised in the Courts, and this Section covers all the various matters which have to be vested in the holder of that office.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I have been challenged and asked a question. I now ask the Attorney-General if he is the Attorney-General of the Executive Council of this State, and if so why that is not stated in the Section?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: He is the Attorney-General of the State, the Attorney-General of the Executive, and of the Executive Government.

Amendment put and negatived.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move amendment 23:

To delete all words from the beginning of the Section down to the word "Council" in line 14, and to substitute therefor—

(1) "It shall be lawful for the President of the Executive Council to appoint a person to be Attorney-General of Saorstát Éireann (who shall be styled in Irish "Príomh-Aidhne Shaoirstáit Éireann") in whom shall vest on his appointment."

The object of the amendment is to remove the apparently casual form of the appointment and to make it a clear declaration in the Bill that there shall be appointed an Attorney-General, or, rather, that it shall be lawful for the President of the Executive Council to appoint a person to be Attorney-General. The Bill as it stands rather puts in a parenthetical way the fact that the Attorney-General shall be appointed by the Governor-General on the nomination of the Executive Council. The amendment gives the power to the President to make this appointment. The common law establishment of this office I do not think would be affected by the fact that henceforward, if this amendment is carried, the appointment of the person to that office will be in the hands specifically of the President. The office exists and the filling of the office is a smaller matter. If the amendment is accepted, then the President shall appoint the person to fill the office.

Mr. GOREY: On a point of order, I do not think there is a House.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes, there is a House. There are nineteen and the Leas-Cheann Comhairle. That is twenty.

Mr. JOHNSON: The plan of the Bill is to establish certain Departments and give the various heads of these Departments certain functions. The Attorney-General has told us that the office of Attorney-General is one that is generally accepted as being established by common law and the amendment seeks to give authority to the President to make the appointment of the person who is to fill the office. It also would have the effect, perhaps, of reducing the status of the Attorney-General somewhat. He would not be appointed by the Governor-General, would not be in the position of Judges or Ministers. I think it is, perhaps, desirable that the Attorney-General should be the Law Adviser and the custodian of these rights and responsibilities that have hitherto resided in Law Officers and Attorneys-General, but that he should be quite distinctly the officer of the Council or of the Government, not a member of the Government. The effect of the amendment would be to minimise somewhat the status of the Attorney-General, to reduce his position in relation to Ministers, and it would throw the right of appointment upon the President as distinguished from only the right of nomination.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: This really is not a question of status. It is a question of having the Executive effectively represented, and I need not remind Deputy Johnson of the technical position under the Constitution. I think it is necessary the appointment should be made in this way in order that the Executive Government should be fully represented in any necessary proceedings. It is solely from the point of view of fully representing the Executive

Government in proceedings that the appointment is made in that way or proposed to be made in that way. It has nothing whatever to do with status or relative status — nothing whatever. Were he outside the Dáil, he would be just the same. It is entirely from the point of view of having the full sanction of the Executive of the day—theoretic and actual—and representing them fully in his capacity of an Attorney.

Mr. JOHNSON: Am I to understand that in the view of the Attorney-General, unless the Attorney-General is appointed in the way described in the Bill that he would not be able to act with the authority that is necessary?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I fear that technical objection might be taken.

Mr. JOHNSON: I cannot pretend to argue these legal points, and I am not going to try on a matter of this kind, which is of very great importance I have no doubt, to controvert the position of the Attorney-General. So far as this amendment is concerned I beg leave to withdraw in deference to his statement as to the possible effect of the amendment.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move:—

“In line 30, to delete the word ‘Executive.’”

This amendment perhaps would not be required to be pressed if the Attorney-General makes a similar explanation, but I do not think he can. The object of the amendment is to eliminate the word “Executive” before “in matters of law and of legal opinion.” Quite apart from the description, which I think is a faulty one, of “Executive Ministers” as meaning Ministers who are members of the Executive Council—inasmuch as all Ministers are Executive Ministers I take it—I am at a loss to understand why the advice of the Attorney-General and General Adviser in legal matters of the Government of Saorstát Eireann should be confined, in matters of law and of legal opinion, to those Ministers who are members of the Executive Council. It seems to me that if a matter of importance in connection with, shall I say, the Department of Agriculture, arose, that the Minister in charge of that Department should have the right to call upon the Attorney-General for advice in matters of law and legal opinion. If the Bill remains in its present form that right would not reside with Extern Ministers unless the meaning is in this Section that Executive Ministers are all Ministers. Perhaps the Attorney-General would help us on that point.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Of course “Executive Ministers” always means members of the Executive Council. We have in several cases here recently used as a convenient phrase to describe members of the Executive Council, without having the whole circumlocution imposed on the printer and draftsman, the phrase “Executive Minister.” In fact all Ministers do have recourse to the law department, and cases and files come in from all these departments, but it is possible that an External Minister, who is responsible only to the Dáil, might be in conflict with the Executive, which includes the all-potent Minister for Finance, and in case of conflict it would be impossible for the Attorney-General to advise the External Minister as against a member of the Executive Council because his primary business is as representing the Executive. That is the explanation. While in fact he is at the call of any Minister, and from day to day in touch with all of them, the occasion might arise when he would be torn between an External and an Internal Minister calling upon him for opinion.

Mr. JOHNSON: That does not meet the case, I think. The duty I am referring to is that of advising the Executive Council, and the several Executive Ministers, “in matters of law and legal opinion.” This does not impose on the Extern Ministers the duty of following that advice. If that Minister does not apply for advice then, unless the Attorney-General were acquainted with the facts, he cannot be said to be failing in his duty. What I seem to see in this is that its undesigned effect, perhaps, will be to relegate the 7 o'clock. non-Executive Ministers to a position where they could not call upon the Attorney-General for advice; that it still leaves the Executive Ministers in that position of detachment, or, shall I say, leaves non-Executive Ministers in a position somewhat of inferiority. I want to guard against that interpretation. If it is the practice for the Attorney-General, at all times, to give advice when asked, in matters of law, to all Ministers, then I submit the case for crossing out the word "Executive" is complete.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: There is, perhaps, really not a great deal in the objection to striking out the word "Executive" beyond the possibility of conflict. The Attorney-General might find himself in this position, that while advising the Executive as to the action the Executive should take, the External Minister who might be taking another line of action would have all the cards on the table. In that way there might be conflict. In fact, so far as mere advice and opinion go, all Ministers have recourse to the Department for advice. I am not disposed really to oppose the elimination of the word in that way.

Mr. JOHNSON: I would like to add that one can see possibilities of acute differences between a member of the Executive Council and a Minister not a member of the Executive Council. If such a Minister, outside the Executive Council, has not the right to call upon the Attorney-General for legal advice, then his position would be an unfair one, and the Attorney-General, in refusing to give that advice, would be supported by an Act on which he would rely, containing this Section, confining his duty to giving advice to Executive Ministers.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I cannot conceive how the position that the Attorney-General speaks of could possibly arise. Assuming that there is some matter in dispute between an External Minister and, say, the Minister for Finance, and that the advice of the Attorney-General is sought, unless I am to believe that there could be two kinds of advice on one given point, I cannot conceive how, if the Attorney-General gives advice, a dispute could arise. Assuming the advice is in favour of the Minister for Finance, and against the External Minister, it will be a matter for the External Minister to accept the decision, or to proceed and get other advice and carry his project before the Dáil. Assuming it is against the Minister for Finance, and in favour of the External Minister, then I presume it is just the ordinary advice that the Attorney-General would give to the Minister for Finance in any case.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: On the whole, I am inclined to accept this amendment, reading it more strictly as it is "in matters of law and legal opinion." If it came to be a matter, for instance, of proceedings, and enforcing, or attempting to enforce, any matter as between an External Minister and, say, the Executive, it would be impossible, I think, to expect the legal adviser to the Executive, and their representative in the proceedings, to advise the External Minister how he was to proceed against them. In a mere matter of opinion on principle, reading it in that sense, I am prepared to accept the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON: That is all that is intended.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move:—

To add a new sub-section as follows:—

(2) "There shall be payable to the Attorney-General out of moneys provided by the Oireachtas such remuneration by way of salary as the President of the Executive Council, with the concurrence of the Minister for Finance, may determine. The Attorney-General shall devote his whole time to the duties of his office and shall not receive payment for his services by way of fees or otherwise save as hereinbefore provided."

This amendment seeks to make sure that the Attorney-General shall be paid something for his services; it is not an economy stunt. I do not think the Attorney-General should be asked, considering all things, to carry on his day by day duties without having some provision made for remuneration. This amendment is to ensure that he shall be paid something, and that what he is paid shall be paid out of monies provided by the Oireachtas. It also is intended to define the position of the Attorney-General. A Law Officer we can understand, but when we are referred to the Constitutional position of the Attorney-General, we must not forget that for a very long time—I am not quite sure if it was so till the end in Ireland—the holder not only drew his salary for his office, but carried on private practice.

The amendment is designed to ensure that that undesirable practice should not continue; that the salary to be paid to the Attorney-General shall be for his whole-time services and that it shall not mean salary, plus fees, for public or private practice. I hope that that argument will commend itself to the Dáil and that at least it will enable us to know where we are with respect to the Attorney-General.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: While I thank the Deputy for the first sentence of the amendment I am afraid the second is quite unacceptable. It is quite impossible to provide that the Attorney-General should be a whole-time officer because, in the first place, it is in the nature of a political office. He is attached to a particular Ministry and if that Ministry—which Heaven forbid—be defeated he would be thrown back on his profession. If he had accepted a whole-time office he would have lost his position in his profession. His position is that of a practising counsel, and while I personally have found it impossible to deal with private practice during the period in which I have been engaged in work for the Ministry—that exceedingly exacting character of the position will probably not continue—no member of the Bar could accept the position as a whole-time office. He could not forfeit his position as a practising counsel. The position as regards private practice is that it may be forbidden as, I believe, in England latterly the Attorney-General does not take private practice, but in consideration of that he has fees for every appearance in court. Here we arrived at an understanding with the Ministry of Finance that appearances in court were not to be remunerated by fees but were to be included in the salary that they sanctioned for the office. But the position that would follow from Deputy Johnson's second clause would really be to make the Attorney-General a Civil Servant, and it would be quite impossible.

I do not think that he could really be a member of the Dáil under that second clause, and if one has an inclusive salary for appearances in court and the various other duties that must be discharged, then it must be considered whether one must not be at liberty to accept private practice. I have considered myself entitled to accept private practice, but the demands on my time have not allowed it, and I have had to return a very large amount of work. The question of forbidding private practice must be considered in relation to the question of whether the ordinary fees are to be allowed for appearances in court, but as it stands the second clause would fail in its object, because I do not think that any practising member of the Bar would take the position under these circumstances.

Captain REDMOND: On this subject I sympathise with Deputy Johnson in regard to the first portion of his proposals, and, on the other hand, I sympathise with the Attorney-General in his view of the second portion. The Bar is a very old trade union, and, no doubt, the Attorney-General would be considered a very bad black-leg if he were to give his time and services as Attorney-General for nothing. But in regard to the second suggestion, that he should be a whole-time officer and not be allowed to engage in any private practice, that would certainly render his position untenable, unless, as the Attorney-General has said, he were placed in the position of a permanent civil servant. It is well known that Attorneys-General, in the past, not only in England, but even in Ireland, amassed considerable wealth, not from the fees derived from the Crown as much as from the private practice they enjoyed during the period of their occupation of that office, and, with the salary as I understand it at the moment, I think the present Attorney-General is asking almost too little. If fees were to be given for every appearance of the Attorney-General in court, certainly the amount would be considerably over the proposed figure, and the arrangement come to with the Minister for Finance, which has just been outlined by the Attorney-General, is, I think, both a credit to the Minister for Finance in the way of economy and a credit to the Attorney-General for sacrificing what might be his due remuneration. I am sure that when Deputy Johnson put down this amendment he could not have fully realised its purport, and having received the Attorney-General's explanation I hope that he will not press it further. Everyone knows, as the Attorney-General has stated, that the position is a political one, and all political positions are temporary—temporary in the extreme. At any time he may be deprived of his office by the defeat of the Ministry, and it would be asking too much for a person of the practice, ability, and experience suitable for the position of Attorney-General to give up that practice for an uncertain period with no certainty whatever of resuming it. Practice at the Bar is like every other kind of business. If you lose touch with your clients your business goes, and, I am certain that, bearing all these circumstances in mind, Deputies generally will recognise that the position taken up in this regard by the Attorney-General is both a just and reasonable one.

Mr. JOHNSON : The attitude adopted rather surprises me, and immediately makes this question one of major importance. Deputy Redmond is unfortunate in his references to trade union practices. A term of opprobrium, which I will not apply to lawyers, is common in the trade union world, when a man who is paid for a certain job is devoting his time to ordinary daily work and then taking home private work. If Deputy Redmond wants to argue this case on grounds of trade unionism he will have to get in touch with some of the people around the Mechanics Hall in Waterford or elsewhere. I do not know, and I do not know that the House knows, what financial arrangements have been made regarding payment to the Attorney-General, but I ask the Dáil to bear in mind in discussing this question the attitude taken in regard to salaries of Ministers. It was stated as a justification for the salaries fixed that Ministers gave up their ordinary occupation, ran the risk of losing their practice, and because of that they ought to have a certain sum commensurate with the office, and taking into account the risks of monetary loss. But who will be impressed for a moment with the argument that a barrister who has been appointed to the office of Attorney-General on relinquishing that office has thereby suffered in his reputation amongst the legal profession? The impression amongst laymen at least is that the fact that he has been chosen for the office of Attorney-General enhances his position when he resumes practice at the Bar. I do not think there is very much in the plea of Deputy Redmond that the acceptance of office means a loss of subsequent practice. I think it has been looked upon as a scandal in England, and in Ireland too, that Attorneys-General and Solicitors-General should be able to draw the amount of money reputed to have been paid to them. I think a very notorious person lately announced that he had sacrificed a great deal of money by accepting a judgeship, an office which he held up to recently, and that he was able to make £40,000 a year at the Bar. I do not think the most ambitious or imaginative lawyer thinks that fees amounting to that would be available in this country, but it seems to me that if a barrister is prepared to accept the office of legal adviser, or Attorney-General, that he should be asked and required to devote his whole attention to the work of that office. If his time has to be occupied with private practice, what assurances have we that he is giving sufficient time to the elaboration of his case when it is a State case? His interests may be divergent; he may be looking to the future, and he may say that this particular client will have big cases coming on after he has lost his office, that he must devote special attention to this case, and, as a consequence, he would devote less attention to the requirements of the State.

The question of fees for State services again seems to me to leave us in the position that we do not know what our law will cost, and that if we are to have an officer of the legal profession who will advise, and take upon himself the responsibilities of Attorney-General, he should be paid a sufficient sum to attract the best men, or at least good men, who are willing to serve the State without having to hold out inducements that not only are they to get State work and fixed salary for State services, but are to look for the emoluments of fees for every case in which they appear for the State, and in addition such private practice as they can gather to themselves.

If the practice of the past in Ireland led to abuses, which abuses were difficult to overcome because of the strength in the councils of the State of that profession, I think it is very necessary that we should, at the initiation of this business, guard against those evils, so that our successors may not have to undo, at a very much greater cost than would be necessary to-day, the evils of duplicate employment and the taking of salaries as officers, fees as legal representatives in State cases, and private fees for private practice. I would stress upon the Dáil the necessity for defining the position, in the financial sense, of the Attorney-General, and I withdraw what I said in introducing this motion, that this was not an economy resolution. I find now it is very much an economy motion, that it may, and very likely will, save the State a considerable amount of money. On that ground, if on no other, I press the amendment.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I think the argument which Deputy Johnson has brought forward here is very strong indeed, and I am perfectly convinced that the principle is sound. When I first saw this amendment a parallel occurred to my mind exactly in that form, but in a precise instance which I would like to mention. Deputy Redmond, with whom I am unable to agree in this matter, said that the Attorney-General's position was a political one, correctly inferring that it had all the precariousness of a political position.

Let us compare it precisely with the position of the President of the Executive Council. I compare it in this way because we know from the Estimates that the remuneration attaching to the two positions is the same. Suppose a lawyer enters upon a political career and rises by the esteem of his fellow-countrymen to the position of President of the Executive Council, is he to be allowed, while holding that position, and receiving remuneration as President of the Executive Council, to engage in private practice? Is he to be allowed to receive the incidental remuneration that would come to him from that private practice? It should not be tolerated for a moment. Let us assume that the same lawyer becomes Attorney-General, which is also a political appointment. There is nothing fundamentally different between the two. The qualifications may be different, but the qualifications may in the given instance not be greatly different. There have been cases in England where very eminent counsel have chosen rather the more strictly political appointments than the semi-political, semi-legal appointments. If it be a sound principle that a lawyer, raised to the position of President of the Executive Council, is not to be permitted to take any other moneys than those he receives from that office, and if a commercial man who holds certain directorships, on appointment to the same office, has to surrender them—if that principle is sound for one political appointment it should be sound for all. It cannot be said that the position of Attorney-General is more precarious and more political than is the position of President of the Executive Council. In point of fact, it carries greater advantages for the future, as Deputy Johnson has pointed out, because whereas a person filling the position of President has to make a definite, clear surrender of continuity with the past and has to make a new start for the future, all the time the Attorney-General is carrying on his legal continuity. Therefore, when the precarious nature of his position enforces itself by the surrender of his office he stands in a much better position in respect of his future career than he stood in the past. Deputy Redmond knows the scandal created across the water owing to the large moneys received by law officers of the Government that are not received by purely political officers of the Government. Seeing that both are political in character they should be judged the same. It would be better for the present and for the future if this principle were accepted.

Captain REDMOND: I would like to say a word to correct a misapprehension apparently in the mind of Deputy Johnson. When I was referring to trades unions, I was referring to the first paragraph of his amendment, which was that the Attorney-General should be paid. I never in any way suggested that trades union principles applied to the rest of my proposals. In regard to the statement that has been made by Deputy Figgis about the large sums of money which are being paid to Attorneys-General across the water—and I think he might have mentioned here in the past—so far as I understand the present arrangement between the Attorney-General and the Minister for Finance will obviate the possibility of that taking place, because it appears from the Attorney-General's statement that he is not to be paid fees for appearance in Court but rather that the sum fixed is to be a sort of compounded sum which shall include anything in the nature of what otherwise would be paid in fees. That being so, I think that is a very desirable arrangement in the interests of economy. I can congratulate the Minister for Finance and the Attorney-General on its introduction. I must say that I failed to follow Deputy Figgis when he stated that the President of the Executive Council, or a person in his position, say a Prime Minister of England, would not be enabled to hold directorships of companies or to have any interests outside his salary. I never heard such a suggestion made before. It certainly is a well-known principle, which I am afraid has sometimes, or may have sometimes, been infringed upon in England, that no Government Minister should have any interest in a company which would contract directly with the Government, but to say that a Prime Minister, or any other Minister, should derive his income from no source but his salary as occupant of that office is, I think, stretching the matter rather far. Therefore, I cannot see, to use Deputy Figgis's analogy, why if the President is not confined to the enjoyment of his salary, but is allowed to pursue his own private business affairs in his own way the Attorney-General should not be treated in the same way. The proposal, so far as I know, is that the Attorney-General should be paid a fixed sum. The Attorney-General stated, in reply to a question I asked some time ago, that the sum in this regard was £2,500 per annum. Taking that as inclusive of fees and salary, it is, I think, an exceptionally moderate figure. It certainly would pay this Attorney-General in the circumstances to take even a Judgeship in the Irish Free State, with the moderate salary that that carries. That being so, I suggest that the Minister for Finance and the Government have made an admirable proposal in regard to the position and to the payment of the office of Attorney-General.

Mr. JOHNSON: Perhaps the President, when he replies, would tell us what the financial proposal is affecting this office—not the present occupant of the office or the present circumstances. Deputy Redmond has spoken of certain proposals. I have not heard them.

Captain REDMOND: They were outlined by the Attorney-General.

Mr. JOHNSON: If I understood aright, the Attorney-General said there had been a certain arrangement made in respect of his occupancy of this office. But he also said that that was due to the exigencies of the times, and that there would be perhaps less call upon the attention of future Attorneys-General, suggesting to my mind, at any rate, that the arrangement that Deputy Redmond referred to is quite a provisional one, personal to the present Attorney-General, and by no means binding. I want to make a similar arrangement, plus the deprivation of the right to enter into private practice, for Attorneys-General in future.

The PRESIDENT: The arrangement that was made in connection with the salary of the present Attorney-General was £2,500 per year and no fees in respect of any appearances on behalf of the Government in Court. It appeared to us, at the time, that it was certainly a good bargain for the Government. I do not quite agree with the criticism that has been passed or with the subject matter of this amendment. This office, as is well known, is an office which sometimes has potentialities and at other times has no potentialities at all. Let us take the case of a Ministry with six months to run. They appoint an Attorney-General. He possibly ceases to hold office when a new Government is elected. He has not been provided with a Judgeship. There is no Judgeship vacant, or any other suitable office, and I do not think it would be a good principle to adopt that because a man was Attorney-General he naturally took any vacancy which might arise in the Judiciary. I do say that in so far as the present Attorney-General is concerned, I would have been most happy to have offered him the Presidency of the Supreme Court—the highest office in the State so far as the Judiciary is concerned. But, considering the matter with him, from the point of view of the State, I prevailed upon him to contest South Dublin and to come into the Dáil to give us that assistance here which we required. I am not at all disposed to say that while the salary of £2,500 is considerable that it is excessive, considering that we are taking a man out of his ordinary practice and placing him in a position in which there is no security of tenure and in which there is not, and ought not to be, that natural pilgrimage to the Bench which has been the practice in the past. To treat a man otherwise would hardly be treating him fairly if he be absolutely essential to the State and if the practice he has enjoyed—which would probably very nearly run to the figure we are going to pay him in this case—is thrown into chaos by taking up duty on behalf of the State. I do not think it is at all likely within the next few years that the Attorney-General will have any chance of having private practice. During the whole period of our experience, which very nearly runs into two years, there has not been any private practice on the part of the Attorney-General. There have been, I understand, arrears of work, which he has not yet been able to clear up. I do not know that it would have been humanly possible for him to have undertaken any private practice. I am not at all satisfied that there is any likelihood of his being able to take up any private practice in the future. It is possible that you might have an Attorney-General admirably suited for that particular office who might not be perhaps as equally suited to the Bench. One cannot regulate those vacancies on the Bench to synchronise with the exit of Governments from power.

I do not think it would be at all advisable that judicial appointment should be looked upon as the reversionary interest of Attorneys-General in the future. We have had experience in the past of rather rapid changes before Governments came into power or went out of power. I think that never really increased the confidence of the people in the Government of the State. My case for not having any prohibition on the Attorney-General having private practice is, that at a particular moment if we require the services of a particular Attorney-General, he should not have to cut himself off from his practice but should be free to take it up should he cease to occupy that office. The cases that have been mentioned of the large sums earned by Attorneys-General in England do not constitute a fair parallel at all. You have there ordered Government extending over a great number of years. You have a very large circle of aspirants for the office to draw from. Naturally about the office there are opportunities for business which are unlikely in a much smaller country like this. I do not expect that at any time now, or within ten years to come, any Attorney-General here could possibly earn more than £1,000 a year outside his salary.

It may seem too much that he should be allowed to earn even that much. But I have been very, very much impressed with the necessity for a particular type of person for this office. It is more than possible that with a change of Government the same attractions might not appear to another person occupying the same office, or another Executive Council functioning such as we have been functioning, and in that case I think that should the ordinary business of the Attorney-General's office get lighter during the next year or two or three years—and I have no such hope at present—it would be unfair that he should be precluded from getting some connection with the particular class of business which he had been accustomed to transact, before we took him out of it and persuaded him to take up this very thankless and very onerous and responsible position of Attorney-General.

Mr. JOHNSON: I would ask the Dáil to remember that we are not dealing in this Bill with the present occupant of this office. I do not know if I am to be accused of being an incorrigible idealist, but I have a high opinion of the average lawyer. I hold that the average lawyer is as likely to be a man willing to serve the State as the average merchant or shop-keeper or a man in any other occupation or profession. We have been rather insisting during the afternoon that Ministers had to give up certain chances in life, but that they were willing to do that to serve the State. They were willing to take risks of certain pecuniary advantage in the service of the State. But now we are told that you cannot get that kind of man amongst the legal profession.

I do not believe it. We were told that lawyers will not sacrifice their private practice though ship-owners or shop-keepers might, or though country solicitors might. We were told that lawyers will not accept a stated salary for the service of the State unless they see a chance of pickings. I do not believe it. I believe there are as many men amongst the legal profession quite willing to give their time to the service of the State for a fair reward as there are in other professions. I believe that it has been found bad in principle and practice that the Legal Adviser—the man who above all is most responsible for keeping the Executive from falling into legal pits—should have one purpose in his work and one interest, and that is advising rightly and not running the risk even of having conflicting interests placed before him. I say it is undoubtedly true there are conflicting interests coming before lawyers, between clients who may to-day or next year be in controversy with the State. The amendment, the new sub-section, which I propose, does not state what the salary should be. It does not even confine it to £2,500. It says "such salary as the President of the Executive Council, with the concurrence of the Minister for Finance, may determine." If £2,500 a year does not seem to these two Ministers to satisfy the requirements in any particular time, they may agree upon making it £5,000 or £10,000 or £20,000, and when that time comes when the office does not require so great an amount of time a sum quite within the limits of this amendment may be varied. The amendment does not fix the salary of the Attorney-General, but it does seek to stipulate that the Attorney-General shall not be placed in a position which is in truth an inferior position morally to that of any other Minister because we do trust all other Ministers to devote their whole time, interests and services to the office to which they are appointed. In the practice of the past and in the proposal of the Bill, we are assumed not to be able to trust the Attorney-General to devote the time and attention to the business of advising the State, unless he can at the same time be secured in getting such private practice as he can find. I hope the Dáil will accept this amendment and will express its views upon the desirability of leaving the Attorney-General free to take private practice which may be in conflict with his duty to the State or free to take such pickings as legal controversies might place in his way.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: There is only one comment I want to make. I would join in saying that in whatever I said I for one had nothing whatever personal in its application to the present occupancy of the Attorney-Generalship. I had hoped that would have been accepted as having gone without saying. Nor did I imagine for a moment that the large additions that [Mr. Darrell Figgis.] have been earned in England were ever likely to be earned in Ireland. I only referred to it because of the size of those earnings, and because of the kind of comment that they had created. I am perfectly sure that the President will agree—although he did not agree that the amendment is right—that it is desirable to avert that kind of comment if it can possibly be done. It is a comment that can only arise when there are additional earnings of the size that no one knows. I rose mainly to make one statement and it is that the parallel that I have drawn between the position of a Minister and that of the Attorney-General is a correct parallel so far as earnings are concerned.

I am puzzled to understand why Deputy Redmond, who knows those matters very well, should have some doubt about them. I will only refer to a comment made in the London Times, some two or three months ago. It was with regard to a recent Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was expected to be brought into the present English Government. The statement was made that if he undertook this post it would entail the surrender of the many lucrative Directorships that he held in the City of London, and therefore it would not be worth his while to do so. If it be sound that the Minister for Finance is compelled to surrender Directorships and additional remunerations of that responsible kind, then the same principle applies to the Attorney-General.

Captain REDMOND: I presume Deputy Figgis is referring to Mr. Reginald McKenna?

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Sir Robert Horne.

Captain REDMOND: In either instance it is, of course, only too obvious that neither of these gentlemen could occupy at the same time the position of Government Minister and also the great commercial position that he now holds. I should say, in the case of Mr. McKenna, that he is certainly drawing a larger salary now from his position as Chairman of one of the biggest, if not the biggest, banks in England, than he would draw if he were Prime Minister

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE at this stage resumed the Chair.

Captain REDMOND: There is no doubt it would be physically impossible and mentally impossible for any man to occupy the two positions. I do not think it is seriously suggested by that instance that the principle should apply that a Government Minister could not draw his income from any other source than that of his salary, or, indeed, that he could not engage in other classes of work but Ministerial work. He could not certainly engage in such a gigantic task, and one which would require such attention and such energy as well as ability as Chairman of one of England's greatest banking concerns, and at the same time be a Minister. That is very different from saying he could not do his own business, if

8 o'clock. he was a business man in an ordinary way. With all due respect to Deputy Figgis, I do not think that the instance he has quoted in any way increases the validity of his argument.

Mr. BLYTHE: The way this matter strikes me is simply that the Minister for Finance, and the President of the Executive Council for the time being, will from time to time be making arrangements with some man who is to occupy the position of Attorney-General. If it happens that the work of the Government is not sufficient to occupy a man all his time, and at the same time if the Government has to get, as it ought to, one of the best men at the Bar, it may be able to get him at a much less salary if he is allowed to carry on a private practice than if he were not allowed to do so. Nothing I have heard in the course of the debate has convinced me that there is any danger to the State in allowing the Attorney-General to take private practice. It does not seem to me that there is anything in the suggestion that he will be thinking of the feelings of some possible client. I do not think a barrister wins his way at the Bar by any other means than by fighting each case to the best of his ability, and getting a reputation for success in, and good management of, cases. Even if he were to get practice in future by doing his own work well and using his ability to win all the cases on behalf of the Government, rather than to lose them in the hope that he would soothe the feelings of some future client.

Mr. JOHNSON: Would the Minister for Justice, if he were a lawyer, as he very likely would be, be free to carry on a private practice?

Mr. BLYTHE: I do not think so, but I have not thought over that. I do not think there is likely to be any danger arising. If it is felt necessary that the Government should have the sole services of the Attorney-General in order to get straight advice from him and fair service, then I think the ordinary person who goes to law can have no chance whatever of getting any sort of reasonable service from the counsel they employ. It seems to me there is nothing in the suggestion that there would be danger of neglect or unfaithful service to the State because the Attorney-General would be allowed to take private practice.

I do think, on the other hand, the fact that he might be allowed to take private practice if we were arrived at a time when the Attorney-General would be likely to have sufficient leisure from Government work, that that would enable the Minister for Finance and the Government to drive a harder bargain in the matter of salary.

Mr. JOHNSON: May I remind the Minister and the Dáil—it has been quite frequently alluded to in the Courts and announced by judges—that counsel have made a practice, to an extent that is becoming a scandal, of accepting duties and not fulfilling them, and accepting payment for briefs and giving them practically no attention. It is possible, under the arrangement here, to perpetuate that practice.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: May I make a further intervention in this discussion, and I hope that in anything I have said or shall say about it it will be understood entirely that I am speaking as one of the Deputies of the city of Dublin and in no other capacity. It seems to me that the thing that is lost sight of in the first place in this discussion is this: that the Attorney-General must be a practising barrister during the time that he holds the office of Attorney-General. If he ceases to be a practising barrister then several consequences must follow. In the first place he would lose his right of audience in the Courts, and in the second place he would lose his status and standing at the Bar, so that he might have to come back in the new as if he never had been there. That may amuse Deputy Johnson, but it is a very serious consideration that his whole status and seniority is gone if he comes back owing to the fact that his Government has gone out of office or that he resigns because of a disagreement with them upon some important question.

Mr. JOHNSON: Is not his position this: that he has got one client and can still practice all the time.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: As this amendment stands he would be debarred from occupying the position of a practising member of the Bar and he would cease to be able to appear and he would lose his entire position, and the result of his years of labour and so on, and he would have to commence all over again as though he had never been a member of the profession. It is, I admit, possible upon the form in which Deputy Johnson has put his amendment, to frame it differently and exclude private practice, and leave him still his status as a practising barrister. No man would take the position otherwise, and when it comes to excluding a man from private practice it involves a very serious sacrifice, and speaking as head of the profession I say—and I do not think the President meant to convey anything to the contrary—that there are in the profession, as there are in other professions and businesses and occupations, men ready to make sacrifices. I will not say whether the idealist is always the best lawyer—one may have different views upon that subject—but when it comes to the question of the exclusion of private practice it merely becomes a matter of the stipend that will attach to the office, and whether or not the occupant of it is to be allowed to conduct cases on behalf of the Government at ordinary fees and ordinary remuneration. It is possible to make the salary such a figure as will make it worth a man's while to sacrifice his private practice. There has been reference here to comments on fees. This reference was made by Deputy Figgis, but in that connection it must be remembered that the comments made on fees were comments on fees earned in Government cases, not in private practice. I never saw any comments anywhere on the income made at the English Bar by men who presumably because of their pre-eminent position, because they were scarce and had a scarcity value were able to extort big fees before they rendered the services they gave.

I have never seen any adverse comments upon that except by the people who could not afford the luxury of retaining them. The adverse comments have been made on the subject of earning fees in Government cases, and that at one time in Ireland was, as a matter of fact, carried to a very exorbitant extent. I remember we used to hear of one particular man many years ago who was so ingenious that he made £50,000 in one year. Under the present arrangement that cannot be done. The question of receiving fees for Government business is one, and the question of retaining private practice is another. The views expressed on these matters have been, in my judgment, very much confused and mixed up in the course of the discussion. I do not know that the position of one who has held office, and no longer holds it, is at all the enviable thing that Deputy Johnson suggests. I have seen ex-Law Officers, men who had gone out of practice under the old regime, come along and take up the position of a Law Officer, hoping that it would lead them to rather enviable positions, but fate belied them, and they returned to their practice. They can say that the position is not an enviable one at all. The man who has been in office is not the attractive proposition that Deputy Johnson suggests.

MR. JOHNSON: Was that a proof that he was a bad lawyer?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The thing to be remembered is that at the Bar, as in other things, and especially among leaders of the Bar, there are fashions. I know of one member of the Bar, now a very eminent Judge, who at the zenith of his practice at the Bar retained a very small position which brought him in about £20 a year. He was rather noted for his desire to accumulate money, but someone put it to him and asked him why he kept this small position which might have gone to some man who needed a small annual sum of that kind. He said that he lived from day to day and in real dread of going out of fashion. So that, in addition to merit, a Barrister sometimes succeeds because of his industry, and industry succeeds to a considerable extent. There is another element, and it is that I think uncertainty rather rests upon the man who has held office and no longer does so. However, the issue really here is first of all, as to the form in which Deputy Johnson's amendment stands. If it were inserted in the Bill no member of the Bar could accept office, and I myself could not continue to hold office. The other matter is a matter that is a rather delicate one for me to touch upon. It was dealt with by the President as to whether there should be a statutory prohibition on receiving private practice, rather than an arrangement made from time to time with the Minister for Finance measuring the stipend accordingly. It seems to me that the arrangement indicated by the Minister for Finance and the President is really the most workable and satisfactory. As things stand it is not possible to accept or to attend to private practice.

The PRESIDENT: I move to report Progress.

DAIL RESUMES.

Progress reported; Committee to sit again on Tuesday.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN THE FREE STATE.

The PRESIDENT: I move the adjournment of the Dáil until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CORISH: My desire in raising the question of unemployment and the application of the Act recently passed and its effects upon the workers of this country is not with the intention of asking the Government to revert to the dole system in its entirety. I never did agree with the dole system as such, but I do think that everyone will agree that the bona fide worker in this country is entitled to State protection when he meets with conditions over which he has no control, such as have existed in the last 5 or 6 years. Everyone will agree that there has been great trade depression in this country for the past 5 or 6 years, and I do not think the seriousness of the unemployment menace can be exaggerated. In the various trades in this country there were many men employed continuously since the Unemployment Insurance Act came into operation in 1912 up to, I suppose, 1920. The majority of skilled workers, at any rate, during that period were continuously employed and had contributions for that eight years. About 1920 trade depression set in, with the result that a lot of these men who were anxious for work became unemployed and are at present unemployed. That is not their fault; it is their misfortune. Owing to the effect of the Act passed this year the majority of these men are out of benefit. Under this Act, unless a man has been practically continuously employed between May and October of this year, he is out of benefit. I think everybody will consider that this is a great hardship, and unless the Government are prepared to do something to help bona fide workers who are anxious to secure employment, and to relieve these unfortunate people and their families, I feel sure that you are going to have a situation created in this country that none of us desire. I am not making anything in the nature of a threat, but I do think that it will not be easy to control the unemployed people in this country.

Vol. 5.

From time to time we see statistics published which are supposed to emanate from the Ministry of Industry and Commerce, and which show a decrease in the figures of unemployment. Those figures are, so far as I know, entirely misleading.

Anyone who is not in touch with the situation will consider that these figures represent the number of unemployed in the Irish Free State. That is not so. These figures are based upon the number of people who are drawing unemployment benefit. The position so far as unemployment in this country is concerned is very little better than it was twelve months ago. According to the figures one would think that the number of unemployed is decreasing. Unfortunately that is not a fact. It is the application and the effects of the recently passed Unemployment Act which makes those figures appear so small. I think it is only right that the Government should give this matter serious consideration. During the progress of the Unemployment Act through the Dáil, I think Mr. Whelehan, who piloted it, stated specifically that he expected a revival of trade in or about the month of October. The inference I drew from that statement, and that Deputies on the Labour Benches drew, was that the Government expected, there would be such a revival of trade in October last, that there would be no necessity to pay benefit on such a scale as heretofore. Unfortunately that has not been realised and we are in the position of having as many unemployed, if not more in some centres, than we had then. I hope the Government will give the matter their serious attention. I know very well that the commitments of the Government in that direction are already very large. At the same time, I think, that the success of the State should not always be measured perhaps by finance, but rather by the moral and the health of the people.

I daresay that there are at least 400 people unemployed to-day in practically every town in the Free State—400 bread-winners. If you multiply that by four it amounts to 1,600. I am sure there are 50,000 people to-day in the Free State who are on the verge of starvation because of the serious menace of unemployment. I am sure every Deputy is alive to the situation, and it is up to them all, if they want the Free State to develop, as it should, to see that the health of the people is looked after, because you cannot have a healthy nation with so much unemployment in it, and this cannot be done if these people are not in a position to procure something, even if it is only the Dole, to provide food for themselves and their families.

The PRESIDENT: The raising of this matter at such short notice has taken me at a considerable disadvantage. I have been aware for several months past of the large number of unemployed in the State, and during the greater part of that period have been engaged with the Minister for Industry and Commerce in seeing how far it was possible, within the limited means at our disposal, to deal with it. We have had many conferences, sometimes with employers, sometimes with representatives of Labour, both unofficial. We have come to the conclusion that there is an earnest desire on the part of both to come to some sort of accommodation which might make it possible to benefit skilled and unskilled workers as far as is reasonably possible.

We have not yet completed our investigations, and I hope within a few days to be able to make a statement on the subject generally. I certainly am not in a position to make a pronouncement on it this evening. I should like to say, however, that, as far as the State is concerned, I am afraid that as regards Unemployment Insurance we have reached the limit of our resources. I think the Fund is in debt to something like £750,000, and I do not know that it was the intention of the framers, or of anybody, that a situation such as that should arise. I do not know whether the Deputy was aware of the fact that we have been considering this matter very closely for a long time past. Only this week I have had interviews with the two parties I have mentioned, but I am not in a position at present to make any statement further than to say that the Government is certainly alive to the necessity for the making of some special effort by all parties to effect a solution that will not place an undue strain on the resources of the State.

The Dáil adjourned at 8.40 p.m. till 12 o'clock, on Friday, December 7th.

CEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS.

ORAL ANSWERS.

“LYTTON ENTRANTS.”

Major COOPER asked the Minister for Finance whether his attention has been called to the class of civil servants known as “Lytton entrants,” whether he is aware that a Committee presided over by Lord Southborough has recommended an increase of emolument for “Lytton entrants” in Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and whether he can state whether it is proposed to act on the recommendations of this Committee where “Lytton entrants” in the Saorstát are concerned.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. Blythe): This matter is at present under consideration. I may remind the Deputy that the Southborough Committee was appointed by the British Government, subject to the change of Government, and any question of revising remuneration of Free State civil servants has to be decided by reference to Free State conditions.

Major COOPER: Is the Minister aware that this matter has been under consideration since July, and that many of these “Lytton entrants” propose to avail of the terms of the Treaty if a decision is not arrived at soon?

Mr. BLYTHE: The Deputy has informed me that they propose to do that.

Major COOPER: Will the Minister state why he did not answer the letter in which I informed him of that? He did not even acknowledge it.

Mr. BLYTHE: We are tired of the “Lytton entrants.”

CIVIL SERVANT'S ARREST AND DISMISSAL.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS asked the Minister for Finance if it is a fact that Mr. Richard A. Johnson, a permanent civil servant in the Principal Inspector of Taxes' Office, was arrested on February 22nd last, and not released until November 17th last, having been detained without trial or charge, although two days after his arrest he signed the necessary form of undertaking, producing as guarantors Professor Whelehan, then Assistant Minister for Industry and Commerce, and Rev. T. A. Finlay, S.J.; whether this gentleman was dismissed the service on November 9th, without any enquiry being held at which he, either himself or by solicitor or counsel, could be heard in his defence, and without even any opportunity of answering any questions that might be put to him, and if he will order an enquiry to be held into the facts of the case, of which this gentleman will receive due notification with a view to his being heard in his defence.

Mr. BLYTHE: The Military authorities report that for some time prior to his arrest, Mr. Johnson was believed to be supporting the Irregulars, and was therefore under military observation. His arrest followed an attack made by the Irregulars on Jury's Hotel in February last, when the Military authorities, in the course of their observations, found two fully-loaded revolvers in the room in which he was working. In the circumstances the Government was satisfied he had not carried out his declaration of fidelity as a civil servant and dismissed him. I am not prepared to re-open the question of his dismissal.

WOUNDED CLAREMAN'S CLAIM.

PADRAIG O HOgain (An Clár) asked the Minister for Finance whether any award has yet been made in the case of Michael Crotty, The Square, Kilrush, who was wounded whilst attending a Republican Court at Cragganock, Cree, Co. Clare, on December 12th, 1920, and whether, considering the exceptional circumstances of the applicant, he will expedite the payment.

Mr. BLYTHE: The investigation of this case has not yet been completed and no award has been made. All claims for compensation in respect of personal injuries are being dealt with as expeditiously as possible and there will be no avoidable delay in disposing of the claim.

ECHO OF BELFAST BOYCOTT.

PADRAIG O HOGAIN (An Clár) asked the Minister for Finance whether he is aware that on the withdrawal of the ban on Belfast goods subsequent to the signing of the Treaty many merchants ordered goods from Belfast firms, that on the re-imposition of the boycott these merchants were visited by members of the local Boycott Committees acting on the instructions of the Central Boycott Committee and received cheques to the value of the goods as per invoice, and that receipts are held for such payments, that demands are now being made for the payment of the goods by the firms in the areas then boycotted, and whether compensation will be made to the merchants now called upon to pay a second time for these goods.

Mr. BLYTHE: On the facts as presented the aggrieved parties have no claim for compensation under the Damage to Property Compensation Act, which excludes cases where cash is taken.

DINGLE CLAIM FOR MALICIOUS INJURIES.

TADHG O MURCHADHA asked the Minister for Finance whether two fishermen named John and Michael Flaherty of John Street, Dingle, Co. Kerry, had their fishing boat maliciously damaged, and rendered useless on February 28th, 1921; whether they were awarded £500 compensation on 19th April, 1921, at Tralee, and in view of the fact that they are practically destitute, whether steps will be taken to expedite the settlement of their claim.

Mr. BLYTHE: No claim on behalf of the persons named has been received by the Compensation Section of the Ministry of Finance. If the Deputy will have particulars furnished the matter will be taken up immediately with a view to submission of the cases to the Compensation (Ireland) Commission.

TIPPERARY UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFIT CLAIMS.

Captain WM. A. REDMOND asked the Minister for Industry and Commerce whether he is aware that James Cummins, of Lower Valley, Fethard, Co. Tipperary, and several men from the same district signed the Unemployment Register at Clonmel early in October of this year, that they have reported themselves every Friday since at the Local Exchange at Clonmel, and that they can get no reply as to the decisions in their cases, and if he will expedite these decisions now long overdue.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. O'Higgins) replying for Minister for Industry and Commerce: James Cummins, of Lower Valley, Fethard, lodged a claim for benefit at Clonmel Branch Employment Office on 18th October, 1923. As a new Benefit Year had begun on the previous day, benefit could not be authorised until the accounts of insured contributors had been balanced, and this necessarily involved some delay in authorising claims generally. There appears, however, to have been additional delay in this particular case, in the transit of documents between the local office and Headquarters, into which the Minister is having enquiries made.

Benefit has now been authorised, and Mr. Cummins will receive payment during the current week.

CLAIMS FOR REFUND OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE CONTRIBUTIONS.

AODH O CULACHAIN asked the Minister for Industry and Commerce whether he is aware that Mr. Patrick Sweeney, Carpenter, of Brownstown, Curragh Camp, Unemployment Card No. 117878, has over 500 payments to his credit as Unemployment Insurance, and has received only one day's benefit, viz., 1s. 2d., since 1912; whether this man is entitled to a refund of his contributions, plus 2½ per cent. compound interest, on attaining the age of 60 years; and, further, as he applied for this refund on the 7th September, 1923, and supplied all necessary information, including birth certificate, whether, if Sweeney is entitled to a refund, instructions will be given to have payment made forthwith.

Mr. O'HIGGINS (for Minister for Industry and Commerce): In considering Mr. Sweeney's application for a refund it was necessary to trace and post up his Unemployment Book for 1922-23, to examine into discrepancies between the statement of his age on his original application for an Unemployment book and on his birth certificate, respectively, as well as discrepancies between the spelling of his name on his birth certificate, and as he is himself accustomed to sign it. This examination has been completed, and shows that Mr. Sweeney has in fact only 490 contributions to his credit, and is therefore ten short of the minimum number of 500 required in the case of a person entering insurance under the age of 55 years.

DAMAGE TO ENNIS BUILDING.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether he is aware that the building known as the Ordnance Office, Ennis, on being vacated by the forces of the Provisional Government has been forcibly taken possession of by a number of indigent families; whether his attention has been drawn to the depredations committed by those persons on the internal structure—even using oak doors as firewood—and in view of the value of this mansion to the State whether he will indicate the measures to be taken for its preservation.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. P. Hogan): This question should be addressed to the Minister for Defence, and I am answering it for him.

The arrangement by which civilian tenants were put into occupation of the Ordnance House, Ennis, was made by the officer in charge of the military in the area, with a representative of the Urban District Council, and was necessary for the protection of the premises at a time when every building evacuated by troops in that area was destroyed. The premises are not the property of the State. The matter is being investigated and it is hoped a settlement will shortly be reached.

SEIZURE OF CATTLE.

EAMON O DUBHGHAILL asked the Minister for Defence if he is aware that on the 24th July last Military visited the farm at Kilmaglush, Fenagh, Co. Carlow, and took therefrom a number of cattle, horses, etc., including a cow, heifer and horse, the property of Edward Butler, Ballaghmore, Co. Carlow; whether he is aware that this man's stock happened to be there by accident and whether, seeing that Butler is only an agricultural labourer, he will undertake to consider this as an exceptional case with a view to compensation.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: This question should have been addressed to the Minister for Home Affairs.

The facts in regard to this seizure are as stated. My information in regard to the nature of the trespass is that it was not accidental. Cattle belonging to the owner of this farm were driven off the lands in 1921 and 1922, and illegal trespass was then persisted in up to the time of the seizure. I cannot undertake at present to make any ex gratia grant by way of compensation.

RETAIL PURCHASES BY MILITARY.

Mr. P. J. EGAN asked the Minister for Defence whether he considers that when the Army purchases supplies without opening an account, they are entitled to preferential prices; and, whether in view of the numerous complaints that have been made by motor agents throughout the country, he will have directions issued that ordinary retail purchases on the part of the Army are to be paid for at ordinary retail prices?

Mr. HOGAN (for Minister for Defence): Purchases by the State are ordinarily made under the system of competitive tender. In emergencies, such as have existed, that system had necessarily to be departed from and purchases had to be made direct. In such cases the prices to be paid are carefully assessed on rates prevailing for similar goods at the time in the area, due regard being paid to the interests both of the State and the trader. In the circumstances no directions of the nature referred to in the second part of the question can be given.

CLAIMS BY RIVER SLANEY USERS AGAINST MILITARY.

RISTEARD MAC FHEORAIS asked the Minister for Defence if he is yet in a position to deal with the claims of the owners of barges and fishing boats on the River Slaney, whose means of livelihood were seriously interfered with by National Troops during last year's hostilities.

Mr. HOGAN (for Minister for Defence): It is regretted that no decision has yet been arrived at in respect of the claims in question. The matter is at the moment in hands, and it is hoped to bring it to a conclusion at an early date.

CORK HARBOUR BOARD MILITARY ACCOUNT.

MICHEAL O HAONGHUSA asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that the General Manager and Solicitor, Cork Harbour Board, have repeatedly applied to the Military Pay Department for payment of £307 9s. 7d. due to the Harbour Board by the Military Authorities for pilotage services rendered during the period July, 1922, to July, 1923, inclusive, and whether he will investigate and have the account disbursed at an early date.

Mr. HOGAN (for Minister for Defence): The account of the Cork Harbour Commissioners will be settled in the near future.

DISCHARGED SOLDIERS' UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFIT.

Captain REDMOND asked the Minister for Defence whether it is a fact that stoppage of 1s. 1d. per week was made out of the pay of members of the Labour Corps, National Army, for Unemployment Insurance Benefit; whether applications have been made by discharged members of this Corps for Unemployment Benefit; whether these applications have been refused on the ground that their cards have not been sufficiently stamped, and if he will see that these men will suffer no disadvantage by reason of the failure of someone in authority to stamp their cards?

Mr. HOGAN (for Minister for Defence): Deductions were made from the pay of certain members of the late Railway Protection, Repair and Maintenance Corps for the purpose of paying Unemployment Insurance contributions. A legal question has, however, arisen, and is now under consideration, as to the propriety of this course. If it is found that these contributions are not valid, the deductions will be refunded to the men concerned: if valid, the contributions will be duly credited and benefit paid where required.

Captain REDMOND: If they are not, will the men lose the benefit they would have derived if they had paid them themselves?

Mr. JOHNSON: I take it the assurances that were given that these men would be kept in benefit will be taken into account?

Mr HOGAN: I am not in a position to answer that question at the moment. I will convey what you say to the Minister for Defence.

OPERATIONS OF FISHERIES PATROL BOAT.

SEAN DE FAOITE asked the Minister for Fisheries what reports have been received of the operations of the Fisheries Patrol Boat on duty on the North Tirconail coastline between Loughs Foyle and Swilly from 3rd till 30th November; if any foreign trawlers have during that period been found illegally fishing, if proceedings will be instituted against them, and when.

MINISTER for FISHERIES (Mr. Lynch): During the period mentioned the coast between Loughs Foyle and Swilly was patrolled between the 15th and 20th November (inclusive) by the fishery cruiser "Muir Chu." The weather became very bad after the fishery cruiser reached the area, and very few steam trawlers were seen. None of them were detected in the act of fishing illegally.

I am informed that the area in question was patrolled by one of the vessels of the Ministry of Defence from the 1st to the 15th November, and again from the 20th to the end of that month. No foreign or other trawlers were observed fishing illegally.

Mr. WHITE: Arising out of that question I would like to ask the Minister was it by daylight or was it at night that the patrol vessel went through the area? Was it in daylight or at night that the patrol vessel discharged her duties?

Mr. LYNCH: If it were there from the 15th to the 20th November, and again from the 1st to the 15th, it was there presumably day and night.

Major COOPER: Is the Minister aware that the fact that prosecutions are seldom entered into in these cases is causing grave anxiety to the fishermen all round the coast?

Mr. LYNCH: There are a great many prosecutions pending at the moment, as a matter of fact.

Major COOPER: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. WHITE: Will the Minister insist that the patrol boat will discharge her duties at night, not during daytime, as it is at night that these trawlers are illegally fishing?

Mr. LYNCH: I am satisfied that the patrol boat that is at the moment actually under my orders does discharge its duties in the way the Deputy requests.

Mr. WHITE: My information from local fishermen is that the patrol boat went round during the daytime.

INSPECTION OF WEIGHING MACHINES.

Major BRYAN COOPER asked the Postmaster-General whether his attention has been called to a report of the Markets Committee of the Dublin Corporation, in which it is stated that the weighing machines used in Post Offices are not subject to supervision by an Inspector of Weights and Measures and that the majority of those employed in the Saorstát are of an obsolete pattern, which would not be stamped for ordinary commercial purposes, and whether he can state what steps are taken to inspect these weighing machines and ensure their accuracy.

POSTMASTER - GENERAL (Mr. Walsh): Inspectors of Weights and Measures are not empowered to stamp, verify or test any weights or scales supplied by the Post Office to be used for Post Office purposes. All such scales and weights are carefully examined and tested before being issued to Post Offices; subsequently they are tested regularly by the Department and any inaccuracy found is rectified immediately.

WIRELESS BROADCASTING.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS asked the Postmaster-General if, pursuant to the promise given by the President that the sanction of the Oireachtas would be obtained before any licence would be given for Wireless and Broadcasting, he will set aside an early date for the discussion of the memorandum entitled "Wireless Broadcasting" just circulated to Deputies.

Mr. WALSH: I may say as a preliminary to this answer, being responsible to the Dáil alone, any innovation or departure regarding the services under my control must, in the ordinary course of events, be circulated to the Dáil. Therefore the implication in this question is not justified. The Deputy is at liberty to raise the matter on the adjournment, or, failing that, to give notice of motion.

TRANSPORT FACILITIES IN CORK.

Mr. THOMAS O'MAHONY asked the Postmaster-General whether, with a view to opening up the district between Fermoy and Cork via Watergrasshill and via Glenville, an area which has no railway service, he is prepared to entertain and discuss a local proposal which will give a daily passenger, parcel, and postal service, at little increased cost on the existing arrangements, which provide only postal facilities of much less convenience to the public than the scheme suggested will supply.

Mr. WALSH: I have recently received from the Deputy an outline of the scheme he advocates, and I am having it carefully examined, and will communicate with him further on the subject as soon as practicable.

CLARE ASSISTANT COUNTY SURVEYORS.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN asked the Minister for Local Government if his attention had been drawn to the proposals of the Clare County Council granting large increases of salary to Assistant County Surveyors on the eve of a sworn inquiry into the County administration, and to ask whether these advances were regular and would be sanctioned by his Department.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. Burke): The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative.

As regards the second and third parts the question of the regularity of the proceedings is being inquired into, and the case will be fully considered before sanction is given or withheld.

TIRCONAILL MENTAL HOSPITAL.

SEAN de FAOITE asked the Minister for Local Government up to what date the books of the Tirconail (Letterkenny) Mental Hospital have been audited, and what was the nature of the business transacted at a Special Meeting of the Committee, convened by the Ministry of Local Government on the 21st ultimo, as reported in "Derry Journal" of 23rd ultimo.

Mr. BURKE: The accounts of Tirconail Mental Hospital have been audited, so far as possible, up to 31st March, 1923, but as several of the books had not been written up when the Auditor attended, the accounts could not be certified correct. Steps have been taken to ensure that the clerical work of the Mental Hospital shall be properly and punctually carried out in future.

The Special Meeting of the Committee of Management, held on 21st November last, met to consider a Report of the Inspector of Lunatic Asylums on an inquiry into the administration of the institution, together with a covering letter from the Ministry of Local Government.

Mr. WHITE: Will the Minister consider the necessity of appointing a committee of independent ratepayers, as a Committee of Investigation, to investigate the state of this institution?

Mr. BURKE: I will take that matter into consideration.

Mr. WHITE: Would the Minister, in the alternative, appoint a Commissioner to administer the institution?

Mr. BURKE: I have that whole matter under consideration. I have had several reports to that effect already.

REPAIR OF CO. CORK SCHOOLS.

MICHAEL O HAONGHUSA asked the Minister for Education whether he is aware that National Schools, Belvilly, near Cobh, Co. Cork, were occupied during the recent trouble by National Troops, and during such occupation windows, doors, and furniture were damaged; whether he will now have those schools repaired and furnished and opened to teachers and pupils at an early date.

Mr. LYNCH (replying for Minister for Education): It is understood that a claim for compensation in respect of damage done to the school-house was made by the manager; that a certain amount by way of compensation has been awarded; and that a draft for this amount is being forwarded to the manager. In the circumstances, it is expected that the manager of the schools will take the necessary steps to have the repairs effected.

WRITTEN ANSWERS.

COMMANDEERED CORK PREMISES.

TADHG O MURCHADHA asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether premises in Drimoleague, Co. Cork, owned by Mrs. Deane and occupied by a tenant named Denis O'Driscoll, were taken over forcibly by members of the Gárda Síochána on 23rd November; whether O'Driscoll and his wife, who is ill, were with their family confined to one small room in the house, and whether the business carried on by O'Driscoll in the shop was shut down; whether it is proposed to evacuate the premises, and, if not, whether it is proposed to compensate O'Driscoll?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: As a result of representations made to the Commissioner of the Gárda Síochána as to the urgent necessity for stationing a unit of the Gárda at Drimoleague, I requested the Commissioners of Public Works to acquire suitable accommodation for that purpose. In pursuance of the powers conferred by the Civic Guard (Acquisition of Premises) Act, 1923, the Commissioner having served the requisite notice, acquired a house belonging to Mrs. Deane, which was occupied by Mr. O'Driscoll, and to clear possession, of which the Gárda became entitled on the 11th ulto. On the 23rd ultimo, when the Guards arrived to take over the house, O'Driscoll was still in occupation, and refused to vacate on the plea that his wife was ill. The Guards were, accordingly, compelled to take forcible possession of the premises.

From reports which have been furnished to me I am satisfied that for all practical purposes O'Driscoll made no use of the shop for business purposes, and that if he so desired he could have obtained suitable accommodation elsewhere. I am further satisfied that his reluctance to vacate was the result of efforts which were made by certain parties to prevent the Gárda obtaining barracks in the town. I have been advised by the Commissioners of Public Works that no suitable alternative quarters are available for the Gárda, and as the necessity for a unit there is quite evident, the house in question will not be evacuated. The question of compensation is one for the Commissioners of Public Works, and in this connection I would refer the Deputy to the provision of Section 3 (1) of the Civic Guard (Acquisition of Premises) Act, 1923.

EX-SOLDIER METROPOLITAN POLICE PENSIONERS.

Major COOPER asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether pensioners in the Dublin Metropolitan Police who served in the British Army during the European War and were wounded, and are in receipt of disability pensions from the British Government, are liable to have their D.M.P. pensions reduced in the event of their disability pension being increased on account of greater ill-health, and whether, in view of the fact that these men when enlisting were assured that their Army service would count as police service for purposes of pension, they are not entitled to a fixed police pension irrespective of the amount of disability pension.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The statutory authority for the grant of a pension to a member of the Dublin Metropolitan Police who was disabled whilst employed on military service, expressly provides that the amount of pension, when added to the amount payable out of military funds, shall not in any case exceed the amount of pension which would have been granted had the disablement of the member concerned been occasioned by a non-accidental injury received by him in the execution of his duty, without his own default. In the majority of cases of partial disablement which have arisen under this Act, the total pension has been fixed at the maximum amount payable where the disablement is not total, and in any such case, therefore, where the disability pension is increased, the pension from the Police Vote must be reduced accordingly.

DETENTION OF ENNIS MEN.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN asked the Minister for Defence whether the continued detention of Messrs. Michael Keane, Kilamona, Ennis, and Patrick MacNamara, Barefield. Ennis. is contemplated?

MINISTER for DEFENCE (General Mulcahy): The release of Mr. Keane is being arranged. The detention of Mr. MacNamara is still considered necessary.

A WEXFORD ACCOUNT.

RISTEARD MAC FHEORAIS asked the Minister for Defence why the account of Messrs. John Sinnott & Sons, 29 South Main Street, Wexford, amounting to £120 8s. 3d., has not been paid?

General MULCAHY: It is regretted that the checking, which is necessary before this balance of account can be paid, has not yet been completed, but it is hoped the matter will shortly be settled.

DEDUCTION FROM LEIX MERCHANT'S ACCOUNT.

Mr. P. J. EGAN asked the Minister for Defence whether, in paying the account of Messrs. Mercier & Sons, Durrow, Leix, the Army 10 per cent. on the account was deducted; whether the Quartermaster-General has informed Messrs. Mercier that the deduction was made in accordance with the instructions received from the Army Finance Department; whether he is aware that the deduction is a purely arbitrary one, and whether he will explain on what basis it has been made?

General MULCAHY: The deductions made from Messrs. Mercier's accounts are for overcharges for hire of cars. The hire rates allowable have been fixed after careful consideration, and would appear to be reasonable.

CLAIM FOR MONEY ADVANCED.

Mr. P. J. EGAN asked the Minister for Defence if he is aware that a sum of £32, which was advanced by Mr. Ernest Mercier, of Durrow Mills, Leix, to Quartermaster Matthew Cavanagh, in July, 1922, for the purpose of paying the troops, still remains unpaid, and, if so, when it will be paid, and whether Mr. Mercier will be allowed interest from July, 1922, to date.

General MULCAHY: There has been some delay in dealing with this matter owing to the difficulty in getting into touch with the officer concerned. The investigation has now been completed and payment will be made in the next few days.

KILRUSH ARMY ACCOUNT.

PADRAIG O HOGAIN (An Clár) asked the Minister for Defence if he has received a claim from Mrs. Bridget Dunne, Moore Street, Kilrush, in respect of the billeting of National soldiers some time ago, and whether, in consideration of the circumstances of the applicant, he will expedite payment.

General MULCAHY: No claim has been received at Headquarters. Inquiries are being made locally, and the consideration of the claim will be expedited when it is received.

QUESTION ON THE ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GOREY: I beg to give notice that on the motion for the adjournment I will call attention to the question of the precautions taken to prevent Foot and Mouth disease entering this country, and as regards the enforcement of the regulations; and also the question of the treatment and detention of our live stock at the English ports.

FISHERIES BILL, 1923—FOURTH AND FIFTH STAGES.

Question: "That the Bill be received for final consideration" (Minister for Fisheries) put and agreed to.

Mr. FIONAN LYNCH: I move that Standing Orders be suspended to enable the fifth stage to be taken.

Agreed.

Question: "That the Bill do now pass," put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be sent to Seanad.

COURTS OF JUSTICE BILL, 1923— FIFTH STAGE.

Order discharged. Fifth Stage fixed for Tuesday, 11th December.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS BILL, 1923—SECOND STAGE.

Order discharged. Second Stage to be resumed by agreement on Tuesday, 11th December.

FOOT AND MOUTH DISEASE— QUESTION ON ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GOREY: I desire to raise this question as to the precautions taken to prevent foot and mouth disease entering this country, and also as to the enforcement of the regulations, and further as to the treatment and detention of our live stock at the ports now open in England.

The precautions taken at the open ports in England during the last three or four weeks in connection with the spread of foot and mouth disease in that country were of such an unsatisfactory nature that we sent over a man from Cork to see things for himself on the spot. This gentleman made a report, a copy of which I showed to the Minister for Agriculture. The report goes to show that things are done in a very slipshod manner at the ports of Fishguard and at Birkenhead. I will deal first with the treatment of our live stock at these ports on the other side. The report that we have received goes to show that pigs have been well cared for and have been well fed and well looked after. Sheep have been very badly treated, and cattle have been starved. They get almost nothing at all to eat. The facts are that 800 cattle were sent over to the other side, and though they had been travelling for a considerable number of hours, all they got to eat on arrival was the small quantity of 39 cwt. of hay. These cattle had done a long journey across the country and had been several hours on steamers and on trains, and yet all they were given to eat on arrival was this very small quantity of fodder, consisting of 39 cwt. of hay. Anyone who knows anything about the cattle trade knows that there would be very little for each of the 800 cattle out of such a small supply of fodder. I might say also that the cattle dealers sought to enter the lairages to see how the cattle were treated, but they were refused admission, while at the same time the English drovers had free access into and out of the lairages.

As far as could be observed, there was no system of disinfecting these drovers before they went into the lairages or when they came out. This question of food for the cattle, as well as proper care for them, has naturally a very serious effect on their value. No one in the cattle trade needs to be told that. As to the precautions taken, I understand that the system in Birkenhead is very bad, indeed so bad that there is no system there at all. The precautions are not put in force as they should be, and the wonder is that England at the moment is not reeking with foot and mouth disease from one end of it to the other. Creosote, I understand, is provided in a small box at Woodside, where those having access to the lairages are supposed to avail of it as a disinfectant. They are supposed to walk in and stand on the creosote which is kept in a little box, but, according to the report that we have received, the men concerned only put one foot in the box and keep the other outside, and then show to the Inspectors the boot that has been put in the creosote. If these statements are true, it is no wonder that England is in the position she is in to-day. I understand also that fumigation is only a farce. Things were very bad at the early stages, but I believe there has been a little improvement within the last three or four days, but at the same time the enforcement of the regulations is not anything like what it should be.

At our own port in Dun Laoghaire, I am afraid the precautions are not strict enough either. Men who have been over in England, and who have been through the cattle lairages, attempt to evade complying with the regulations, and this happens even with people engaged in the cattle trade. I suppose some of these young men think themselves too nice to go into the fumigating chamber, and some of them also, I suppose, do not want to soil their boots; but the fact is that they attempt to evade complying with the regulations. Men engaged in the cattle trade do that, and in my opinion their action is not creditable to them. If they were men of any national spirit they should, I think, be anxious to comply with the regulations, especially when it is remembered that their very livelihood depends upon the success of the cattle trade in this country. I was speaking to a young cattle dealer who had come from Birkenhead, and who had been through the cattle lairages. He told me he was asked to go into the fumigating chamber at this side. He went in, but with his travelling clothes and boots on. The clothes he had worn in the cattle lairages in England were in his bag. I have that from the man himself, and I think it is not at all creditable to men like him and to others who are engaged in the cattle trade in this country. It is a miracle that we have not foot and mouth disease in this country, a miracle, I say, that we ought to be very thankful for. There were several other points that I wished to refer to, but as I was not aware that this question would be taken up so early in the day I have nothing more to say, except to call attention to the urgency of having the regulations as regards foot and mouth disease at the open ports in England strictly enforced, and also to see that our cattle are well treated and well cared for when they arrive at these ports.

Mr. WILSON: I desire to support what has been said by Deputy Gorey. I would like the Dáil to understand the exact position with regard to the cattle trade. Deputies heard the other day from the Minister for Agriculture that if cattle are found infected at a landing place, a kind of "No man's land," between England and Ireland, the owners of the cattle are not to be compensated either by the Free State Government or the Government of Great Britain. You heard a statement from Deputy Gorey as to the lack of supervision as regards the disinfecting arrangements at the other side, or rather the failure to carry out the regulations by the authorities in Great Britain. I do not think it is a fair business for men who invest their money in the cattle trade and bring their cattle over to England to this "No man's land" after getting a sound bill of health at the port of export in Ireland, that through the action, or want of action, of the authorities in Great Britain these cattle should become infected with the disease. The cattle were quite healthy and free of the disease leaving Ireland, but because of the lack of the enforcement of the regulations in England they contracted the disease, and as a result had to be slaughtered. The serious position for the cattle dealers is that in these circumstances no compensation is to be paid to them by the Free State Government or by the British Government. The Minister for Agriculture, the other day, told us that these men should cover their risks by insurance. I made inquiries into that matter since then, and I have learned that the insurance rates are so high as to be altogether prohibitive. The only remedy that I see is to have the regulations strictly enforced, and to see that cattle which leave Ireland with a clean bill of health will not become infected in these lairages at the other side. The regulations should be tightened up and every precaution taken to stamp out the source of infection. Otherwise it will be a miracle if this country escapes an outbreak of the foot-and-mouth disease.

Mr. JOHNSON: I would like also to say a word with a view to pointing one of the morals issuing from this discussion. I think the Minister for Agriculture himself, on a previous occasion, drew attention to the fact that we had by deliberation, or as a result of deliberation, chosen to become independent of the British authority, and, of course, we have to abide by the consequences. I take it that nine-tenths of the people are willing to abide by the consequences and to derive the advantages. I suggest it is not well to raise matters here in a manner which would suggest that the responsibility for foot-and-mouth disease in England, or the care of cattle in England, is the responsibility of the Irish Minister for Agriculture. We cannot, from this Chamber, hector, with dignity to ourselves, the British Minister for Agriculture, or any other Department responsible for the administration of affairs in Britain. My chief reason for interposing is rather to suggest that we shall have, in this case, as in many others, to look for some alternative market for the disposal of our goods. In the case of cattle as large a proportion as possible should be killed and dealt with in this country, and exported as dead meat and not as live meat. I realise quite well that this cannot, by any possibility, cover the whole of the cattle trade, but at least it would minimise the loss which the cattle traders and breeders are subject to, and I suggest that this is not a cattle dealer's question.

Mr. GOREY: On a point of personal explanation, I have not said it was a cattle dealer's question nor have I attempted to lecture the English Board of Agriculture. My object was to try and draw attention to the want in not having the regulations enforced.

Mr. JOHNSON: I did not suggest, nor do I want to suggest, that Deputy Gorey was speaking as a representative of the cattle dealers. But I am afraid there is an inclination to think of it rather as a cattle dealer's question. I wonder whether this is not a matter which should be dealt with by the Minister for External Affairs. It is very serious, no doubt, and I believe that we will be obliged—I would hope that the continuance of disease in England will make us all realise that we shall be obliged—to encourage, to the utmost, the dead meat trade in the country. I hope that steps will be taken to avail of the opportunity that is now offered, and to get possession of and to put into operation, the factory at Drogheda.

Mr. PETER HUGHES: This is one of the vital questions we have to consider in this country and what I would like to emphasise is the necessity for seeing that the disease is not carried into the Free State. That is the matter to which we should devote all our attention. I am informed, whether rightly or wrongly, that there is a lot of litter used in packing various articles coming into this country, some of which is fed to cattle and sent to the various ports of the country. There is danger that in this way we might introduce the disease into the country and this would involve the loss of a very considerable amount of money. The Ministry of Agriculture should turn their attention to this and see that no packing that comes into this country is used for fodder, but that any such packing as is allowed to come to the ports is destroyed. I think that is one of the best means that could be taken to safeguard the country in respect of this important question.

As regards the treatment of cattle at the other side of the water, I think that the person who is at the head of that branch in Dublin should be able to make arrangements between his Department and the English Department. The cattle industry, as we all know, is a vital industry in this country, and if the suggestion of Deputy Johnson were taken up earnestly and if the larger number of the cattle fit to be killed were got ready for that purpose they could be exported as dead meat instead of sending them alive to the other side. That would be a great advantage and the industries of the country would benefit very greatly in the use of by-products resulting from such a system. I merely wish to suggest to the Ministry the very great importance of having fodder coming from England in packing cases destroyed at the port of entry.

Mr. MICHAEL DOYLE: I think great necessity for supervision lies at this side. If the people in England, who are acting in such a slipshod fashion, are not coming across here, there is not much danger of their infecting this country with the disease. But I think every precaution should be taken at our ports, where the people engaged in the cattle trade are crossing to and fro, and there should be every facility that is possible for the disinfection of the clothes of such people crossing over to the English markets and coming back again. I understand that at Rosslare the facilities for this sort of disinfection are not at all adequate. They have some man engaged doing this business who some time ago was a railway worker. I presume he is not the Shipping Inspector but I am informed—and I live adjacent to where this port is—that the fumigation carried out is an actual farce. Another thing I suggest to the Ministry—in this I support Deputy Johnson—is to try to establish the dead meat industry.

I am glad to say we have it on a small scale in Wexford, and but for it, during the crisis of the past two or three months a great many people would have fared much worse than they did. At a recent meeting of the Agricultural Commission the suggestion was made that an effort should be made to try and re-open the meat packing industry at Drogheda. The majority of the members of the Commission believe that the Ministry would be well advised not to let that industry fall through, or get into the clutches of a foreign syndicate, or people who, perhaps, would be able to rig the markets. That industry should, if possible, be retained for the Irish people. There is no better protection against foot-and-mouth disease than to establish a dead meat trade. Apart from stores, with which the owner is not so much hampered, the dead meat trade would be a great advantage for dealing with fat cattle. With a dead meat trade owners would not be compelled to keep cattle for months, being unable to get rid of them for want of an outlet to the markets. When the trade is held up the beneficial effects of a dead meat trade, such as we have in Wexford, is realised. I would impress on the Minister, and on his officials, the importance of seeing that people engaged in the trade are disinfected after every journey they make across the Channel.

Mr. BAXTER: I want to add a few remarks on this question. We raised it as it is a very important one for the country. We know that in England up to one or two weeks ago not a beast could be moved from one part of the country to another. We do not want that position in this country. We do not want to be in the position that we could not drive cattle from their sheds for a drink. Because of the laxity of the regulations in England, there is a great danger that foot-and-mouth disease will come into this country. It is a marvel that it has not come already, seeing that the conditions are such as they are across the Channel. I agree that our Minister for Agriculture can, perhaps, do very little to have regulations imposed across the Channel, but he can, at least, see that those engaged in the cattle trade, between this country and England, will submit to regulations on coming back which will ensure that Irish interests are being protected. It seems to me that a register should be kept of cattle dealers who cross to this country from England, and it should be a penal offence for any man engaged in the trade who did not comply with whatever regulations are fixed so that disinfection may be thoroughly carried out.

Mr. WHITE: On the last occasion that this question was discussed in the Dáil I made a suggestion to the Minister for Agriculture that a veterinary inspector should accompany large consignments of cattle to the different landing places with a view to seeing that the British authorities carried out the legal requirements. The Minister did not exactly turn that suggestion down, but stated it was a question of expense. The cattle trade is one of the principal industries in the country, and in such a question the expense of a veterinary inspector to accompany consignments to the different landing places would, I consider, be well-spent money. I was recently informed in the North of Ireland by a prominent cattle dealer that this disease had been introduced into England by the Canadian cattle, but that the fact was cloaked and concealed. Whether there is any truth in that statement or not I do not know. I make the statement as it was told to me, and I am prepared to give the name of the cattle dealer who supplied the information. I would put it to the Minister for his consideration, that he should send a veterinary inspector to the cross-Channel ports with every large consignment of cattle to see that the English authorities carry out the regulations.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. Hogan): I agree that we should concentrate on taking precautions on this side rather than on the arrangements made by the English Ministry of Agriculture on the other side. I also agree with Deputy Johnson that we cannot afford to hector the English Minister for Agriculture, and I do not think Deputy Gorey intended to hector him. I will admit, in view of the fact that quarantine stations at the ports in England are a sort of no man's land that we here have certain obligations to see that satisfactory arrangements are made in regard to these quarantine stations. We would be entitled through the Minister for External Affairs, with whom I have discussed this matter, to make the necessary representations to the English Government, as a friendly Government, if we considered their arrangements might be improved, and if we had any suggestions to make. We have done so. While Deputy Gorey and Deputy Baxter agreed that we should concentrate on precautions, Deputy White is perfectly convinced that there is no objection to sending over a veterinary inspector with each consignment of cattle to the landing places, at Birkenhead, Glasgow, Mercklands, and Ayr, etc. The inspectors are to get off at the landing places with each consignment, walk up to the veterinary surgeon who is at each place, and see that precautions are carried out, and probably say to him that he knows very little about his job. I want to point out that that policy is absolutely opposed to the policy suggested by Deputy Gorey, Deputy Baxter and Deputy Hughes. It is not such a simple matter as one thinks, and there is no use closing our eyes to the difficulties. I dare say we could make arrangements with the English Government so that our veterinary inspector could be constantly on the other side inspecting their arrangements and quarantine stations. I would agree with Deputy White that mere considerations of expense should not stop us and have not stopped us. It would be very false economy to save a penny and lose many pounds in such a big question as this. But is it good business to take up the attitude, that we must be perfectly satisfied with the arrangements made by the English Ministry of Agriculture?

Deputy White will remember that one case of foot and mouth disease occurred about a month ago amongst Irish cattle, under circumstances which made it possible that the infection had taken place in Ireland. In accordance with their usual custom the English Ministry immediately closed the ports until the origin of these cattle was discovered. They asked us to trace the origin. They did not immediately send over their veterinary inspectors to go through the whole of Ireland to see if there was foot and mouth disease in Ireland. They asked us to do so. We succeeded in doing so in four days. They took our word and certificates and opened the ports. The closing of the ports for two days means probably a loss of thousands of pounds, but if they were closed for some weeks it would mean hundreds of thousands of pounds. Is it worth while running the risk of having our ports closed for weeks longer than they should be? That is what would happen if the English Ministry took up the attitude that their veterinary inspectors would have to be satisfied that we had a clean bill of health here. The Farmers' Party are more interested in this than I am. They have probably more cattle per head than I have. I will put the onus on the Farmers' Union of considering whether it would be good business for us to say to the English Inspectors and to the English Ministry of Agriculture, "We are not satisfied with your arrangements and you will have to let us inspect your arrangements at the landing places." If the farmers ask me, and say that they are willing to do that and are willing to run the risk of the English Minister for Agriculture saying: "Very well, we will not take your certificates on this side," they have only to say so and I will do it. There is no use in Deputy White or other Deputies taking up the attitude and saying: "I am a business man, and I will do this thing very quickly and see that things are done right, but we have got to persuade the Minister for Agriculture, who knows nothing about the trade and that is the trouble." If Deputy White, as a responsible farmer, thinks that we can afford to ask the English Minister for Agriculture to let us inspect his arrangements, and that the Farmers' Party are willing to run the risk of the English Minister for Agriculture retaliating and saying: "Very well, we will inspect yours," all he has to do is to let me know and I am sure there will be no difficulty about making the arrangements. It is not expenses that have stopped us.

I am sure that the precautions taken on the other side during the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in regard to keeping landing-places absolutely free from infection could be improved upon, just as I know perfectly well that the arrangements on this side could be improved upon. I take it for granted that as foot-and-mouth disease has lasted in England for at least three months, as there have been thousands of cattle and hundreds of thousands of pounds lost, and the whole Ministry of Agriculture has been overworked in trying to cope with the outbreak, that there may have been laxity and looseness. But I ask Deputy Gorey not to take for granted or to take too literally the report which he has received, that English drovers from the neighbouring counties go amongst Irish cattle at the various landing-places without being properly disinfected. I dare say farmers in England are like farmers in Ireland, and drovers in England are like drovers here, and that some of them try to avoid the disinfecting process. But it is an extraordinary thing, notwithstanding that foot-and-mouth disease has been rife in England for three months, that only in a single case has the disease been carried into a landing place. That one case was in Merklands, in Glasgow. If the precautions were so absolutely loose and lax as the Deputy says, you can take it for granted, having regard to the fact that English drovers and officials are going in and out every day to everyone of the landing-places along the coast, that there would be more than one outbreak of disease. I am not satisfied that the precautions are so lax as is stated, but I would like to have a copy of the report referred to. I can find out in various ways exactly what the precautions are and how they are carried out in practice. There has been only one case of infection being carried to a landing-place for Irish cattle. I want to point out also that I have not received a single complaint from Irish dealers on the other side on the lines of the complaint that Deputy Gorey has made, although I have received a great many complaints on other matters. I ask the Deputy, therefore, not to take for granted all the statements that are made.

With regard to feeding on the other side, the English Ministry make arrangements for feeding, but they recover the cost from the owners. The Irish dealers, I am perfectly certain, can have their cattle fed with as much hay as they are willing to pay for. I know that on this side cattle are left in the lairages, at the North Wall and elsewhere, for a long time without being properly fed. I know the owners leave them in that way deliberately and that they are often in a poor condition before they are taken away. I am certain that when the disease was at its worst confusion was worse confounded at the ports in England, and that there were certain difficulties in getting cattle properly fed. On the other hand, dealers themselves were not entirely without fault, and I would suggest that some of them are not too anxious to spend money on feeding.

I agree that all the precautions necessary should be taken on this side. This debate is useful because it will re-advertise the whole position. But for the one precaution which I can take the farmers can take a hundred

1 o'clock. precautions that I can take are not of any use without the good-will and co-operation of the trade. We have, I think, taken every possible precaution. We have not got foot and mouth disease yet. I do not say that was because of our precautions, but it may be partly due to them. It is, perhaps, due more to good luck, as Deputy Gorey said. We have, I am satisfied, made as adequate arrangements as we could make for disinfection at the ports.

I have got complaints from cattle dealers recently with regard to the disinfection arrangements at Dun Laoghaire. I have inquired from the Chief Veterinary Inspector, who is in charge there, from the police constables who are on duty there, and the two men who are responsible for the actual disinfection of the dealers as they arrive, and I am unable to make up my mind as to who is to blame. I know that in the past dealers have made every effort to avoid disinfection. But at present they, I think, realise their responsibility in the matter and are more willing to submit to the process of disinfection. Although I have received numerous complaints as to the laxity, if you like, of certain officials of the Department at certain ports, I am not at all satisfied that the fault does not lie as much with the farmers and the cattle dealers. The two best men we have are at Dun Laoghaire and the best Veterinary Inspector we have is in charge there.

With regard to Rosslare, the man who is responsible there for taking the cattle dealers into the disinfecting chamber may be a railway man or anything else you like. There is no skill required in the matter. If a person is there long enough he will know the persons who land and that particular persons are cattle dealers and not commercial travellers. All he has got to do is to take persons in to be disinfecting. There is a Veterinary Inspector in charge at the port.

Mr. M. DOYLE: Not at the time the boat arrives, when cattle dealers are returning.

Mr. HOGAN: He may not be there always. It is not his duty to be there then.

Mr. DOYLE: I am not saying it is.

Mr. HOGAN: This is manual work and the fact that a man is a railway man does not make him any the less fitted to intercept cattle dealers and bring them to the disinfecting chamber. The only special knowledge required is that he should be able to distinguish cattle dealers as they arrive. The old Order which was in operation for some time was to the effect that every person connected with the cattle trade on landing on this side was guilty of an offence if he refused to submit to disinfection. We have changed that Order within the past week. We have now made it an offence—and I would like this to be well known—for any cattle dealer, farmer or drover, or anybody connected with the cattle trade on the other side, to leave a port without himself ensuring that he has been disinfected.

We propose to prosecute in any case we can get. That is the first precaution. With regard to packing, Deputy Hughes suggested that all packing should be burned at the ports. That would be impossible, I think. That would raise a tremendous opposition in trade, if we had to unpack everything at the ports and burn the straw and packing. I do not think it would be worth it. I think that if you go into the lists of cases of foot-and-mouth disease in Ireland for a period of, say, twenty years, you would not be justified in going as far as to prevent straw used in packing for goods from coming in, or insisting on everything being unpacked at the ports and the straw burned there. Even if you did that you would only be guarding against perhaps five per cent. of the possible sources of danger. What we have done is to make an order making it an offence to retain any straw arriving on this side with goods. We have asked the people who get straw as packing to burn it, and we have made it an offence not to do so. Of course, we could hardly enforce that law, except in two or three per cent. of cases, if people simply meant to evade it, but you do not want that law if people realised their responsibilities themselves, and if they realised that it is, first of all, good business, and secondly, a patriotic duty, to burn such straw, and if people realised it so clearly and so realistically that they should report their neighbours when they found they were not doing it. The Farmers' Union can do ten times as much as I can in the way of precautions by co-operating. We have also sent out a circular to the Civic Guard describing the symptoms of foot-and-mouth disease, and we have published in all the papers the fact that if cattle are slaughtered in Ireland because of foot-and-mouth disease we pay for them. We think it likely that the farmer will be more likely to report a case if he is getting paid than if he believes he will be at a loss over it.

Mr. GOREY: On a point of information, I think you are quite correct.

Mr. HOGAN: That is a fact which I want to have known, that if cattle become infected in Ireland and are slaughtered the State pays and the owner will not be at any loss. It is almost a miracle that we have not had foot-and-mouth disease, but it would not really be a terrible misfortune if a case broke out in Ireland, provided it was reported immediately. The real danger is that if a case occurs the farmer, on finding his beast suffering from the disease, would put it into a house and start curing it. It can be cured, and cured easily. In such a case the disease spreads and spreads, but if we could get after that case immediately, the ports would be only closed for three days. If the beast is kept, and if the disease spreads, they may be closed for three, four or five months. There is a real precaution. The real and the most effective precaution you can take is by every means in your power to get it into the heads of the farmers that if a single case of foot and mouth disease breaks out they should report it immediately. That is where the Farmers' Union comes in, and I ask them, as far as they can do it, to see that that is done, because, after all, one outbreak is of no importance. The English do not get desperately frightened when one outbreak occurs. In such a case we would isolate the particular area concerned. The ports would be closed, and after establishing the fact that we had the area isolated the ports would be opened for the rest of the country, and the farmer whose beast is slaughtered would be paid. The reason that there are outbreaks in England, and that there have been outbreaks in Ireland, is because people will not report it when they find their cattle infected.

I agree that the dead meat trade is a precaution. I do not pretend to be omniscient, strange to say. I agree, in the first place, that the question of a dead meat trade in Ireland has been investigated for at least ten or fifteen years, and people have been talking about it through all that period and agreeing that it is a business proposition which would pay from every point of view. We are still talking about it. I realise that from the point of view of increasing production, of starting subsidiary industries, of giving a better price to the farmer for his cattle, as a protection against the closing of the ports as a result of an outbreak of foot and mouth disease, it would be a very good thing. It was that from every one of these points of view, and it would be a good thing to have three or four prosperous dead meat businesses in Ireland. Why have we not got them? Deputy Doyle tells me not to let this opportunity pass. What do you want me to do? We have an Agricultural Commission, of which Deputy Doyle is a member. What does he suggest that the Government should do—to take a specific case—in connection with the Drogheda Dead Meat Factory?

Mr. M. DOYLE: We will tell you when we get you over there.

Mr. HOGAN: You told me in your speech.

Mr. M. DOYLE: Well, therefore, do not ask me again.

Mr. HOGAN: He stated that we should open it. Does he mean the Government?

Mr. M. DOYLE: No.

Mr. HOGAN: I am sure that Deputy Johnson was delighted to hear Deputy Doyle talking like that. But should the Government actually nationalise industry? That is what we are asked to do, to put our money into this factory, which would take, I suppose, £300,000 or £400,000, appoint a manager, go to the Minister for Finance for the money and have Civil Servants running it. Socialism—that is what it is.

Mr. JOHNSON: Dead meat and fisheries will get on nicely.

Mr. HOGAN: There is no use in the Farmers' Party, and people interested in the dead meat trade, stopping at a certain point. We can all agree it would be good business to open the Drogheda Dead Meat Factory, but we all stop at the point where it becomes necessary to do something. What do you want me to do? I am anxious to see it opened. Is it seriously suggested that the Government should put money into it? If it is good from the farmers' and business point of view to have a dead meat trade in Ireland why do not the farmers wake up and put their money into it? Deputy Johnson might be the President in a few years, and he might meet you, and might be willing to take it over. He is willing to take over the railways and fisheries, and he will meet you, I am sure, on the dead meat trade, unless he changes his mind by then. But is that the policy, and is it not a perfectly hopeless position for the farmers, and there is money amongst the farmers still.

Mr. GOREY: No, you have got it all.

Mr. HOGAN: There is enough money to start, and why does not the Farmers' Union, which controls a good deal of money and has good business men, form a Co-operative Society and take over this dead meat factory? I put it to them as responsible business men, do they really expect the Government to take it over and run it as a Government concern?

Mr. DOYLE: We do not want you to run it but to take it over and hand it to us.

Mr. HOGAN: This is really a serious matter. Short of asking the Minister for Finance for £300,000 or £400,000, and asking him to become the owner of that factory, and putting in Civil Servants—because that is what they would be—to run it, we will help and co-operate in any possible way you can suggest in opening that factory.

Mr. JOHNSON: Does the Minister know anything about the Trade Facilities Act?

Mr. HOGAN: A little. I do not quite see what the Deputy is at in connection with this matter. I am anxious to see that factory opened, and to see a dead meat trade in Ireland, but we cannot do anything except the initiative comes from the farmers themselves. Let them wake up and we will do anything to help them anyway they can point out short of nationalisation.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: This concludes the debate. The point was raised for the Minister's reply. I will allow Deputies to ask questions, without explanation of the questions.

Mr. COLE: We had a very useful officer, whom you may remember in recent years, a liaison officer. Would it be possible to appoint some one to act as a liaison officer to meet the Inspectors at the landing places in England and Scotland? If such officers could be appointed the Irish cattle could be inspected as they land. If they are found free from disease there then there should be no further stoppage.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: I would like to ask the Minister if there is not some other method by which they could aid the dead meat trade besides nationalisation, or handing over control of the dead meat factories to Civil Servants? Has not the Minister heard of what the English Government has done for the beet root industry in England? Are there not certain grants and loans made by the Government, a partial subscription of the shares for a number of years, and could not such a thing be done in this country with regard to the dead meat trade? Could our Government not make an advance which would not give Government control over the factories, and which could be repaid as the factories produced and became successful? The blame should not be put on the farmers in this matter.

Mr. EGAN: Would the Minister order the Civic Guard to take precautions to see that the straw packing that comes down the country with goods—and a good deal comes with bottles and such things—would be destroyed?

Mr. HOGAN: I certainly will do that. I am almost certain a direction to that effect has been given to them already. Personally, I am absolutely against appointing a liaison officer, in other words a veterinary inspector, in England. At last we have got a proposition from the farmers. Deputy Heffernan has put it up on the spot, and does he seriously expect an answer now?

Mr. HEFFERNAN: Not now, but some time.

Mr. HOGAN: Supposing I said "yes" or "no," and he can have either answer, would he give the matter five minutes' consideration when he goes out, or give it something like the consideration a scheme of that sort deserves, and put a proposition so that the next time we will not have the same question and the same answer?

The Dáil adjourned at 1.20 p.m. until 3 o'clock Tuesday, 11th December.

CEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS.

ORAL ANSWERS.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN DUBLIN.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the President if the Government have yet arrived at any decision with reference to proposals to relieve the unemployed in the City of Dublin.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. Blythe) replying for the President: I hope to be able to put before the Dáil by the end of the week the Government's proposals for the reduction of unemployment by the provision of work. As I informed the Deputy on 14th November, no special scheme is in contemplation for Dublin; but any constructive proposals he may wish to make in regard to Dublin will be carefully considered.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Will the Minister be able to say on what day this week it is proposed to deal with this question?

Mr. BLYTHE: No, sir, I could not.

DONEGAL-DERRY BORDER (TRAFFIC REGULATIONS).

SEAN de FAOITE asked the Minister for Finance whether he is aware that the arrangements for handling goods traffic at the road Border stations between Derry and Donegal are entirely inadequate and with the restrictions on motor traffic and the closing of the main road from Derry to Letterkenny grave inconvenience and vexatious delays are caused to Donegal traders; whether he is aware that on Tuesday evening, the 4th instant, three lorries laden with merchandise for Donegal which arrived at the Bridgend road station about 4 p.m. were held up and kept on the roadside until 9 a.m. on Wednesday morning, the officer shutting down his office at 4.35 p.m. and refusing to examine any more goods, and what steps it is proposed to take to remedy this state of affairs.

Mr. BLYTHE: I am having inquiries made into this matter, and I must ask the Deputy to defer his question until they are completed.

CONDITIONS AT DUN LAOGHAIRE PIER.

Major BRYAN COOPER asked the Minister for Finance whether he can now make any statement as to the improvement of the conditions under which luggage is examined at Dun Laoghaire.

Mr. BLYTHE: As the result of a Conference held at the Office of Public Works on the 4th instant, at which the representatives of the various companies and Public Departments interested attended, it was decided to proceed immediately with the erection of shelters to protect the tables at which luggage is usually examined. Protection from the weather will be secured by raising panels or partitions from the quay level to the station roof on the side next to the steamer from which the passengers disembark. The other side will be left as at present since the station roof and the waiting train already afford protection.

It is hoped that these shelters will be completed before the Christmas holidays. If, after reasonable trial, they are found unsatisfactory, further steps will be taken to improve the accommodation.

SKIBBEREEN HOSPITAL (BUILD- ING MATERIALS).

TADHG O MURCHADHA asked the Minister for Local Government whether he is aware that in the proposed erection of a hospital at Skibberreen (Co. Cork) it is proposed to use asbestos instead of slate, for roofing, and whether, in view of the fact that two slate quarries in the immediate vicinity are very short of orders, he will recommend that slate be used instead of asbestos?

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. Burke): The specification for this hospital was drawn up on the understanding that the roof was to be of asbestos. A slated roof would require stronger walls and stronger timber in the roof. I am advised that natural slates cost some 40 to 50 per cent. more than the asbestos slates proposed. Furthermore, the hospital is urgently required, and the building of the stronger walls would take additional time.

CARLOW MEDICAL OFFICERSHIP (POSTPONED ELECTION).

DOMHNALL O MUIRGHEASA (for Eamon O Dubhghaill) asked the Minister for Local Government whether he ordered postponement of the appointment of a Medical Officer for Carlow County Home on the day on which the election was to have taken place; whether the vacancy had been duly advertised and the date fixed in the ordinary course, and whether he will state his reasons for so postponing the election?

Mr. BURKE: The answers are in the affirmative. The Board of Health were asked to postpone the election pending a decision in regard to the location of the County Home and of other institutions for the treatment of the sick in the county, upon which decision will depend the question of the duties, responsibilities and qualifications of the Medical Officer of the County Home.

MOATE POST OFFICE.

Mr. PATRICK W. SHAW asked the Postmaster-General if he will reconsider the decision to reduce the status of Moate Post Office, as it is unanimously considered that such change would injuriously affect the postal service in Moate, and that the present postal service should be retained?

POSTMASTER - GENERAL (Mr. Walsh): The alteration of the status of Moate Post Office is being carried out as a matter of administrative economy. No change in the existing postal or telegraph facilities is contemplated.

CO. CARLOW POSTMAN'S WAGES.

EAMON O DUBHGHAILL asked the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that the wages of Michael Murphy, postman, Old Leighlin, Co. Carlow, which at one period amounted to £2 6s. 0d. per week, were reduced to £1 11s. 0d., and subsequently to 14s. 3d. per week, and whether, in view of the fact that this man is unable to maintain his family on this wage, the Minister can see his way to grant an increase in this case?

Mr. WALSH: I am having enquiry made as to the circumstances under which the wages of Mr. Michael Murphy, Auxiliary Postman, Old Leighlin, Carlow, have been reduced, and will write to the Deputy on the subject at an early date.

REMUNERATION FOR VOLUNTEER POLICEMAN.

SEOIRSE DE BHULBH asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that John Travers, Richards-town, Clanc, served in the Volunteer Police from May to October, 1922, when he was discharged, and that this officer has received no pay, although promised £16 per month?

MINISTER for DEFENCE (General Mulcahy): I am aware that John Travers served as a Volunteer Police Officer. His claim for arrears of pay is now under investigation, and will be dealt with as expeditiously as possible.

DEPENDENT'S ALLOWANCE (HARRISTOWN, CO. KILDARE).

AODH O CULACHAIN asked the Minister for Defence if he is aware that Private Patrick Allinson, Brannocks-town, Harristown, County Kildare, was shot dead at Graney Cross, Baltinglass, on the 24th October, 1922, whilst serving in the National Army; further, that although he was contributing to his father's support before he joined the Army, the father never received any [Aodh O Cúlacháin.] dependents allowance during his service, and whether the question of compensation to the father for the loss of his son will be favourably considered.

General MULCAHY: I am aware that Private Allinson was killed as stated. It appears that no claim for dependents allowance was made by or on behalf of his father. His case will be considered under the terms of the Army Pensions Act, 1923.

MOTOR OWNER'S ACCOUNT.

SEOIRSE de BHULBH asked the Minister for Defence if the account of William Gaul, Rathasker Road, Naas, for motors supplied, and which was sent to the Quartermaster-General on August 13th, 1923, and acknowledged by Chief Accountant's Office, Portobello Barracks, by note bearing reference number 7698 will be settled forthwith.

General MULCAHY: Mr. Gaul's account will be settled with the least possible further delay.

POSITION OF DEMOBILISED OFFICERS.

Major BRYAN COOPER asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that a number of officers who were demobilised shortly before July 30th are ineligible either for grant or for a grant to provide civilian clothes, and whether he will consider the possibility of making some grant in cases where the officer was demobilised for no fault of his own, and against his will owing to reduction of establishment.

General MULCAHY: Prior to the 15th September, 1923, there was no case of an officer being demobilised for no fault of his own or against his will.

Major BRYAN COOPER: Were not some of the officers of the Railway Protection Corps demobilised on the reduction of the establishment about the middle of July, this year?

General MULCAHY: If I can have any particular case specified, I will have the matter inquired into.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I will send particulars of cases to the Minister.

COMPENSATION FOR COMMANDEERED BICYCLE.

Mr. DAVID HALL asked the Minister for Defence whether a bicycle the property of John Waters, Beauparc, County Meath, was commandeered in July, 1921, by a member of the I.R.A. named John Lawlor, who is at present in the National Army, and stationed on the Curragh; whether this bicycle, valued at £13, was captured by British Military on the day following during a battle between that force, and the I.R.A., at Celbridge, Co. Kildare; whether the Minister is aware that John Lawlor, who was then an officer in the I.R.A., guaranteed compensation to John Waters, and whether in view of the fact that Waters is a poor labouring man compensation will be considered and payment made.

General MULCAHY: The bicycle was taken by Mr. Lawlor and was eventually lost. A claim for compensation should, in the first instance, be sent to the Compensation (Ireland) Commission, College of Science.

RELEASE OF PRISONERS.

Mr. DAVID HALL asked the Minister for Defence whether in view of the fact that armed resistance to the State has ceased, and that the country is now returned to normal, will he have all untried political prisoners released before Christmas, and whether all wanted men who are on the run, and at present away from their own homes will be allowed to return without interference from the forces of the State; whether in the event of the answer to the first part of the question being in the affirmative the Minister will have a statement to that effect inserted in all daily and provincial papers.

General MULCAHY: As stated in my reply to Deputy Byrne on the 4th instant, prisoners are being released as quickly as considerations of public safety will permit.

As regards men "on the run," I cannot undertake that all such men may return to their homes without fear of interference.

Mr. HALL: I would like to ask the Minister for Defence whether, in view of the reply, he is aware of the fact that keeping men "on the run" and away from their own homes is also keeping them away from their employment and encouraging crime?

General MULCAHY: The Government is quite aware of the fact that there are men "on the run," and quite aware of the possibilities arising out of a situation like that. The matter is receiving, and has been receiving, the fullest possible consideration. It is not possible to give the undertaking that the Deputy asks for.

PRE-TRUCE CLAIMS.

Mr. DAVID HALL asked the Minister for Defence whether the claims of members of the I.R.A. for compensation as a result of injuries received prior to the truce in the struggle between England and this country are receiving consideration; whether he can state when settlement of such claims will be made?

General MULCAHY: The claims in question are of two kinds:—(1) Those arising out of injuries received in the course of duty on active service. They are being dealt with under the provisions of the Army Pensions Act, 1923. It is hoped to commence payments at an early date; and (2) those occasioned by injuries inflicted maliciously. The Minister for Finance is considering these claims, and has already paid many of them.

Mr. HALL: Has the Minister for Defence acknowledged all the claims sent in? I am aware all claims have not been acknowledged. What I want to know is, whether the Minister received claims from any one of those disabled or injured soldiers of the old I.R.A. who suffered injury or disablement prior to the Truce, owing to their activities against the British Government Forces in this country? And I want to know whether he has at any time acknowledged the receipt of such claims?

General MULCAHY: I have personally acknowledged many of those claims. As far as the systematic acknowledgment of the claims that have been submitted subsequent to the publication of the notice that claims would be now received in connection with the Army Pensions Act of 1923, I presume each form received would be acknowledged, but I will make inquiries with regard to that. With regard to the second part of the question, I think that does not arise.

WRITTEN ANSWER.

ALLEGED ILL-TREATMENT OF CARLOW MAN.

EAMON O DUBHGHAILL asked the Minister for Defence whether he has received a report from the Carlow Military Authorities concerning the case of John Donnelly, of Castle Hill, Carlow, who was brought out at night and threatened to be shot by National Troops and Officers in uniform for a remark alleged to have been made by him to another, and which both denied; whether, seeing that this incident has ruined the chance of this man earning a livelihood in Carlow, in which he has been resident for over 16 years, that he has now been idle for over 15 months, the case will be re-considered with a view to granting adequate compensation for his losses?

General MULCAHY: I have received a report of the incident referred to. Donnelly was taken out at night-time and cautioned in connection with statements alleged to have been made by him regarding the death of General Collins. I am not aware that the incident has ruined his chance of earning a livelihood in Carlow. He left his employment of his own free will. The case is not one in which compensation can be awarded.

QUESTION ON ADJOURNMENT.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I give notice that on the adjournment I will raise the question as to the conditions under which Customs examination are carried out at Saorstát ports.

THE LOAN.STATEMENT BY MINISTER FOR FINANCE.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Minister for Finance desires to make a statement with regard to the Loan.

Mr. BLYTHE: I am hardly yet in a position to give the Dáil all the figures I would wish to give in connection with the Loan. But I would like to state here publicly what we all know, that the success of the Loan has been greater than even the most sanguine of us expected.

Although we found that the Loan was over-subscribed, so far as we could discover, on Thursday evening, and sent out notice to the Press to that effect, we received on Saturday £825,000, and on yesterday £125,000. If the Loan had remained open until yesterday, which was the date fixed for closing, I have no doubt at all that we would have received between fourteen and fifteen millions. As a matter of fact, even although notices were sent out on last Thursday night, we got in eleven and a half millions from the Bank of Ireland alone, in addition to other large sums that were returned direct by Banks and stockbrokers throughout the country—to their clients. We got all that money from the public, although the banks, in case of necessity, were willing to put up a very large sum. They agreed to do that in the public interest. Not a penny of underwriting commission was paid to anyone in connection with the Loan. The amount that we wanted was more than subscribed by the public in response to the appeal, and the only expenses that we incurred, in connection with the Loan, were the few thousand pounds spent on advertising.

Of the eleven and a half millions that came in through the Bank of Ireland, it was given by something over 22,000 subscribers, so that, in spite of the very large subscriptions which we received, the average subscription to the Loan was a little over £500. We intend, so far as the subscriptions which we received in time are concerned, to allot in full to those who made application for sums of £5,000 and under. When we exclude the further amounts received on Friday and Saturday, we will be able to allot to the other subscribers, without any very large deduction, probably something in the nature of ten per cent.

In addition to the amounts received for the Loan, there was a great increase in the amounts invested in Savings Certificates during the two weeks that the Loan was before the public. One week we received £20,000, and last week we received £53,000. This result was achieved by co-operation from all sections of the public. I desire to thank members of the Dáil and of the Seanad for the help they gave in connection with the Loan. Very many of them went to very great trouble to secure subscribers and to interest their friends in the Loan.

I would like to record my sense of appreciation of the great services that the Press, both the daily and the weekly Press, rendered to us. I have no hesitation at all in saying that the great success of the Loan has been one of the most important things that has occurred for a very long time. It removes altogether, I think, the likelihood that we will have to go outside, to London or to New York, for any money that we require. It is quite evident to me that there is such confidence in the country, and such a willingness amongst the people of all classes to supply what money is needed to carry on the administration of the country, as to make it certain that whatever further sums we may require will be got inside the country. That, I think, is a very important thing, and places this country in a position that I think we would all desire. It makes us independent of many manipulations and many considerations that might be detrimental to this country's interests in the future if we were faced with them.

I believe that the stability of the country will be greatly strengthened by what has occurred. There was a great deal of pessimism before the issue of the loan. I might say that a number of people, not a very large number, whom one would regard as competent, advised us that the terms we were offering were not good enough, and that we would not secure the subscription. A very large number of people told us that we would get two or three millions, but that we would be flogging a dead horse for the rest of it. All these prophets of pessimism have been confounded. I think that when we started, faced with such an amount of pessimism in regard to the Loan and had such an extraordinary success, that we will undoubtedly be able in our future borrowings to get money on more favourable terms than we have got this money, and that, of course, will be of great importance to the country.

When we have to undertake any works of construction or development, the question of whether a particular work will be economic or will not be economic, will depend very largely on the conditions and on the rate at which we can borrow money. I believe that this country is now definitely on its legs, from the point of view of credit, and that in our future borrowings we will be able to borrow as well practically as any Government or nation can borrow. I think that we have very great reason to congratulate ourselves, and to be congratulated on the way in which all classes have come in to help to do what was necessary at this particular juncture for the country.

HOUSING QUESTION.

Mr. A. BYRNE: Before we proceed to the ordinary business, might I ask the Minister for Finance when he will be in a position to announce the Government's future housing policy?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I think the Deputy will have to avail of another occasion for that question.

Mr. BYRNE: I might say that every time the question was raised it was put off pending financial rearrangements. Now we are told that the Loan has been a great success, and I think it is time that this question of housing, which is a very serious matter in Ireland.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy has given the Minister food for thought.

EXPIRING LAWS BILL, 1923— (SECOND STAGE).

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move that this Bill be now read a second time. It presents no feature exceptional from that which was passed by the Dáil last year, save that a small number of Acts, included in the First Schedule, which had been renewed from year to year for a number of years, are now proposed to be made permanent. The Acts set out in the other Schedule are Acts whose utility is considered still to exist. If there is any question arising, with reference to any of them, I shall be happy to try and deal with them either on this stage or perhaps more properly on the next.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I observe that among the Acts which it is proposed to continue in this manner, from year to year, is the Motor Car Act, 1903. I am not going to raise any objection at this stage, or to comment much upon this Order, but I think it is intensely undesirable, now that the Motor Car has passed out of the experimental stage it was in in 1903, that it should be regulated, in the main, first by what one would look upon as an obsolete Act, and, secondly, by an Act renewed from year to year, even though that Act was modified by an Act of the British Parliament about three years ago. I put it to the Dáil that this year the Attorney-General should consider the question of the people interested in the motor business, and bring in an Act, not an annual Act, but some permanent Statute governing this industry and branch of our traffic. I do not want, however, the matter thrown into chaos by not passing this Act, but it is a matter that the Government should interest themselves in and take some definite steps for the future.

Mr. HALL: May I ask whether a Government measure can be introduced by a Deputy who is not a Minister of the Government?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: There is nothing on the face of this Bill which shows that it is a Government measure.

Mr. HALL: I take it it comes from the Government and that it is a Government measure?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: If Deputy Hall was interested in the matter

he could bring in a Bill himself, to continue those expiring laws, and if he secured the Government's support that would have the effect of giving him a better place upon the Order Paper.

Question: "That the Bill be now read a second time," put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: It is essential that this Bill should be passed before the 31st of December, and I should propose the Committee Stage for Tuesday next.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Has it to pass the Seanad before the 31st of December?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Yes, it must.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Next Tuesday would not serve then.

ATTORNEY - GENERAL: To-morrow, then.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Is it proposed to take a Bill of this nature, in respect of which the word "reading" is rather curiously applied because it is done by a symbol, in Committee of the whole House? Would it not be better to take it in a Special Committee where the various Statutes could be available for reference? I suggest it would be more convenient to take it in a Special Committee, rather than in a Committee of the Whole House.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Bill is being taken in Committee of the whole Dáil, and the Committee Stage is set down for to-morrow.

Agreed.

PUBLIC SAFETY (POWERS OF ARREST AND DETENTION) TEMPORARY BILL, 1923—(FIRST STAGE).

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. O'Higgins): I ask the leave of the Dáil to have printed and circulated a Bill entitled the Public Safety (Powers of Arrest and Detention) Temporary Bill. It is known to Deputies that the Public Safety Act will expire on the 1st of February next, and I have had to advise the Executive Council that, for order and security to life and property, in the coming year, it will be necessary that the Executive should have powers of arrest and to detain certain persons reasonably suspected of having committed certain offences which will be set out in the Schedule.

It is unfortunate that the situation should call for the introduction of a Bill of this kind; but it is the fact and our responsibility to the people obliges us to face the fact and to take measures to meet a situation of that kind. We have not, yet, in all areas of the country sufficiently normal or sufficiently peaceful conditions to ensure that a high standard of civic sense will prevail, and to ensure that evidence that would satisfy a Court will be always forthcoming against people who commit crimes.

This Bill then is introduced to meet the situation as it exists, and as it is likely to continue to exist for some months. It will be merely an Internment Bill. It is not proposed now to bring before the Dáil all the Sections of the Public Safety Bill. The idea rather is to break up that Bill into three distinct Bills, one dealing with the question of internment, another being a Firearms Bill, which will be permanent, and a Criminal Law Amendment Bill, which will be introduced early in the next Session. This Bill that is now introduced deals merely with the question of having powers to arrest and detain certain persons on reasonable suspicion—on something short of legal proof, proof that would satisfy a Court. The Bill, I hope, will be in Deputies' hands to-morrow or next day, and it is proposed to take the Second Reading on Friday next.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: This Bill does not appear on the Order Paper. I take it that leave will be given to introduce the Bill?

Mr. JOHNSON: I take it that leave to introduce does not carry with it assent to the Second Reading being taken on Friday?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: No.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: It is proposed to take the Second Reading on Friday.

Mr. JOHNSON: Before assenting to that, I would like to know when Deputies shall have the Bill in their hands? It is obviously a Bill that is raising very important questions of principle, and will require time for consideration before the Second Reading is taken. If we are not to have the Bill before Thursday that would not give time.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The Bill is at present with the printer, and it should be possible to have it in Deputies' hands to-morrow afternoon.

Second Stage of Bill ordered for Friday.

THE COURTS OF JUSTICE BILL, 1923—FIFTH STAGE.

The PRESIDENT: I move that the Bill do now pass.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: There are a certain number of small verbal amendments that it is necessary for me to ask the permission of the Dáil to have inserted in the Bill. Deputies will remember that on the Second Reading, Deputy O'Connell raised the question about having the Irish titles of the various Courts inserted. I am sorry that up to the present it has not been possible to have an agreed set of Irish titles, but I now propose, if there is no objection, to have amendments inserted. The first amendment is in Section 3, line 29, to insert after the word "Court" the words ("Príomh-Chúirt Choireamhail").

Amendment agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move:—

In Section 4, line 3, to delete the words "Saorstát Éireann" and to insert in lieu thereof ("An Ard-Chúirt Bhreitheamhnais").

Amendment agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move:—

In Section 4, line 5, to insert after the word President the word ("Uachtarán"), and in line 6 to insert after the word "Judge" the word ("Breitheamh").

Amendment agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move:—

In Section 5, lines 8 and 9, delete from "the Supreme Court" to "consisting" and insert in lieu thereof the words "a Supreme Court of Justice (Chúirt Bhreitheamhnais Uachtarach) shall be constituted under this Act to be the Supreme Court of the Irish Free State (An Chúirt Uachtarach) referred to in the Constitution and shall consist"; and in line 13 after the word "Judge" insert ("Breitheamh").

Amendment agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move:—

In page 7, Section 21, line 40, to insert after the word "shall" the words "(save as otherwise expressly provided by this Act)," and in line 44, to delete the words "lunacy and in minor matters" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "matters hereinbefore transferred to the Chief Justice"; and in line 46 to delete the words "lunacy and in minor" and to insert after the word "matters" the words "hereinbefore transferred to the Chief Justice."

Amendment agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move:—

In page, 7, Section 22, line 61, to delete the words "procedure and practice" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "pleading, practice, and procedure."

Amendment agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move:—

In page 8, Section 23, line 6, to insert after the words "Supreme Court" the words "(including the Chief Justice)".

In Section 36, line 30, Part II., to delete the words "in Saorstát Éireann" and to insert in lieu thereof ("An Chúirt Breitheamhnais Chuarda"); and in line 32 of the same Section, after the word Judge to insert the word ("Breitheamh").

Amendment agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move:—

[Attorney-General.]

In page 11, Section 43, line 35, to delete the words "in his profession." Amendment agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move:—

In page 12, Section 46 (iv), line 1, to delete the word "actions" where it secondly occurs and to insert in lieu thereof the word "suits"; and in line 4, to delete the word "realty" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "land"

"Realty" would be applicable to only a particular kind of land.

Amendment agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move:—

In page 13, Section 50 (iii), line 15, to delete the word "actions" where it secondly occurs and to insert in lieu thereof the word "suits".

Amendment agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move:—

In page 13, Section 53, line 41, to delete the words "licensing cases" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "relation to the granting of new licences".

Mr. JOHNSON: I notice that the Section begins with the words "provided that" as also the two previous Sections. I am not a grammarian, but it occurs to me that it is rather an odd way of beginning a Section, and that these really ought to be parts of the previous Section. I would ask the Attorney-General if he will consider the desirability of amending the form of this before the Bill passes through the Seanad.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I agree. I think that is caused by breaking up a very long Section. Perhaps this particular amendment will be acceptable, and I will look into it before it reaches the Seanad.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON: Inasmuch as amendments have been received without notice, I would like to know whether it is in order to move that wherever the word "Justice" occurs in respect of Justices of the District Court, we should insert the word "Judge" instead. The intention of the Government in this matter with regard to the status of District Justices was made clear on earlier readings, and it occurs to me that it is very desirable that we should alter the phraseology of the Bill so as really to indicate these intentions.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: There is an amendment before that on the paper to Section 67. The Attorney-General has an amendment to Section 65, and I think your amendment would come in where the word "Justice" first occurs, in Section 66. There is an amendment to insert an Irish title in Section 65. If we take that and take your amendment to Section 66 afterwards, should you succeed there you would succeed throughout.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: This amendment is not on the paper. It proposes, in Section 65, line 13, to delete the words "in Saorstát Éireann," and insert in lieu thereof ("An Chúirt Bhreitheamhais Dúitheche").

Amendment agreed to.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I think that Deputy Johnson's amendment may be taken now.

Mr. JOHNSON: My amendment is that wherever reference is made to "Judges of the District Court," "or District Justices," we shall refer to "Judges of the District Court," "or District Judges," so that in this case the amendment would be:—To delete the word "Justices" in line 18 and insert the word "Judges." We decided during earlier readings that the status of the Justices of the District Courts would be that of Judges, as understood in the Constitution. The term "Justice" in the common understanding rather suggests the Magistrate than the Judge, and I think it very desirable that in the Bill now passing from the Dáil we should give the title "Judge" instead of "Justice," so as to embody what was the declared intention of the Attorney-General on the earlier stages. I would hope that it is not necessary to pursue this argument, that it should be clear once attention is drawn to the matter, and that the Attorney-General will accept this amendment.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: There is a very nice point in this as to whether it is a verbal amendment or not. If the District Justices are, in fact, Judges, it is a verbal amendment, but if not it is a very substantial change.

Mr. JOHNSON: Of course we have assurances that they are Judges.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The great objection to this alteration of the designation of these Judges is that they have now been established for a considerable time and operating through the country under this particular title, and we do not want to shake our own institutions. Moreover, there is nothing derogatory in the word "Justice." There is no Judge in the High Court who is not spoken of as "Justice" so-and-so. There is absolutely nothing derogatory in it, and I propose to insert here the word "Iustis," which Deputy MacNeill tells me is to be found in the "Leabhar Breac," and I believe it has quite an honourable tradition behind it. I am afraid we could not accept the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON: Does not the statement of the Attorney-General say that there is rather a distinction? In the earlier stages we have spoken of Judges and Breitheamhain. Now, it is suggested that we shall make that distinction and fix it in the Bill in contradiction to the assurances we received on the earlier Stages.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Could the Attorney-General tell us exactly what is the difference as between "Breitheamhain" and "Iustis"?

Captain REDMOND: As far as I can see there is no reason for not accepting Deputy Johnson's suggested amendment, except that it was not thought of before, and I really think that, having regard to the categorical assurances we have received from the Attorney-General, that these Justices are Judges within the Constitution, no sound reason has been given by him as to why they should not be called Judges in this Bill except that they had not been called Judges previously. Perhaps when the Bill was under contemplation and was being drafted, the drafters did not think that they were Judges, but now, knowing that they are Judges, in spite of the fact that there are certain attributes surrounding them which are not the same as those surrounding the High Court and the Circuit Court Judges, it seems to me that they are Judges, and I cannot see why the Attorney-General cannot recognise them as such, and call them by any equivalent Irish name that he likes.

Major COOPER: It appears to the Attorney-General that the point is one of inconvenience. The alteration of style of address is not going very far, because in practice they are always called "D.J.'s" and will continue to be called "D.J.'s," whether they are Judges or Justices, in nine cases out of ten.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I did not know whether the Deputy for Waterford was rising to supply 4 o'clock. The curiosity of Deputy Figgis as to the difference between the words Breitheamhain and Iustis. I am in this somewhat awkward position in the matter, that the Minister for Home Affairs, who, I understand, will later be known as the Minister for Justice, is not here, and these are his particular creations. I should not like to assent to a change in their designation without conferring with him on the subject. I think it would create a good deal of inconvenience by reason of the fact that this designation has so long existed, as some Deputy has mentioned. Every Judge in the Court of Appeal is an L.J., which stands for Lord Justice. There is no very great difference between that and D.J.—District Justice—except in degree. I really do not think there is anything of substance in this proposal. If I thought there was anything derogatory to the District Justices I certainly would be inclined to press the matter with the Minister, who is more concerned in the creation of these Judges than I am, but I do not think there is anything of substance, having regard to the fact that every Judge in the High Court and Court of Appeal has always had the appellation of Justice. There is nothing derogatory in the term, and while I will ask him to consider the matter, from my own knowledge of the thing I think that there would be a large inconvenience, and but little gain—perhaps something lost. I cannot myself assent to it at the present moment. I would submit it to the Minister for Home Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON: I am rather afraid to allow this to leave the Dáil without some assurance on the point. I do not know whether it is possible to meet the Minister for Justice, as he will be, before the final passing of this Bill, but I feel there is more than the Attorney-General suggests. We have had, as a matter of fact, assurances given regarding the position of these Judges, and the point would be met, perhaps, if the same Irish title were given to Justices of the District Court as to Justices of the High Court. Where we have a distinction in title, both in the English and Irish, in regard to Justices of the District Court from the Judges of the Circuit Court and High Court, it helps to confirm the popular impression that the District Justices are inferior, and that they are not Judges under the Constitution. That is quite wrong, we at least know, but I hope that in the passing of legislation we should endeavour to put into the Bills exactly what we mean, and that is my desire. If, in the view of the Minister for Home Affairs, it will create so great a difficulty in his Department to alter the term "District Justice" to "District Judge," it certainly will not create that difficulty if we alter the Irish term proposed to be given to Judges of the High Court.

ATTORNEY - GENERAL: I may mention that it is well known a number of the District Justices use the Irish language to a large extent, and I know, as a matter of fact, some of them do use the term Breitheamhain. Notwithstanding the somewhat challenging ring I generally notice in Deputy Johnson's voice when he refers to this status, there is no doubt that those of the District Justices who know the Irish language felt confident that their position was equivalent to that of Breitheamh or Judge.

Mr. JOHNSON: Do you want to alter it, then?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I have no objection to inserting the same word here.

Deputy Johnson's amendment by leave withdrawn.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move in Section 66, line 18, after the word "Justices" to insert ("Breitheamhain.")

Agreed.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to propose the following amendment:—

"In page 15, Section 67, line 26, to insert immediately after the figures '1923' the words and figures '(No. 6 of 1923).'"

Amendment put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I propose the following amendment:—

"In page 16, Section 72, line 9, to delete the word 'allowances' and to insert in lieu thereof the word 'allowance', and in line 16, to insert after the figures '1923' the words and figures '(No. 6 of 1923).'"

Amendment put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to propose Amendment No. 10, which is as follows:—

"In page 17, Section 75, line 45, to insert after the figures '1923' the words and figures '(No. 6 of 1923).'"

Amendment put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I propose:

"In Section 85, line 52, after the word 'called' to insert (Feadhman-naigh Shíochána) or in English 'Peace Commissioners'"

Amendment put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to propose the following amendment:—

"In page 19, Section 86, line 23, to insert after the figures '1923' the words, and figures '(No. 6 of 1923).'"

Amendment put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to propose:—

"In page 19, Section 88, lines 46 and 47, to delete the words 'on the civil side or the criminal side' and to insert in lieu thereof the words 'in civil cases or in criminal cases,' and in line 51, to delete the word 'with' and to insert in lieu thereof the word 'and'.

These are purely verbal alterations.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Question: "That the Bill, as amended, do now pass," put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be sent to Seanad.

DAIL IN COMMITTEE.

MINISTERS AND SECRETARIES BILL—(THIRD STAGE RESUMED).

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Section 6 of the Ministers and Secretaries Bill was under consideration the last day. Amendment 25 had been disposed of. We will now consider Amendment 26, Section 6.

Mr. JOHNSON: I move the following amendment:—

To add a new sub-section as follows:—

(3) The Attorney-General may be or become a member of Dáil Eircann, and if he is a member of Dáil Eireann at the time of his appointment he shall not be under any obligation to resign his seat or to submit himself for re-election. He shall hold office so long only as the President of the Executive Council by whom he was appointed continues to retain the support of a majority in Dáil Eireann.

It may be said that this amendment is consequential upon the last. Partly it is. The case for this would be much stronger if the last amendment had been accepted and passed, but even without the last amendment, I think it is desirable that we should state specifically in the Bill that the Attorney-General may be, or may become, a member of the Dáil, and that he is not under any obligation to resign his seat in case of appointment, if he is already a member, and that he shall hold office only so long as the President, by whom he is appointed, is in receipt of the confidence of the majority of the Dáil. It does not necessitate that the Attorney-General shall be a member of the Dáil, and I can understand perhaps good reasons why an Attorney-General need not be a member of the Dáil. I think it is a very good thing for the Dáil that the present Attorney-General is a member. I do not want to make it obligatory that he shall be. The Attorney-General, I think, last week pointed out that the best lawyers might not be the best publicists—though they very often are. I think we should understand clearly, at least, whether it is the intention of the Dáil that the Attorney-General shall or shall not be a member of the Dáil, or whether it is intended to leave the matter optional. That is the reason I bring forward the amendment, notwithstanding the fact that the previous amendment touching upon this subject was defeated.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I understand that the President will accept that amendment. There is one matter in which I wish to make a reservation. It may be necessary on the Report Stage to modify the wording slightly, for this reason. There might be read into it a suggestion that a statute of the late Queen Anne, I think it was—

Mr. JOHNSON: The lady who is dead.

ATTORNEY - GENERAL: Which caused certain Ministers in England to vacate office on appointment, had application to Ministers of the Saorstát. I know that that is not what Deputy Johnson has in mind, but it may be necessary in some way to modify the wording.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Question: "That Section 6, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

SECTION 7.

(1) The Executive Council may from time to time, on the nomination of the President of the Council, appoint so many persons, being members of the Oireachtas and not exceeding seven in number as the Executive Council shall consider necessary, to be Parliamentary Secretaries to the Executive Council or to Executive Ministers, and may at any time remove any Parliamentary Secretary so appointed.

(2) Every person appointed under this section to be a Parliamentary Secretary shall continue to hold office so long only as he continues to be a member of the Oireachtas and the President of the Executive Council by whom he was nominated continues to retain the support of a majority in Dáil Éireann.

(3) Each Parliamentary Secretary appointed under this Act shall be paid out of moneys provided by the Oireachtas such annual salary not exceeding in any case the annual sum of £1,200 as shall from time to time be fixed by the President of the Executive Council, with the consent of the Minister for Finance.

(4) Each of the Parliamentary Secretaries appointed under this section shall by his appointment be assigned to act as Parliamentary Secretary to the Executive Council or to an Executive Minister and shall have such powers and perform such duties as the Executive Council or such Executive Minister with the consent of the Executive Council (as the case may be) may from time to time delegate to him.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I move Amendment 27, which is to delete the section. It was said here, at the outset, that this Bill is in the nature of a permanent measure, that it may be added to, from time to time, but that its main provisions will remain as they are. That may or may not be. At this particular moment, when national economy is being urged on every hand, and particularly from the Ministerial Bench, it is undesirable that we should make a departure from our present practice, when that departure involves certain extra expenditure, however small it may be. It is unfortunate, as I said on the Second Reading, that this Bill should come forward immediately after these admonitions with regard to national economy. The Dáil has managed without Parliamentary secretaries—that is, paid Parliamentary secretaries. I agree at once that it would be very undesirable that people should be asked to undertake national service—although they frequently are, and are happy to comply—without remuneration. There would be nothing to stop a provision of this kind being introduced at a later stage, if found necessary, without being brought into a Bill for the foundation of constitutional Ministerial positions. I think it undesirable that we should set this headline at the present moment.

The first reason why I think this Section should be deleted from the Bill is that it is not in consonance with the preaching of national economy. My second reason is that the President, when recommending this Bill and supporting its principle, made it perfectly clear that it was not Parliamentary Secretaries at all he had in mind as being required. Before I quote his words I should point out that he was referring to a period which we have passed through—the last twelve months—when there were no such persons recognised and paid as such, in the service either of the Ministry or of the Dáil. He said:—

During the period that we have had experience of—that is the last two years—for something like twelve or eighteen months we have had three Parliamentary Secretaries. Two were attached to me: one in my capacity as President, and the other in my capacity as Minister for Finance.

I want to draw attention to the next remark of the President:

The third was the Assistant Minister for Industry and Commerce. The Parliamentary Secretary who was attached to the Ministry of Finance and the Assistant Minister for Commerce were approached by me in reference to one service, which was functioning under the Ministry of Finance, and in the course of their administration of that particular service they saved a sum per annum almost sufficient to discharge the entire estimate of the Oireachtas.

I ask particular attention to these words, too—that in reference to that one service they effected such an enormous saving. The President went on to say:

It is not by nominal economies real results are to be effected, and if excellent service can be rendered by a large number of Ministers, we consider that power ought to be given in a measure of this sort to enable the Executive Council to have available for the service of the State such assistance as they consider is necessary.

I have drawn attention to two sentences of the President, particularly, because the service to which he referred was not a Parliamentary service at all. It was a service that could have been dealt with by any one of the Civil Servants in his employment.

It was not any work in connection with the business here. It was work in connection with what is known as the Contracts Committee. Now, clearly work done in connection with any Department, any affiliation between that Department and the Contracts Committee, is work that calls for the administration of Departmental Civil Servants, not for the appointment of Parliamentary Secretaries. I have drawn attention to these two sentences for another reason. One of the persons to whom the President has referred was the Assistant Minister for Industry and Commerce. The Assistant Minister for Industry and Commerce was called in to serve in a certain capacity, to help in the work of a certain Department. Unless I am much misinformed, he is still serving in that Department, and is still doing the work in that Department that he did in the previous Dáil, of which he was a member, although he is not a member of this Dáil.

There is an aspect that I want to touch upon as lightly as I possibly can. I realise that we are in a formative period, and many things are done that would not be done under normal experience. But I do suggest, and I do think, that it is not altogether the very best possible practice that members of the Legislature should act as Ministers, and then, failing to be returned, in the next succeeding Legislature should continue to hold and discharge work that they did previously, having turned from being Assistant Minister to being Civil Servants on the staff. I think that is not altogether the best practice.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It is not altogether relevant to the amendment, Deputy Figgis.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I touched upon it in parenthesis, and I deliberately did so.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Irrelevant parenthesis is as bad as any other form of irrelevancy.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: The main point is that that particular Assistant Minister is still doing that work that he was called upon to do in the last Dáil. Clearly, if he was called in to serve in a certain capacity, and he did good work in that capacity, and is still doing that work, then the reason for the appointment of a Parliamentary Secretary to discharge the work that he discharged is not apparent in this case. I think the President's own explanation, in speaking here on the Second Reading, makes it quite clear that it was not Parliamentary Secretaries that he had in his mind. A second reason, therefore, why I urge and why I think this Dáil should not pass or permit this Section to remain part of the Bill is that it is not Parliamentary Secretaries which the President made it clear that he wanted, but that it was a different function in the Civil Service. Therefore, it is the Civil Servants that he should be thinking of. The third reason hinges upon and follows from the other two. It is this: In the previous Dáil there were three persons acting in different ways in connection with the Civil Service, and we managed successfully with three, although they were not Parliamentary Secretaries. We were meeting very frequently. We met week after week. There was a lot of work to be done. It was pressed through this Dáil almost as quickly as bullets through a machine gun.

The PRESIDENT: Were you ever closed?

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: As the President said, the work was all the greater because he exercised his generosity and never closed. This pressure of work was not placed, and is not placed, upon this present Dáil, and it will not be placed upon this Dáil during the coming year. We heard

[Mr. Darrell Figgis.] that there are arrangements to be made that there will be a lengthy recess during the summer months. It is obvious that the same pressure is not going to be given to the work of this Dáil as to the work of the past Dáil. If, therefore, we managed without paid persons whose whole time was occupied, then clearly, and a fortiori, these persons and these extra appointments will not be required in the present Dáil. A clear case has not been made out for the inclusion of Parliamentary Secretaries. I think that unless the circumstances were such that the appointment of such persons was imperative and unavoidable, only under those conditions could such provisions be introduced at the present moment, in face of the demand for economy. I know the expenditure is not much, but there is much in the force of example. Such a case has not been made clear, and because it has not been made clear I think the amendment should pass. If, eventually, such persons become necessary, in the present Dáil, let us at the present moment keep these conditions out of the Ministers and Secretaries Bill, and keep the question of Parliamentary Secretaries to be dealt with at a future day, when the financial pressure is not so much as at the present moment and when a clearer case is made out for their necessity.

The PRESIDENT: We have all listened for the past ten minutes to a very learned dissertation upon what one would imagine would be the reason why this Section should be deleted. But it is in essence quite another thing. I do not know whether the Deputy has his mind upon the Dáil or upon the "London Sunday Times"—I think that is the paper. But, I do say that in considering a question of this sort the Dáil is entitled to much more substance than what we have just listened to. Most of the statement made is a statement which, when carefully analysed, is a case for the appointment of those Secretaries. He seeks to divide the Minister's responsibilities between attendance in the Dáil and the administration of his office. He never paid the slightest attention to one while he concentrated on the other. It is not here in the Dáil that most of the work is done, but in the preparation of the work and in the consideration that has to be given to the various measures to be put forward before they come here at all. Then, there is the general administration of the Department. The Deputy, I am sure, has had in his past life some experience of what the administration of business connotes, as well as the responsibility in connection with Parliamentary work. He knows very well that it is utterly impossible for any man who means to discharge his business properly to come here at three o'clock in the day and sit until 8.30 p.m. dealing with one section of his business and during the intervals of time at its disposal to look after the administration of the work of a big Department.

We got over two forms of Government here, one which was entirely and utterly disorganised, and the other which was in a sort of state of incubation; we got an amateur Government from one, and an utterly disorganised Government from the other. I am not at all sure but that within the next few years persons who occupy Ministerial office in the State will find out, day after day, serious discrepancies in administration. To a man of the conscience of the Deputy, I am sure that would not afford any loss of sleep, but to men who have consciences like the Ministers, it is very different. The Deputy has stated that we had an Assistant Minister. I put it to those who were here during the last Session that you had got that Assistant Minister acting practically as the Minister in charge of Bills, introducing measures, and dealing with subjects raised on the adjournment and other matters. The Deputy, perhaps, objects to the term Parliamentary Secretary. It is a much better term than Assistant Minister.

An Assistant Minister is not known in the Constitution, and a Parliamentary Secretary is not mentioned in the Constitution. It is known elsewhere, but Deputies, in considering this question and in comparing this State with other States, must remember that this State or this form of Government that we now have, really takes its date from the time when the administration of this country was handed over by the British. There are various dates for that. In some cases it occurred on the 15th January, 1922, and in other cases it did not take place until April 1st, 1923. There were some other cases in which administration was handed over somewhere about December, 1922. Each Minister, in his capacity as head of a Department had got to accept responsibility for running his Department during that time. During the last twelve or eighteen months the attention of the Ministry has been largely directed to the condition of disorder in the country that required some attention. Now, when that stage is passed, gradually it is coming home that there may be economies and improvements, and much greater efficiency effected in the services of the State, by the appointment of those additional officers or assistants to the Ministers. It is not by bustle and not by figurative economies that real economy is effected. The economies which I stated here more than once when introducing this Bill, which I knew had been effected by reason of arrangements made by the Ministry, would not have been possible in some instances were it not for the appointment of Parliamentary Secretaries. I consider the case that has been made in some instances by the Press, and in some instances by Deputies, is a faked case, faked to the knowledge of the Press making it, faked to the knowledge of the Deputies who are making it, and faked to the knowledge of the Deputy who has just spoken.

Mr. JOHNSON: I intend to vote for this amendment in view of the unsatisfactory justification, or attempted justification, that the President has given. He suggests that the term "Parliamentary Secretary" is used because it is a little more convenient and better perhaps than the term Assistant Minister. By that statement he intimates that what is really intended is to appoint Assistant Ministers. The equivalent of Assistant Ministers in other Governments is an Under-Secretary of State. The Parliamentary Secretary does entirely different work. We gather what is intended is not a Parliamentary Secretary which would be equivalent to a Parliamentary Secretary in the British House of Commons, but an Under-Secretary who will answer for the Minister, and, as I fear would happen, who will take all the responsibility for answering the Dáil on questions of administration, which would provide Ministers with an opportunity of evading their Parliamentary responsibility, apart from their general administrative duty.

I am more impressed with the necessity for deleting this Section, because I can see that if we allow Assistant Ministers to do the work of Ministers in the Dáil, bear the brunt of criticism, and answer for a Minister with little less authority than the Minister—provided that he has the backing of a majority party, he would be able to carry off the honours in any circumstances quite apart from the merits of the case that may be made—that tendency will be to detract from the authority of the Dáil, and tend definitely towards more and more bureaucratic government and government by decree or semi-dictatorship. That is likely to be the tendency if the suggestions of the President, in defending this section, work out in practice. I believe it is very desirable that Ministers should have Parliamentary Secretaries, persons who will assist them in actual Parliamentary work. They need not be paid, and if they are to be paid they may be paid a very small additional salary, because of their more constant attendance. I would imagine that any Minister would be able to find active earnest members of his party who would be quite willing and capable to assist in the actual Parliamentary Secretarial work, but that is a very different thing from the appointment of Under-Secretaries or Assistant Ministers.

These Assistant Ministers, as designed by the Bill, were to be Assistants to the Executive Council, or to the Executive Minister. There has been an alteration made in the course of the discussion on that, and there may be Parliamentary Secretaries appointed, or Assistant Ministers to assist non-Executive Ministers, but what is likely to happen with this as a foreshadowing is that Parliamentary [Mr. Johnson.] Secretaries, or Assistant Ministers, would be appointed to the Executive Ministers, and in practice they would become more important than the non-Executive Ministers who are responsible to the Dáil. That is how it would work out. They would be Ministers to assist the Executive Ministers. They would be called Secretaries but they would be Ministers, and they would be deputed to attend the Dáil to answer criticism and to deal with matters which the Minister proper might find it a little inconvenient to deal with. They would tend to become more important than the External Ministers as they have been called. I think that is a very undesirable development, and I think we ought to know the reason for that development.

Under the Section as it stands, there would be possibly as many as 19 Ministers and Assistant Ministers, or, if you would prefer to call them Ministers and Parliamentary Secretaries, paid out of the funds voted by the Dáil. That is rather too large a proportion, considerably more than is desirable in an assembly of this size. I would just call attention to the last Sub-section of this Section. They are to have such powers and to perform such duties as the Minister, with the consent of the Executive Council, may from time to time delegate to them. The Dáil may say that the Minister shall be responsible for seeing the work done and of answering for the work of his Department to the Dáil. Then we are asked to give the Minister power to delegate such powers as we have given to himself—to give that power to another person. Now, I think that is altogether unwarranted and is inconsistent with the position of the Dáil and of the Executive. I think that the requirements of the case will be well satisfied if Ministers were to appoint Parliamentary Secretaries who would act as Secretaries to Ministers in relation to Parliamentary duties and to that alone, men who could be got to do it because of the training in public service it would give, and as part of their Parliamentary duties, and that there is not required the appointment of Assistant Ministers under the name of Parliamentary Secretaries, as is conceived in this Section, and as has been explained by the President. The fact that it is proposed to pay such Parliamentary Secretaries a sum of £1,200 a year places them in the position, not of Secretaries in the sense that that is generally understood, but of Assistant Ministers, and of having responsibilities for administrative work outside the Dáil and not necessarily connected with the Dáil. There is another consideration that ought to be taken note of, and that is that within this Section the Parliamentary Secretaries that are to be appointed may be members of the Seanad. I submit it is not desirable that such should be the case if they are to be Assistant Ministers. I could understand the appointment of an unpaid Secretary to a Minister who may have a seat in the Seanad, and who would assist in the conduct of a Bill through the Seanad, but I do not think it is desirable that we should appoint as Assistant Ministers men who would be, in fact, members of the Seanad. For these reasons I am prepared to support the motion for the deletion of this Section.

Major BRYAN COOPER: It is an extremely rash thing at any time to try and correct Deputy Johnson on a question of fact. But I think there is a little defect in the information in his mind when he refers to Parliamentary Secretaries. If he speaks of Parliamentary Secretaries, he speaks of a number of members who are Parliamentary Private Secretaries—young Members who attach themselves to Ministers, mainly for the purpose of getting experience of the official work, and for the purpose of seeing the papers and the files, and do an amount of routine work for the Minister. They practically never speak at all—in fact there is an unwritten law that it is bad form for them to speak in the House. But besides them there are Parliamentary Secretaries in the British Parliament, and attached to Ministers in every Department of the Government. There is the Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty, and there is the Civil Lord of the Admiralty. There is the Financial Secretary to the War Office and the Under-Secretary for War. Recently additional Parliamentary Secretaries were appointed. In the new Ministry for Pensions there is a Parliamentary Secretary who is paid, and in that Ministry of Pensions that same man had directly to answer in the House of Commons; and so it may be with other Ministries. That provision is necessitated by the fact that the British Parliament consists of two water-tight chambers, and that if the Minister of one of the great services, or of the great Departments is in the House of Lords, then the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister represents the Department in the House of Commons, and he has most important work to do, and very often cuts a very much more important figure than the Minister himself. That was certainly so in the case of Mr. Winston Churchill when he was Under Secretary for the Colonies.

Mr MILROY: On a point of information, is this the British Parliament or the Free State Parliament?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It is neither.

Mr. MILROY: I mean the Oireachtas of Saorstát Éireann.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I think I am in order and may continue. Generally speaking, I could not support the amendment, because if this power is given to the Ministry to appoint those Secretaries it may enable them to reduce the number of Ministers and decrease the number of salaries. In that respect this Section may lead to real economy. There is the further consideration that might sometimes arise. Suppose it was found necessary to appoint a Minister who sits in the Seanad it would be absolutely necessary for him to be represented by a Secretary here who could answer for him, because Members of the Seanad cannot speak here, and there should be someone to answer for the Department here; otherwise it would fall upon the shoulders of the President. Then, again, in yet another Parliament—the Parliament of Northern Ireland, of which Deputy Milroy is a Member—it was found necessary to appoint one or two Secretaries, even though it is a comparatively small assembly dealing with six counties. Therefore, I cannot support the amendment, although I hope that the Section will be considerably modified before it becomes part of the Bill.

MINISTER FOR AGRICULTURE (Mr. Hogan): I want to deal with one point raised by Deputy Johnson. I think it is a pity to mix up the position of the External Ministers and the Internal Ministers in connection with this Section. After all this Section only deals with Internal Ministers—or, rather, Members of the Executive Council.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Minister forgets that an amendment has been accepted that covers the whole of the Ministry.

Mr. HOGAN: Would it not be better to deal with the Section as a Section as it is making arrangements for Parliamentary Secretaries to Ministers who are Members of the Executive Council? The whole question of the appointment of Parliamentary Secretaries might be decided when it will come up on Deputy Johnson's amendment and he may get satisfactory assurance.

Professor O'SULLIVAN: The supporters of this amendment have made a great plea for a distinction between Parliamentary Secretaries and Assistant Ministers. In fact, most of their case, as far as I could follow it, has been in that direction.

But I cannot say that they have made it in any way clearer to me what precise functions they expect Parliamentary Secretaries to fulfil, if they are changed from the description of Parliamentary Secretaries to that of Assistant Ministers in regard to their Parliamentary duties. That does not carry us very far. Occasionally it is acknowledged they must speak for the Minister, but the one thing that seems to emerge from the arguments of the supporters of this amendment is that they wish that these Assistant Ministers shall have no practical knowledge of the Departments of which the Minister to whom they are attached is head. In other words, as regards the one thing they are to speak on, they might as well be gramophones. Gramophones would be quite cheap, but possibly not quite as dignified as Parliamentary Secretaries. What is the good in asking a question of a Parliamentary Secretary if he is merely to repeat the answer left for him by the Minister?

[Professor O'Sullivan.]

The real advantage in appointing people of this kind is that they have some knowledge of the administration, and as far as I can gather from the mover and seconder of the amendment that is the one thing that they are determined they would not have. I do not think that any Assistant to the Minister—even from the point of view of a Parliamentary Assistant—can be any good or of any use unless he has a knowledge of the Departmental work which the supporters of the amendment wish apparently to deprive him of.

Mr. MILROY: It would have been helpful, in this discussion, if the supporters of this amendment could have come to some agreement, or to some identity of argument. I find the proposer of the amendment supporting it from a point of view which is an entire contradiction to that of the Deputy who seconded it. Deputy Figgis said he considered that a clear case had not been made out for this section. Whether that is so or not, I certainly think there has been no clear case made out for this amendment. The Deputy reminded us of the admonitions addressed to the Dáil, and to the country, by the Minister for Finance in regard to economy. There is such a thing as economy at the expense of efficiency. I have no doubt, if Deputy Figgis discovered that this Dáil came to the conclusion that his seat in the Dáil should be abolished on the ground of economy, that he would regard that as economy at the expense of efficiency. The trend of the argument of the Deputy who opposed this amendment, Deputy Bryan Cooper, seemed to me to be utterly misleading. I take it that the framers of this Bill did not design its provisions on precedents in other institutions, so much as on the requirements that the Ministry have decided are essential for the proper carrying on of the administration. It does not matter to us really what interpretation is placed upon the term "Parliamentary Secretary" in the British House of Commons, or in the Parliament of Timbuctoo, if there is such an institution, as long as we understand what exactly it means to us here.

Deputy Figgis urged the deletion of this Section on the grounds of efficiency and economy. He urged that the Dáil should not be pinned to the expense which this would entail. Deputy Johnson supported him, but it seems to me his argument, if assented to, would lead to greater extravagance than is involved in this Section. The Section, as it stands, proposes to appoint Parliamentary Secretaries, and gives them a large amount of work to do, both in the Dáil and outside the Dáil. Deputy Johnson urges first, that the work they should discharge should not be nearly so comprehensive or so large as that outlined in the Section. I take it that to a certain extent it has been found necessary by the Ministry that some one should act or discharge the functions of an Assistant Minister. That appears to be considered necessary, and that is the reason why these appointments are suggested, and are termed "Parliamentary Secretaries."

If Deputy Johnson's point of view was carried into effect the function of Assistant Minister would still remain undischarged, and though there might be Parliamentary Secretaries appointed their labours would be confined to the Dáil. Later on the Ministry might find it essential to come along and say that the duties of Parliamentary Secretaries have been confined to the Dáil itself and that Assistant Ministers being essential, they would have to ask the Dáil to make provision for them. I think Deputy Johnson's suggestion would lead to greater extravagance than that outlined in this Bill. There are two more points I wish to make in regard to Deputy Figgis' amendment. He says, first, that he objects to this as being in a permanent statute, but the Section itself does not say that these Secretaries shall be appointed to the number of seven, but that the Executive Council may from time to time appoint such, and also that such appointments can be discontinued when found necessary. So that the danger of having what you would call a grotesque creature in a permanent statute need not unduly alarm the aesthetic sense of the Deputy. As to pressure of work, if ever there was a time when this Assembly is likely to be confronted with hard, strenuous and continuous work, I think it is in the immediate future. The work we have been doing so far was one of preventing the shipwreck of the State. The work that we will be engaged on in the future will be work of reconstruction. I do not know to what extent these Assistant Ministers or Parliamentary Secretaries may be appointed, but certainly the task of building up the State again upon sure, stable and efficient foundations is a task that I think will tax the energies, not only of Ministers, but of this Assembly, to a much greater extent than it has done while the main burden of the work was that of saving the State from destruction.

Mr. GOREY: I think a little too much has been made of the work the Assistant Ministers, as they are now called, did in the last Dáil. It was only in the last days of the last Dáil—I think it would be correct to say in the last few weeks—that most of the members of this Assembly became aware of the fact that Assistant Ministers were in existence at all. It was only when the Assistant Minister for Industry and Commerce had to answer questions here that most of the members became aware of the fact that such a Minister existed. The reason for his appointment, as everybody knows, was that the Minister for Industry and Commerce himself was engaged elsewhere, that 5 o'clock. he was not attending, or could not attend, to his Department, that all his time and energies were occupied outside of the Ministry of Industry and Commerce. For that reason an Assistant Minister became known here in the Dáil. The other Assistant Ministers that have been hinted at I do not think were known to this Dáil at all. They were absolutely unknown except to a few people in the inner circle of the Government.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: They are not known now.

Mr. GOREY: One reason perhaps that might justify these contemplated appointments would be that we might have a better attendance on the Government Benches than we sometimes have during the discussion of important Bills. The Government Benches might be somewhat better filled, and from that point of view it might be good. The reason given for the appointment of these Assistant Ministers is pressure of work. We all know that in the last Dáil there was considerable pressure of work. We had to begin from the foundation and try to evolve a new machinery of State. Will the Attorney-General tell us how long that process will take and when we shall have the full machinery constructed and working? When we have the normal machinery of the State constructed and working there will be no rush of Parliamentary business. We will only require to have Sessions of three or four weeks' duration two or three times a year. Then what will be the need for all these Secretaries and all this elaborate Government machinery? It is folly to tell us that there will be pressure of work after twelve months' sitting of the present Dáil. There will not be pressure of work. We ought to have some little sense of proportion and try to realise the smallness of the country that we have to deal with. I do not think that any case has been made out for these Assistant Ministers. We got on all right during the last Dáil when there was considerably more work to be done. The protection of the State that Deputy Milroy referred to and the work of erecting a legal machinery of the State had to be carried out. Still we did it, and I do not think there was any undue pressure. Now when, practically speaking, all this has been done, what do we want of Assistant Ministers? I do not think that a case has been made out for them and the people of the country do not think that a case has been made out. Of course the opinions of the people of the country do not carry very much weight, but I for one will vote for the amendment.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: It is a matter of regret, I think, that the President, in dealing with the case that I tried to put as temperately as I possibly could, should have dealt with it so intemperately as he did. When a man gets excited in his defence it is a fairly clear indication that his defence is none too good in his own judgment. He did not only become intemperate, he proceeded to become point-blank discourteous. I desire here to make a very strong protest against the deliberate discourtesy of which the President was guilty in this Dáil. He said that this case was faked to the knowledge of the newspapers who raised it and to the knowledge of the Deputy who had just spoken. I venture to say in the most quiet and emphatic way that I am not in the habit of making either faked or excited statements in this Dáil. They may be inaccurate, but they will not be inaccurate to my knowledge. If any Deputy deliberately and to his knowledge made a statement that is not true that statement should be called to order. But it was not made merely from an ordinary Deputy, but from the President himself. Yet what did he do? Having charged me with making a faked statement, he went on to say that everything I had stated was correct. I had stated that he did not want Parliamentary Secretaries—that he did not want persons who would act in connection with the service of this Dáil, and, therefore, that a case was not made out. What did he say? What was his defence against this “faked” allegation? He said we had to remember that there was much greater work to be done than the work in this Dáil, and he led one to infer from his words that those persons whom he requires—who I said were not required because it would not be work in this Dáil but outside—would be required because of work somewhere in the Government buildings.

In other words, he takes up the very case I have made; he under-scores every statement that I made, and having done so he says it is a faked statement. I repeat that the President's own words have made it clear that Parliamentary Secretaries are not intended and are not wanted. What is wanted—seeing that the word efficiency has been used I will use it, too—is a more efficient administration in the Civil Service, because the assistance that is certainly and clearly required is assistance required in connection with work in preparation for this Dáil. Those are the President's words. He wanted those persons in connection with work of preparation for this Dáil. That work—I repeat his words—is not the work of Parliamentary Secretaries: that is the work of Civil Servants.

Deputy Cooper supported the desire for a decrease in the number of the so-called Under-Secretaries, but he said there was one advantage that occurred to him in having them, and that was that their appointment might tend to reduce the total number of Ministers.

When Deputy Cooper says that he states it because he sincerely believes it. I am sorry, but he has not convinced me that the Ministers or the Ministerial party intend to reduce the Ministers by one. Deputy Professor O'Sullivan made a very strange and quaint allegation against myself as one of the supporters of this amendment, that I had not stated what precise functions these Parliamentary Secretaries were to fulfil. The complaint I had made was that nobody else had stated what precise functions they were to fulfil, that nobody had discovered what precise functions they were to fulfil, but they were not to be Under-Secretaries. Reference has been made to Under-Secretaries in another Parliament. Everybody knows what caused the creation of such Under-Secretaries. It is that if a Minister is appointed in England from the House of Lords, he must be represented in the House of Commons. Therefore another Minister, called an Under-Secretary, represents that Department in the House of Commons, or vice versa. That is the cause of the creation of them. But it is a principle of the Constitution that Ministers are responsible to this Dáil and will be appointed from this Dáil. It is in connection with the Parliamentary work of this Dáil that such persons are required, if they are required at all, and I say that in connection with the Parliamentary work of this Dáil there has been no case made out for the appointment of such Under-Secretaries.

That statement I made when I first spoke, and I base it once again, not upon the arguments I might produce here, but upon the statement of the President himself. The President stated to-day, as he stated on the Second Reading, that such persons were wanted in connection with work elsewhere than in the Dáil: in other words, Civil Servants. If we are going to have a Civil Service, let the Civil Servants do that work, and let the staffs be arranged for them to do it. If Parliamentary Secretaries or Assistant Ministers are required, they should be required in connection with the work of the Dáil. The President has practically admitted the whole case I made in the first instance, and I intend, therefore, to press that there is no occasion, according to the case made by the President himself, whatever, at this time above any other time for the appointment of any additional highly-paid offices in the State.

Mr. DAVIN: At an earlier stage of the discussion on this Bill the President, in an attempt to justify the Bill to the people of the country, made the statement that in the last Dáil there were three Parliamentary Secretaries. I asked him to name the individuals, but I did not get an answer. I frankly admit, as far as I am personally concerned, that I have no knowledge whatever of the existence of Parliamentary Secretaries in the Third Dáil. During the discussions on the Estimates we had a feeling that certain members of the Government Party were doing certain work. We scanned the Estimates very closely to find out under which, or under what heading, these men were being paid for their work. We were told, and Deputy Gorey has reminded the Dáil of it, that there was an Assistant Minister for Industry and Commerce. I do not know, and I would like the Minister who replies to inform the Dáil, under what heading or Estimate the salary of that Minister was provided for in the Third Dáil. If no provision was made for any salary in addition to the £360 yearly that the Deputy was in receipt of, then I say that makes the case for the amendment proposed by Deputy Figgis. If men were found in the Third Dáil to perform these duties at the yearly salary of £360, I say it is an additional argument in favour of the abolition of this Section. I am personally inclined to think that if the Dáil assents to the passing of the Section, it will create such keen rivalry between supporters of the Government, who may be looking for these positions, that it will do the Government no good.

I rose mainly for the purpose of making the point that if Parliamentary Secretaries did exist in the last Dáil, and were paid salaries, in addition to the salaries they received as Deputies, I think the Ministry is misleading the Dáil, unless it tells it under what Estimate the salaries were provided. If no additional salaries were paid to these men, then I think that is the best argument we could put forward in support of the amendment.

Mr. P. J. EGAN: I have listened to a great deal of criticism as to the necessity or otherwise for these extra Parliamentary Secretaries. I have no experience of the last Dáil, nor do I know what the duties of the Ministers were then, but since I came to the present Dáil I have been impressed with one fact, and that, in my judgment, is that Ministers here are decidedly overworked. It will be within the recollection of the Dáil that a short time ago, owing to the other duties of Ministers the Front Bench happened to be empty on one occasion. At the time the President was engaged in very intricate work in connection with industrial disputes and Ministers generally had great burdens placed on their shoulders, owing to their work outside the Dáil. I think it was Deputy Byrne who immediately called attention to the fact that the Government Bench was empty and proceeded to move the adjournment of the Dáil. As far as I understand, the appointment of these Secretaries will make for greater efficiency in the carrying on of the work of the Dáil and for this reason I am opposed to the deletion of this Section. Deputy Hewat, I think, objected to the appointment of these Secretaries, and I think he took occasion to make an attempt to establish a sort of entente cordiale with Deputy Johnson on the head of it. I sincerely hope the entente will develop with very great effects in other directions. I think Deputy Hewat, as a prominent Dublin business man, will agree that no matter what else counts business efficiency should be the first consideration. I do not think it is possible, from the little I have seen of the work of the Dáil, that Ministers could conceivably carry on these duties efficiently without more help. I do not think the country ought to be too critical in a matter of this kind. After all the Ministry are carrying on the biggest business in the State, the running of the State itself, and for that reason I support the appointments.

Mr. HEWAT: In connection with Section 7, Deputy Egan has very rightly, I think, stated that efficiency in business is more important even than economy. Agreed. Deputy Egan has also stated that Ministers are overworked. I do not think any member of the Dáil is inclined to be too critical about affording any assistance Ministers require for carrying on their work efficiently. But the Bill before us is not a Bill for the present time. It is not a Bill to meet the urgencies or the needs of the present time. It is a Bill for all time, and when I find the Government asking for authority to appoint seven Parliamentary Secretaries it immediately occurs to me that this is a very unsuitable time, when the Minister for Finance is calling for economy all round, to put forward any such proposition. More particularly is it an unsuitable time, and also unnecessary, as the President tells us he has no intention of appointing seven. That seems to be very contradictory. I do not see why it is necessary to put a Bill through the Dáil which is going to create for all time seven Parliamentary Secretaries, when the President says there is no intention of appointing more than three. I am in disagreement with the Section. On the other hand, as regards the claim that Ministers are overworked, I imagine that is a difficulty which, if Ministers come to the Dáil, will be sympathetically dealt with here, and that the Dáil will provide any assistance that may be required for the time being. If this Section is going to go through in its present form I see no reason why I should be called upon, as a business man, to vote for something that is not shown to be necessary, and which is making provision for appointments that will be very awkward in the future in connection with the administration of the affairs of the State.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: May I

point out that my amendment, No. 33, limits the number of paid Parliamentary Secretaries, in conjunction with Ministers, to a total of fifteen. Deputy Hewat should know that is a Government amendment and consequently the Government is not proposing to appoint seven paid Parliamentary Secretaries.

Mr. JOHNSON: The objection that I have to this differs somewhat from that raised by Deputy Hewat, and perhaps Deputy Figgis to some extent. I do not stress what is called economy in this matter. I am doubtful whether the economy argument is very effective except on this ground, that a Parliamentary Secretary, who has to do the work of a civil servant, is less likely to be the most efficient man for that particular job than a duly appointed civil servant would be. He is liable to be changed every four years at least and that does not usually conduce to efficiency in detailed work. But I would draw attention to the Constitution respecting the limitation of the number of Ministers. The number was deliberately limited to twelve, and it was not for the purpose of limiting the number of Departments but for limiting the number of paid members of the Dáil in office. There was a deliberation in limiting the number to twelve, the desire to limit the number of Deputies who would be appointed to paid office. The effect of this Section is to cancel that section of the Constitution. A more straightforward way of arriving at the end, if it is necessary to have a larger number of Ministers, is to introduce a change in the Constitution. The Section, as presented, would allow of nineteen Deputies, and as things are, apparently those nineteen Deputies would necessarily be of the Party which was in the majority for the time being. In the case of the present Dáil that would be very nearly equivalent to one out of three paid out of State funds, and even with a limitation to fifteen it would be round about one out of four. I imagine that the number twelve is the maximum that we should concede as members of the Ministry paid out of the Central Fund or out of moneys provided by the Oireachtas—political appointments. The services to be rendered by these Parliamentary Secre-

aries, as has already been pointed out, are the services of a higher civil servant attached to the Ministry, for the purpose of his parliamentary work, if you like, but certainly the work of higher civil servants, and not members of the political majority for the time being. I imagine that the work would be more efficiently done by such servants, but I do not think there will be a large saving from the £1,200 suggested here. Therefore it is not from the point of view of saving. You may appoint as Parliamentary Secretary a cantankerous or a persistent member of your party who is likely to be a thorn in your side unless he gets an appointment—that is the experience in other Parliaments and we may not be free from similar characteristics—but the buying off of opposition by an appointment of this kind ought not to be possible. Bear in mind that the Constitution has laid it down that the President, in nominating his Executive Council, shall lay their names before the Dáil and get its assent, and that the Ministers who are not members of the Executive Council shall be appointed by the Dáil. But this proposition, so far from securing or requiring the endorsement of the Dáil, is to give authority either to these Ministers or the Executive Council to appoint a Deputy as Parliamentary Secretary or Assistant Minister to administrative office, though a political appointment, irrespective of the sanction of the Dáil. In the other case the sanction of the Dáil has to be secured. In this case there is no suggestion that such sanction will be required, and you will find yourselves in this position, that you may appoint a Deputy to be in charge of Local Government, or Agriculture, or Education, and that a defeated man, if there has been a contest, could be appointed over your heads by the Minister. True it is, of course, that the Minister is liable to the condemnation of the Dáil, but again you will be faced with the choice either of agreeing to the Minister's nomination or forcing his resignation, and that is not the kind of choice that should be put forward too often. You may say that for administrative purposes the Minister would be too valuable, and you would allow the undesirable thing to be passed rather than force a resignation. I submit that the constitutional intention is being evaded by the introduction of this Section.

Mr. BLYTHE: Unfortunately I was absent during part of the debate, and some of the points that I may make may have been made already. There would be no use in a Parliamentary Secretary in the sense of a person who was not going to make himself familiar with the working of a Department and take his share in the work, with authority to take some definite departmental responsibility off the Minister's shoulders. There would be no use in a Parliamentary Secretary whose duties were confined to the Dáil. There was some confusion about that point when the Bill was introduced. I myself happen to have had experience of the working of two or three Departments. I am quite satisfied that there can be no justification for having eleven or twelve Ministers and seven Parliamentary Secretaries. I believe that the appointment of as many as seven Parliamentary Secretaries could only be justified if we were appointing under the charge of one Minister two or more of the Departments of State. In these circumstances it was suggested by one Deputy that it might be as well to say: "Have only seven Ministers and three Parliamentary Secretaries." I agree that I could conceive circumstances when that would be the best arrangement that could be made, and I think that it would be well to be able to make that arrangement. On the other hand, there are Departments, even as matters stand, which, I think, require, and will continue to require, the services of somebody in addition to the Ministers. You have matters that can only be decided by somebody who is not a Civil Servant. I think that it would be bad to have Parliamentary Secretaries for work that should properly be done by Civil Servants, and I say that the Civil Servant who spends his whole life at the work, who is not likely to be removed at the end of four years, can do work much better than a Parliamentary Secretary; but there are matters continually arising where the Civil Servant cannot go ahead without guidance, without the laying down of a policy by somebody who is not a Civil Servant.

Even some of the matters into which policy enters are in some respect matters of detail. They create precedents which involve the decision of somebody who is either a Minister, or, if you like to call him so, an Assistant Minister. In the Department of Finance, for instance, I believe there will always be need for a Parliamentary Secretary. Even allowing for the conditions of the present time, and the extra work that arises out of these conditions, I believe that it will be impossible almost at any time for any Minister for Finance to give attention to the matters that require what I call Ministerial decisions I know, so far as I have been in office, that there are many matters, whole sections of work, to which I have not been able to give any attention whatever, sections which would repay Ministerial attention. Then, apart from Ministries that would require, I think, at all times a Parliamentary Secretary, there are other Ministries that would require them in the present circumstances. Take the Ministry of Defence. Whether a Parliamentary Secretary would be permanently required there or not is a matter that would depend on the future army organisation, on the type of army you had, whether you had an army of the present or a territorial type. It would depend on a variety of circumstances, and I am certainly aware that at present, in view of the financial matters surrounding army administration, and the financial matters requiring a clearance of things that arose in times of stress and difficulty, the appointment of a Parliamentary Secretary would be economy in the present circumstances. I have no doubt that the appointment of somebody with, as it were, Parliamentary authority, and with the status that would come from being a Parliamentary Secretary, as apart from being a Civil Servant, would result in efficiency and improvement in financial administration that would repay his salary very many times, and would be a source of great satisfaction to those concerned with the financial administration of the army. The matter is simply one of facing our own problems. We have been told about the number of Ministers elsewhere, and we have had comparisons drawn between this country and Australia and other places. We have our own difficulties; we have problems of order, finance, and land of our own particular type. If we escape some of the problems of new countries, we have our own. It is not always a wise thing to go too far in the way of relying entirely upon the Civil Service. The fewer Ministries you have, the fewer Ministers you have, the more you depend on the Civil Service. The wider the scope of the Minister's Department, the less he can go into any matter in it, and the more he has to rely on his staff, not merely for integrity and fair dealing, but for the formation and execution of policy, and for the actual framing of measures to carry the policy into effect. You could have unnecessary duplication, but you have to learn to some extent by experience here. We might find it possible when we get normal times, and Civil Servants accustomed to the new conditions and the responsibilities that are thrown on Civil Servants by self-government, a Civil Service recruited and trained in the new school, and with its mind fixed on the problems of work and of government as it exists, to do with very little more than the seven Ministers, without speaking of Parliamentary Secretaries at all, but that time is certainly a very considerable way ahead. My own opinion is that for some time we could not go on very well with a lesser number of Ministers, and without, at any rate, two or three Parliamentary Secretaries. If circumstances change there will be opportunities of reducing the number, but we are providing machinery not for all time, but for some reasonable length of time. We are providing not simply what may be necessary for this year or next year. We should at least anticipate that what we are providing here will serve the needs of a reasonable number of years. I am convinced that we will need two or three Parliamentary Secretaries for a very considerable time, even apart from any reduction in the number of Ministers. So far as we can judge as to how business will go from the experience we have had, we certainly will require to put in a number of Parliamentary Secretaries who will take some section of the work from the Ministers, and give that guidance in policy and make those decisions that Civil Servants cannot make in a satisfactory way. Everyone knows that when in the rush of business, and the position was very difficult, all of us were giving attention to matters largely concerned with the preservation of the State and the defeat of the Irregulars, when there was a certain amount of neglect of Departments, and when Ministers could not give their minds to the work of the Departments, it was impossible for the Departments to go along under our present system of control.

Until we have settled down, until the Civil Service here, which was not created as a Civil Service for an Irish State, has grown accustomed to the new responsibility, until the ordinary routine machinery is working well and smoothly, until we have had some experience of its efficiency, it would be false economy to cut down the provision made in this Bill. I never heard it stated that it was intended to provide that no more than 12 members of the Dáil should hold political office. I think it was intended to provide that there should not be an unnecessary sub-division of the Departments of State, that there should be a limited number of people actually, primarily and, if I may say so, personally responsible to the Dáil for the carrying on of the work of the State. I did not hear the other suggestion made at all.

MR. DARRELL FIGGIS: I would like to make acknowledgment, if I may, of the candour and—I say, by way of contrast—the courtesy with which the Minister for Finance made the case for this Section. He has admitted that there is, at least, some argument on the side of those who wish to have the provision for Parliamentary Secretaries removed. I am perfectly willing to admit that there is a great deal to be said for the case that is urged, but I think the great consideration at the moment is that it is unwise to proceed with this Section now. I desire to draw attention to one argument the Minister brought forward, which is certain to have effect on the future of the State. He said, as well as I recollect, that he hoped to see the day that there would be seven Ministries and seven Parliamentary Secretaries. The Minister will recall that about a year ago, in the Dáil, there was a certain very mordant critic of the Executive provisions of the draft Constitution, who said that that would be the exact result that would be ultimately achieved. I agree with that critic that it will be achieved; it is being achieved. If that were to come about—as it could come about and can come about despite the provisions of the subsequent amendment in the name of the Attorney-General, to which he has referred—it would mean that the provisions of the Constitution, providing for the existence of Ministers who should not be members of the Executive Council would have been automatically and quite neatly and deftly dodged.

The Minister, replying to my argument that this was work fundamentally for civil servants, said that while a great deal of the work could be done by civil servants, there comes a moment when a decision is necessary which cannot be taken by a civil servant, but must be taken by someone in charge of policy. I appreciate that fully, but I do say that that decision will have to be taken, not by the Parliamentary Secretary, but by the Minister, and that the Parliamentary Secretary himself will be running to the Minister for a decision in exactly the same way as the civil servant would. Therefore, I hold that the case has not been made, and that this Section should be deleted from the Bill.

MR. HEWAT: It seems to me that the Minister for Finance, in his statement, has really put forward the argument that three Parliamentary Secretaries are required. He has never tried to make a case for any more. The next amendment, No. 28, confines the number to three. Would the Government say that they would accept that?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: No. 33 is the Government amendment.

MR. HEWAT: The amendment to

which I refer is No. 28, which confines the number of Parliamentary Secretaries to three instead of seven.

The PRESIDENT: We would not be in a position to accept that because it would not effect the purpose that has just been indicated by the Minister for Finance and which, I think, was also indicated by myself the last day—that the time might come when there would be a fewer number of Ministers than is proposed now and a greater number of Parliamentary Secretaries. The amendment that would be acceptable is the one in which, it is stated that the number of Ministers and Parliamentary Secretaries would not exceed fifteen.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I understand that the amendment before the Dáil is amendment 27.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I am well aware of that.

Amendment 28 (Section 7):—

In sub-section (1), line 34, to delete the word "seven" and to substitute therefor the word "three."—Bryan Cooper, Connor Hogan, Seán O Duinnin, Mícheál O hÍfearnáin.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I put down this amendment in order to try and discover why seven was selected as the number of Parliamentary Secretaries.

There was no explanation given on the Second Reading. I do not know whether the Government look upon the number as a lucky one, or whether they visualised the Parliamentary Secretaries gathering together and reading Wordsworth. The amendment, No. 33, which is in the name of the Attorney-General meets my point, which is that there shall not be more than three Secretaries. I think it is more flexible as it does not tie the Government down.

I do not propose to move my amendment, but, of course, I cannot bind the Deputies on my left.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN: I beg to move the following amendment:—

“ In sub-section 1, line 34, to delete the word ‘ seven,’ and substitute therefor the word ‘ three.’ ”

I do so for the reason that we have already passed the incipient stage in the functions of Government. The Ministers are no longer with the sword in one hand and the trowel in the other. I notice that the Attorney-General and the Minister for Finance have put down at the end of Section 31 “ provided the total number of persons who shall at any one time be in receipt of salaries as Ministers or Parliamentary Secretaries shall not exceed 15.” Superficially that is very fair, but while we listened to the Minister he pointed out it was the probable intention of the Executive Council, sooner or later, that each Minister would assume more than one Department, possibly two or three; in other words, the Executive Council would concentrate all power and authority in their hands, and they would work through subordinate Parliamentary Secretaries. I hold that violates the spirit of the Constitution, which expressly provides for Extern Ministries. I think when that was adopted here twelve months ago it was pointed out that some certain Departments might see their work and functions were more of an official rather than a political character, and would realise it would be wrong and contrary to public policy to have those come within party scope. The function of the Dáil, in those circumstances, was to control those by having Ministers directly responsible to the Dáil. For that reason I move my amendment.

Mr. HOGAN (Galway): What has this amendment to do with the question of External Ministers?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Is that a rhetorical question on the part of the Minister for Agriculture?

Amendment put and negatived.

Mr. MORRISSEY: I beg to move the
Vol. 5.

following amendment:—

“ In sub-section (1), line 36, to delete the word ‘ Ministers ’ and to substitute therefor the word ‘ Councillors.’ ”

The phrase in the Section “ Executive Ministers,” as a description of the Ministers who are members of the Executive Council, seems to suggest that the other Ministers are not Executive Officers but are merely administrative or some other sort of inferior Ministers. I think it is important that the dignity and status of these Ministers should be maintained and they should be protected from even inferential slight. If a short description is needed the phrase “ Executive Councillor ” suggests itself. In England or Canada you have the term “ Privy Councillor,” and turning to more honourable bodies, you have the “ Executive Councillors ” of Trade Unions.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I would like to ask, pertinent to the amendment moved, what is the meaning of the words “ Executive Ministers.” Are not all Ministers Executive Ministers?

Mr. JOHNSON: Are we not to have any response from the Ministerial Benches in regard to this matter? Are we to understand that the amendment is accepted? Are we not to be told that it is accepted?

The PRESIDENT: I thought the amendment was unconstitutional. I believe that in the Constitution it is laid down that they should be Ministers, and if you want to call them any other name it would be in conflict with the Constitution. I did not think it was necessary to say that.

Mr. JOHNSON: It is not in accordance with the Constitution that only certain Ministers shall be called Executive Ministers. I take it a Minister has Executive responsibility even though he is not responsible with the Council. To say that a man is an Executive Minister, and to suggest that only he is an Executive Minister and that non-Executive Council Ministers have no Executive responsibility, is an interpretation of the term that is very foreign to me. I imagine at least the Minister for Fisheries, for instance, [Mr. Johnson.] has Executive responsibility for the work of his Department. Perhaps the Attorney-General will tell us whether that is so or not according to the Constitution.

Captain REDMOND: He will look it up.

Mr. JOHNSON: I do not think it is requisite that he should look it up. He knows quite well from memory that the Minister is responsible for the Executive work of his Department. The phrase in the Section quite clearly would confine the responsibility for Executive work to those who are members of the Executive Council. Whether the term suggested in the amendment, "Executive Councillors," is the best, I am not going to say, but I believe it is very much better than Executive Ministers, and it is a surprising interpretation of Constitutional requirements for the President to say that we are bound to call them Executive Ministers.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I would like to repeat the question that I put and that seems to have aroused a certain amount of derision from Deputy Magennis. Every Minister is an Executive Minister, but these words suggest that certain Ministers only are Executive Ministers. I do urge that the better form of words could be devised. I admit I do not like the word "Councillors"; it has not gathered round it either very excellent traditions or procedure; but I do suggest you might use the word "Secretaries" to the Executive Council, or to Ministers being members of the Executive Council. That, I think, would meet the case with persons who had been appointed as Ministers by the Dáil and not as members of the Executive Council, but who were nevertheless Executive Ministers.

Professor MAGENNIS: The point made by Deputy Figgis merely illustrates the remark that I made in an aside, and which, of course, was unparliamentary and not meant for the general hearing. It may be out of order to repeat it. What I said was that when Deputy Figgis is ignorant he is fearfully ignorant. He might have noticed, when he was furnished with a copy of the Standing Orders, which includes, among other documents, for the enlightenment of the members of the Dáil, a copy of the Constitution, there is an index to the Constitution beneficently provided to make it easy for Deputies to consult, at moments of stress and difficulty, the original version. On page 196, under the head of Executive Authorities, we get the number of Ministers. That is, the number of Ministers with Executive Authority.

The point is merely a small dictionary point, and Deputy Johnson is quite correct in saying that a Minister, in so far as he is at the head of a department, has Executive duties, but that is commonly called administrative work, and is exercised in the administration of the law and the carrying out of public administration. The term "Executive" has a specific meaning in our Constitution, and from Articles 50 to 56 what that specific meaning is, is stated in the most unmistakable fashion. Executive authority is to be exercised through the Executive Council, and the number of Ministers constituting the Executive Council is laid down to be not less than five and not more than seven. Then there are to be other Ministers, and these Ministers are not to be members of the Executive Council. At the time of the setting up of these arrangements, it was declared that it was for the better administration of their departments that they were not to be charged with the joint Executive responsibility which pertains to each member of the Executive Council, and to all of them. Those outside Ministers, by the way, are not necessarily to be appointed, but may be appointed—the clause is permissive. They have no Executive responsibility, no share in the Executive responsibility within the meaning of "Executive" in the Constitution. They are responsible for the administration of their departments, if, and when they exist, direct to the Dáil. There would be no room for mistake, it is true. So far, Deputy Johnson is right. "Executive Ministers" can only mean one thing for those familiar with the Constitution, and who will read the legislation of this Dáil with particular reference to the Constitution. But for people who have not any acquaintance with the Constitution it would be simpler undoubtedly if it read "Ministers who are members of the Executive Council." There is no question of policy or loss of principle in the matter. It is merely a question of what is or what is not a more desirable form of words. I would have assumed—and I would be surprised if it was an undue assumption—that every member of the Dáil is perfectly familiar with the terms of the Constitution. Constitutionally the Executive is a Council. I have not to look at these matters, but I am accustomed to document statements, no matter how sure I am of the facts. It is exactly what the Attorney-General would do in court. No matter how well he knows the law, he would make sure that he would cite for the Judge the particular case which is his authority. The fact of consulting a copy of the Constitution, before declaring what is in the Constitution, is in no sense an admission of being familiar with its contents.

MR. JOHNSON: I would just suggest that Deputy Magennis, while giving very excellent advice very shortly before told the Dáil that to understand what was in the Constitution the only thing they had to do was to consult the index. I agree that the matter is not a matter of principle at all. It is a matter of terminology and convenience. I would suggest that if we take from this Bill the term "Executive Minister," then it becomes fixed in everybody's mind that the Ministers who are members of the Executive Council are members of the Executive Authority, and that those without the Executive Council are the Ministers with Executive Authority for the work of their Departments. The implication will be in the minds of those not familiar with the Constitution—even Deputies of the Dáil are not familiar with the Constitution—that the Ministers who are not members of the Executive Council are not in the same position of having Executive control over their own department. That is the kind of inference that will inevitably grow out of the adoption of this phrase. I suggest that without pinning great faith to the phrase "Executive Councillors" that it is better than "Executive Ministers" to describe the members of the Executive Council.

Captain REDMOND: The term Executive Minister seems to suggest that it is an exclusive one and that the other Ministers are not Executive in the same respect. Now we have been referred, not for the first time, to the Constitution. On looking at the Constitution, I discover under Article 55 that these Ministers are described in a very simple way. The total number of Ministers, including Ministers of the Executive Council, shall not exceed twelve. Well, I do not see why the Government could not adopt the wording of the Constitution and I think it would put out of our minds and the minds of the general public this misconception. It is only a verbal alteration.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I would like to remind the Dáil, without referring to the index, that this phrase has already been used in a number of Acts passed by the Dáil, perhaps in its less critical moods. In some of the more recent Acts it has become practically an established term and so it seems a very convenient term, to define the Ministers who are responsible primarily for the general Executive Government. We have no Privy Council, and I would suggest to the Party opposite that it would not be well to introduce the savour of that institution as we did know it in the past. We have escaped certain consequences perhaps that might accrue from such an institution. We do not want, on the other hand, to introduce the other analogy, and I suggest that the term "Councillor," from whatever angle you look at it, is not the best epithet to apply to a Minister, at any rate when you are describing him with good will. I suggest that the expression which has already received the legislative sanction of the Dáil should now be adhered to as the most convenient phrase.

Amendment put and negatived.

Mr. EAMON DOYLE: I beg to propose:—

"In sub-section (2), line 38, to delete the words 'this section' and to substitute therefor the words 'the next preceding sub-section.'"

[Mr. Eamon Doyle.]

Although this has been dealt with, as a matter of fact, on other occasions, it is really only a drafting amendment to the new sub-section proposed to be inserted before sub-section 3, so as to admit of the appointment of Parliamentary Secretaries to Ministers who are not members of the Executive Council. It can, therefore, be deferred if An Ceann Comhairle gives leave until those later amendments are disposed of, since it would become necessary in the event of their defeat. It would not make any real difference to the Bill, as it stands, if it were accepted, regardless of what happens to the other amendments. Therefore, I beg leave to move the amendment.

Amendment 30 put and agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move Amendment 31. Before sub-section (3) to insert two new sub-sections:—

(3) A Minister who is not a member of the Executive Council may, with the approval of Dáil Eireann expressed by resolution, appoint a person being a member of the Oireachtas to be his Parliamentary Secretary, and may at any time remove a Parliamentary Secretary so appointed.

(4) Every person appointed under the next preceding sub-section shall continue to hold office only so long as he continues to be a member of the Oireachtas, and the Minister by whom he was appointed continues to hold his office.

I should like to be allowed to alter the term "Oireachtas" in both sub-sections to the word "Dáil." The intention here is clear enough. It is intended to allow Ministers who are not in the Executive Council the same privilege, shall I call it, as members of the Executive Council who shall hold office, and the Secretaries shall hold office only so long as the Minister who appointed them continues to hold office. The possibilities are that if there is a case made for Secretaries to Ministers who are members of the Executive Council because of the pressure of work, the Department in charge of External Ministers may also be overworked and Secretaries appointed. It is even more important for non-Executive Ministers to have a right to appoint a Secretary, inasmuch as he may not be a member of the Dáil. It is possible for a Minister not a member of the Executive Council to be appointed from outside the Dáil. Therefore, in such a case it would be convenient for that Minister to have a right to nominate a Parliamentary Secretary. I move these sub-sections 3 and 4.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: It is proposed to accept the amendment moved by Deputy Johnson.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The amendment will therefore read with the word "Oireachtas" wherever it occurs altered to the word "Dáil."

Amendment put and agreed to.

And it being 6.30 p.m., and Private Business being set down by Order, it was decided to report progress.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS BILL, 1923—Second Stage (resumed).

Motion made and question again proposed:—"That this Bill be now read a Second time" (Mr. Johnson).

Mr. HEWAT: By the courtesy of the Dáil, I am in a position to continue the remarks I was expressing on the Bill on the last occasion that the Bill was before the Dáil. I then put forward, as a business man representing businessmen, that the proposition contained in this Bill for nationalisation of the railways was not acceptable to them, and as this is the foundation of the Bill, I was speaking against its acceptance by the Dáil. If we turn to the financial Sections of the Bill, they are, of course, of a confiscatory nature, and I rather gather from Deputy Johnson that they have been embodied owing to the example set by the Minister for Agriculture in his Land Bill.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE took the chair at this stage.

Mr. HEWAT: This Dáil has the right, subject to public opinion, of confiscation, but in cases of this sort, where there is a very definite value placed on securities of a commercial nature, I do not think this Dáil would agree that the people holding these securities, in the event of their being required for national purposes, should get less, but rather more, than their market value. I will not dwell on this, because I think the Leader of the Opposition would be the first to admit that principle, and, therefore, I do not think it is necessary, at this stage, to go beyond saying that the Bill proposes to acquire certain things from individuals at less than their value. I think that is a bad principle on which to start the question of the nationalisation of the railways or the nationalisation of anything else. When we turn to the administration that is proposed to be set up in connection with the Bill, we find that it is proposed to put the railways under the management of a Board of Control. At the head of that Board is to be a Director, and his qualifications are to be qualifications in administering railways, and generally of being in the position to be able to manage them. I rather think that if this Bill was passed, this Dáil would be on the look out for a super-man, and as well as being a super-man in connection with railway administration, he would also have to be a man of a very philosophic temperament, because he is supposed to manage the railways, and after all, the management of the railways would not be, if left in his own hands, a task beyond his powers. But, coupled with that, he is to have a Board. Now, this Board is set up, and I take no exception to it, nor do I cavil at it, but it is set up from a political standpoint. It is a purely political Board. In the first place, pride of place, if I may say so, is given to business men. You have a business man representing manufacturers, and another business man representing commerce as a whole.

No doubt, in the selection of these men by the Ministry and the Executive Council, due regard will be paid to their qualifications as good citizens and as worthy representatives of trade and commerce. But, they would be sitting on this Board with a very definite interest in securing for trade and commerce certain facilities and certain rates. After that, the Bill provides for labour representation. It will not trouble any member of the Dáil to come to the conclusion that labour would be sitting on this Board with a very definite object, too. Then there are two representatives of agriculture. In connection with that, we have heard the Farmers' Party say that they had arrived at a point at which they cannot pay rents, rates or taxes. It would not be a far stretching of the imagination to say that their position on this Board of Control would lead them to say that they could not pay transport charges either, and possibly they might claim, in addition to free transport by the railways that they should also be provided with steamships to transport their goods to other countries, and make the case that owing to the rate of exchange, or some other cause, they were unable to compete with these countries. In addition to these representatives of trade and commerce and labour, you have got a representative of the Ministry of Finance, whose business, I suppose, it would be to see that there was no money spent on anything.

This Board that is to be set up may be good from a political standpoint, but from a commercial standpoint I fancy that no one will accept it as a Board that any body of business men would put over any concern to be managed in the interests of shareholders. After all, you in this case would be the shareholders, so that the hope of any dividend accruing from such an organisation and arrangement would be very slight indeed.

This Bill is very ambitious. It is not satisfied with the arrangement of, or the control of, the railways, but it also provides for the management of telegraphs, roads and transport. One thing it does not provide anything for, and that is the unfortunate travelling public. It seems to me that the man in the street, or the ordinary travelling member of the community, or the man that uses the railways in a small way, would be in the position of having to pay the piper without being able to call the tune, or even without any effect on the tune, and for fear that this unfortunate man might escape the nets set out to trap him in his ordinary daily life, there is a provision in the Bill giving control of the roads, posts and everything else. It would seem to me to be setting up a kind of State nationalisation which would very effectively interfere with the liberty of the subject. For instance, if this national school teacher that we heard of, with his motor car, thought that he would make use of it in preference to the railway, I suppose we might conceive the possibility of his being told that he had no right to use his motor car, that he must use the railway because it is State owned, and incidentally he might be refused the right to use the roads. Speaking as a business man, I say that we want as little interference as possible by the State in connection with the carrying on of our business.

We do not approve of State interference more than is necessary. This Bill is the essence of State interference. If the Dáil were disposed to accept this Bill as it stands, or to pass the Second Reading of it, I feel sure that it would do an immense amount of harm in connection with enterprises as a whole. In other words, business can be better carried on in an atmosphere of confidence and initiative and enterprise by business men, who will not be affected by undue interference by the State. In the particular case of the railways, I said on the last occasion I saw no reason why that they should be put in any preferential position to other businesses that are carried on in the ordinary way. It may be that they are larger than the ordinary businesses and that their ramifications are greater, but there is nothing wrong with the railways, and this Dáil cannot put right what has to be put right under private ownership. I venture to think that under private ownership a certain amount of control always exists in connection with the railways of the country. I see Deputy Johnson smiles, but from their start there was that control, because when they were built, in exchange for the facilities given to them, they were required to do certain things. Under the conditions they work, and under the control which this Dáil has the power of putting into operation, the development of the railways will satisfy, in my opinion, all the reasonable demands of trade and of the public to be supplied with the best service that can be supplied and the best facilities that can be afforded.

Deputy Johnson in introducing this Bill told the Dáil that we are not going to get anything out of State control. That was very honest considering he is bringing in this Bill, but that is the fact. Under no conceivable circumstances can either the public, or anybody else, except perhaps the people who are going to get salaries out of it, acquire any benefits that private enterprise will not give them, if private enterprise is surrounded with security so as to carry on its business and develop itself in a peaceful and favourable atmosphere. The fostering of that spirit in connection with industry will do far more for the country than interference by the State in matters which, I submit, it is not capable of handling in a way that private enterprise will handle any business concern.

Mr. WOULFE: I think the Dáil owes more or less a debt of gratitude to Deputy Johnson for bringing forward this matter for consideration, because, as everybody knows, this question of the regulation of the railways has been before the public for a very long time. As far back as I can remember, there has been talk of this, but the circumstances were different. About 30 or 40 years ago it was discussed, but it was then discussed from a different standpoint. It was discussed from what you might call the top downwards. The reasons were quite different for proposing nationalisation then as compared with to-day. At that time there was more or less dissatisfaction with the management—with the top parts of the railways. There was complaint that some of the Chairmen and others were too old and past their work; that they were not enterprising enough, and did not push things forward sufficiently. Some people had the idea that if there was nationalisation all these things could be set right, and that a new state of affairs could be brought about. It was more or less an academie sort of discussion; there was no reality in it. From that day to this is quite a long time. We are up against it in reality now. During the war we had experience of what nationalisation might be under Government control. The Government took over the railways in Ireland as solvent concerns working well. There were people then who grumbled about the railways, more or less, but there were no extraordinary complaints about inefficiency. What is the result? When the war was at an end the Government handed back the railways in an utterly insolvent condition, so that it would be impossible for the management of any of the railways to carry on, unless the high wages they were compelled to pay were lowered, and this does not seem hitherto to have been possible. Therefore, the railways were in an insolvent state. Deputy Johnson proposes as a remedy that these insolvent railways should be presented to the nation in order to guarantee the high wages which the railways under normal conditions cannot possibly pay—that the nation should, for the honour and glory of maintaining the railways, pay these exorbitant and uneconomic wages. I do not think that is a proposition that the nation as a whole would agree to.

There are three great classes concerned in this: the workers, the owners and those who use the railways. The workers at present are in a very good position. They are taking a large proportion of the receipts. So much so that if it were not for the money that was given by the English Government when the railways were handed back there would be no attempt to pay a dividend at all. That has been the result of nationalisation so far. Have the railways here done so badly for us that we should wish the State to take them over? It is due to the Boards of Directors to say that throughout their systems they have established in many places the only decent hotels in these places. If it were not for these hotels in large districts of the country probably there would be no tourist traffic at all. In a great many wild districts particularly there is nothing approaching a hotel where anything of the commonest order can be decently cooked. The railways have done that much for us. Moreover, if you travel through the world—as for my sins, perhaps, I have done—and travel on State Railways in Central Europe, India and other places, you will come to the conclusion that our poor railways here at home are not so bad after all—that they are not badly laid and that the comfort of the travelling public is not disregarded to such an extent as people would have you think. Many years ago, when at school in a town in Germany, I used to amuse myself watching the trains passing on a certain line and seeing all the travellers with their heads out of the windows. It occurred to me to ask what the reason for that was and I was informed that on this line there was a fourth class in which there were no seats, so that you had to sit on boxes or anything that was available, and if you wanted to be extremely comfortable you had to keep your head out of the window. That is a state of affairs we would not stand here very long. I suppose when people go abroad they are so glad at the change that they are content with anything and think everything is perfect. A great many people think that everything is good but what they have themselves. So it may be with people who go abroad and come back and report that something was delightful when as a matter of fact it would not bear looking at. In India I travelled for five or six days on the State Railways and the degree of comfort which they afford is of the smallest. There their idea of managing certain things which we consider essential in this country is very primitive. As regards the income from State Railways I cannot say anything as I have not the latest returns.

I think we would be well advised to consider, not once or twice, but a great many times before we alter the system we know. As Deputy Hewat stated the other day, "The devil you know is better than the devil you don't know." There is a good deal of truth in that. This is a leap in the dark that you cannot see the end of. The question of State railways would need very careful examination. I do not think, in view of the circumstances that are likely to come upon us, the growing competition with railways owing to increased motor traffic, and the development of air traffic, which the railways have got to meet, that the public would have much to get by taking over the railways in the insolvent state they are. There is also the prospect of having the traffic diverted in other ways. I am aware that in these days small concerns cannot stand by themselves. There is need for amalgamation. We see that by the banks, how even private banks have joined together for self-protection and development. That move has been a great success. Something of that kind could be done with the railways. I am not propounding a Bill. I leave that to the higher authorities who understand it. I think this country would be down-right mad to accept any of the responsibility that is likely, if the State took over the management of the railways, without exhausting every other avenue by which the prosperity of the railways and the country could be promoted.

Mr. MORRISSEY: The last Deputy stated that the Government would be downright mad if they took over the railways. I think it would be an act of courage and wisdom on the part of the Government to take over complete control of transport. After all, the Bill is really an act of faith in what we hear so much about, Irish democracy. I believe that if we take a wrong turning now in this matter of national transport, we will slow down the pace of the future development of the country. We have nationalisation already in essential services, such as law, education, the civil service, and so forth, which has worked very well. Now that we have real Irish State control, I have no doubt these services will work much better. I do not see why the Government should hesitate to apply the same principle to national transport. As I say, if it worked well in the other services, I believe the same principle should be applied to national transport, which is the roadway to commerce and industry. We know that capitalists have made that a very slow, a very costly, and a very difficult road. If we are to have merely a system of dual control, if we are to retain the capitalists, and still actively interfere with them, then we will find them putting all the blame for their own shortcomings on the State.

We, on these Benches, offer the Government and the country what we think is a solution of the problem and what is fair to every interest. I am sure it will not be contended that those who control the State are inferior in ability to the people who presently control the transport system. One might ask why, then, delegate to others what the State should do itself? I am quite sure if the Government would take over the Bill and put their trust in the State, the country will respond and will justify that trust. I appeal to the Dáil to accept this Bill, which is a constructive effort on the part of the Labour Party and the workers to try and help the nation.

Major COOPER: Deputy Morrissey describes this Bill as an act of faith in Irish democracy. I am not quite sure about the act of faith, but it is certainly an act of courage on the part of the Labour Party, and I am sure that the urgency of the problem with which it deals, is their justification for the bringing forward of such an unusual measure of responsibility by private members. I think that Deputy Morrissey has possibly erred in declaring that democracy was exactly the same thing as nationalisation, because the United States is a democracy—at least they very frequently tell you so—but there is no country in the world more hostile to nationalisation and more favourable to private enterprise than the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON: They pay for it.

Major COOPER: They may be converted in time, but presently they are not. Therefore, I think democracy cannot be said to be synonymous with nationalisation. I wish that we had the question of nationalisation and the desirability of nationalisation discussed at greater length. Deputy Johnson, I think, swept it away with a wave of the hand when he said that nationalisation of railways was not Bolshevist. It certainly is not, I agree. Prussia, before the war, nationalised the railways, and before the war she was not Bolshevist. Really, Deputy Johnson is letting his natural conservatism carry him too far when he suggests that because a thing is not Bolshevist therefore it must be good. This is a subject of which I have not made a close study, and I apologise to the Dáil. Any remarks that I have to make on nationalisation are based mainly on my own experience. There is a function for State railways, but I think where State railways are needed are in Eastern countries where the work, in the main, is done by coloured labour. The Egyptian State railways are good and efficient, and I believe the Indian State railways are good. As far as Western Europe is concerned, all my experience has gone to show that the State railways are not as good and are not as efficient, or as comfortable, and do not treat the traveller as well as the private owned railways. In France there is one State owned railway, the Western Railway, which is not only more unpunctual than the others, but is more difficult to deal with, and the traveller is treated as a unit and not as a person whose custom is desired. On that railway there is a very much higher percentage of accidents than any other railway in France.

The Italian State railways have improved enormously since the advent to power of Signor Mussolini, o'clock. but I take it the Labour Party does not intend permanently installing a Signor Mussolini on the Irish railways; and before Signor Mussolini took charge they were grossly over-staffed, with a railway official travelling in every compartment. There was extraordinary unpunctuality—it was nothing unusual to arrive at Rome four hours late on a twenty-four hours' journey—and they were exceedingly dirty. Things are better now. But even now you can travel more comfortably and more quickly in a second-class on other lines than you do in a first-class carriage on the Italian State railways. I cannot say that this is exhaustive, as I do not know the railways of Eastern Europe well. Deputies may very well be able to bring forward arguments that will confute me, but my personal experience goes to show me that nationalisation does not mean greater efficiency, and certainly does not mean greater contentment among the employés of the railways. Nor do we observe in the State-owned services of this country, to which Deputy Morrissey referred, that officials, such as postal servants, are contented. Did they never strike? I have heard of a good deal of discontent amongst them. Are the teachers, who are employed by the State, in a condition of contentment with their lot? I think not. State ownership does not remove the ordinary grievances that are felt by people working for their living from day to day, but turns them against the State as an employer instead of against the private employer. Where the State itself is concerned in a matter of this kind you get a situation which at once becomes difficult and not infrequently dangerous.

I want to turn to one or two points in the Bill. I do not intend criticising the proposed method of working. Deputy Hewat did that, and I have no intimate knowledge of it. I only say that, judging by my general experience, these Committees and Panels that are to be set up will probably cause a good deal of criticism, or else they will become entirely defective. To go from that to one or two specific points in the Bill—it might be submitted that specific points should be left over to the Committee Stage—but I submit that there is some justification for anticipating the Committee Stage of this Bill. The first is the question of finance. Deputy Johnson said he had adopted the precedent of the Minister for Agriculture in dealing with land, and that that was generally accepted by all parties as fair and right. I assure Deputy Johnson that if I had been in the last Dáil the Minister for Agriculture would have heard a good deal on the subject of fifteen years' purchase.

Mr. HOGAN (Minister for Agriculture): So he did.

Mr. GOREY: Would you have suggested twelve?

Major COOPER: I would not; and I think the Minister for Agriculture would have met with very much more determined opposition within and outside the Dáil than he did had it not been for the position in which the Government were placed at the time. They were faced with enormous difficulties, and the landlords were very reluctant to increase and augment their difficulties by pressing for their inherent rights. They did not consider that fifteen years' purchase was right, and I do not think that Deputy Gorey considers that fifteen years' purchase of railway shares is right, whatever he might apply to the land. In this case I prefer to speak on the principle that two wrongs do not make a right, that if the landlord sold at fifteen years' purchase and put the proceeds into railway stock, sacrificing a considerable portion of his income, he should then be again paid under this Bill at fifteen years' purchase. That he should be placed in that position, does not seem to me fair or reasonable.

There are one or two points of finance in the Bill that puzzle me. Deputy Johnson said, with regard to the Terminable Annuities, that after seventy-two years the debt would be discharged. He did not quite say the debt to whom, to the owner of the shares or to the State. It would be discharged by paying 4½ per cent. for seventy-two years, and then there is nothing. Is that a form of investment that is likely to commend itself to an investor—a terminable investment? Is a man who wishes to make provision for his children likely to buy stock of that kind, that will steadily fall year after year?

Mr. JOHNSON: He has an option.

Major COOPER: He has an option, exactly; and as every sane man will exercise his option, why the proposal was put into the Bill beats me. I can only suppose that originally the Bill was drafted with this drastic proviso and some more reasonable spirit in the Labour Party suggested that some option was necessary.

Mr. JOHNSON: It is the other way about.

Major COOPER: Because nobody in his senses will accept these Terminable Annuities, redeemable stock for seventy-two years to be paid off at par. Is that a reasonable form of investment? If it is going to be paid off at par it would mean a Sinking Fund. I am a child in matters of finance, but I do not think that if you have such a Sinking Fund you could possibly pay off any investment at par in less than four hundred years, or some time like that, if you were to combine interest and Sinking Fund.

Mr. O'MAHONY: It is fifteen years' purchase in the Bill.

Major COOPER: In other words, it will not be paid off at what is commonly called par.

Mr. O'MAHONY: Oh, no.

Major COOPER: But, even so, it is contemplating something very much more drastic, and unlike the reassuring statements made by Deputy Johnson when he moved the Second Reading. If a quarter per cent. for seventy-two years will be sufficient to pay off all these things, it means that some of them will be paid off very much lower than is indicated.

Mr. JOHNSON: Perhaps the Deputy would excuse me if I explained that the railway stock would be redeemable in seventy-two years.

Major COOPER: But will it be redeemed out of the Sinking Fund or by the monies to be provided by the State?

Mr. JOHNSON: Out of the Sinking Fund.

Major COOPER: My contention is that the Sinking Fund would be inadequate. I will leave the point. Perhaps when Deputy Johnson, or Deputy O'Connell, or Deputy Davin replies, he will enlighten me more. It obviously cannot be dealt with by interruptions. How can Deputy Johnson bind a tribunal that is not yet in existence?

Mr. JOHNSON: It is not intended to.

Major COOPER: They cannot bind a tribunal. The tribunal may take a very different point of view, and this point of view ought to be recognised by the Dáil before they give this Bill a Second Reading. As a matter of fact, Deputy Johnson, or whoever drafted the Bill, has taken pains to see that the tribunal cannot do more than a certain amount of justice, because he has fixed the maximum price at which stock is to be redeemed, and he has not fixed the minimum price. He said the maximum price would probably turn out to be the minimum. Deputy Johnson very often reminds me of the late Mr. Gladstone. This reminds me of an assurance—I was not born at the time—that was given by Mr. Gladstone, on the introduction of the Land Bill of 1881. He then promised the Irish landlords that only in very exceptional cases would rents be reduced, and that in most cases they would be increased. I take Deputy Johnson's assurance, that the maximum in this case will probably also be the minimum, as having about as much value as that other assurance.

If he wanted a minimum, why did he not put in a minimum? It was open to him to put in a minimum as well as a maximum if he wanted to reassure the shareholders, but he did not do so. Deputy Johnson is thoroughly consistent. He will have no minimum penalty for poachers or railway shareholders, whom he probably regards as offenders on a somewhat larger scale, but while there is no minimum whatever to protect the shareholder the tribunal can under this Bill deprive him of his rights. There is plenty of protection in the Second Schedule for every existing railway servant, who shall not be transferred without his own consent, or placed in any worse position whatever. I now come to another Section, which, I think, has not been noticed, and has not been referred to by Deputy Johnson or anyone else; that is, Section 41. "It shall be lawful for any person employed under the Minister to become a member of Dáil Éireann or Seanad Éireann"—well, they can become so now—"or to participate in any civil or political action in like manner as if such person were not employed under the Minister." That is, he has full civil rights, and can become an election agent, or sub-agent, or personation agent, and he can take an active part in politics. Up to the present the railways have very carefully kept their employees out of politics. They have been so careful that they have even refused to display political bills on the hoardings at the stations, but this gives every servant employed on the Irish railways the right to full political action. When you take your ticket at the booking office you may have a political leaflet shoved out to you with it, and every railway station would probably become a committee room in the service of one party. What is more, by a later Section, Deputy Johnson proposes to extend this power and this immunity to all postal servants as well. You will find yourself being canvassed by the postman when he delivers your letters in the morning. I venture to think that it is not desirable we should have a vast army of servants employed by the State, and at the same time endowed with absolutely full political and civil rights, which civil servants are not allowed. At present postal servants are not allowed it. I think the political right that is sought to be conferred by the Bill is, on the whole, a dangerous one, and should not be given. I turn to my last point, and that is the position under this Bill of those railways which are not in the Saorstát at all. I was astonished when I read the Schedule and saw there the Belfast and County Down Railway, the Northern Counties Committee of the Midland Railway, the Giant's Causeway and Bush Valley Tramway, and one or two others which are not under our control. No one dislikes partition more than I do, and no one is more anxious to see partition put to an end than I am, but you do not put an end to partition by pretending it does not exist, and most certainly you do not make it easier to bring about union by assuming powers to legislate for those over whom you have no control. How can you compel a man in Belfast to give up his shares in the Belfast and County Down Railway? We have no power to do that, and that power shall be conferred on the Executive Council who can fix any appointed day they think fit for railways which are not entirely in the Saorstát. If you wish to exercise that power you will have to go to war, and I hardly think that can be seriously contemplated even by the Labour Party. If there was nothing else in the Bill that I objected to but the inclusion of those railways over which we have no control, and making it possible for them to be taken over on the appointed day fixed by the Executive Council, that alone, I think, would be sufficient to condemn the Bill. Also you leave out the railways that are partly in the Saorstát and partly out of it, such as the Great Northern Railway. It shows the unreality of the Bill, and it proves that it is only window-dressing. You might as well have said that for this second class of railways the appointed day should be Tibb's Eve.

Mr. P. S. DOYLE: Deputy Johnson prefaced his remarks in moving the Second Reading by stating that the Bill was not presented in the expectation of its passing, making any revolutionary change or adding to any great extent to the well-being of the masses of the people. To my mind there is a very grave necessity for some decided change in the present system of administration or management of the railways with a view to developing the country in the interests of the masses.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I regret having to raise this point—it occurred once or twice before—is it in order for a Deputy to read his speech?

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: I think it is not in order, but he can refer to notes.

Mr. NAGLE: I desire to support the Second Reading. In the first instance, I think it will be generally admitted, in spite of some remarks passed by Deputy Hewat and Deputy Cooper, that the railways of Ireland are not satisfactory. As a matter of fact most of the Commissions that have considered the question of railways during recent years have stated definitely that they are unsatisfactory and that they have not been worked efficiently. All these Commissions reported that in their opinion some system of unification was needed, and the only thing on which the members of the Commission differed was as to whether it should be unification under private ownership and control, or unification under State ownership. Personally, I think that unification under private ownership would be giving too great a monopoly to private interests, which they could use for their benefit at the expense of the people generally. Deputy Hewat, after having mentioned some of the interests that would be catered for by the Bill, wanted to know would it cater for the travelling public, and he suggested that it would not. I ask Deputy Hewat, and people who think like him, does the present system of railway ownership in Ireland cater for the travelling public? I know in a good many cases it does not. Anyone who has travelled from South Wexford to Waterford on the Dublin South Eastern Railway knows that when you get into Waterford from, say Ballycullane, on the Great Southern you will find that the train going North by way of New Ross has left about 10 minutes before your arrival at Waterford, and the result is if you are in a hurry it is necessary to get a motor car, and if you are not in a hurry you can wait 7 or 8 hours for the next train. I do not know whether it is the fault of the Great Southern and Western Railway or of the Dublin and South Eastern, but I certainly think that if these railway companies were studying the comfort of the travelling public they would at least arrange their time table so that one train would arrive 15 minutes earlier or the other leave 15 minutes later, so as to allow five minutes for the passengers to change. That is an instance which anyone who has been in that part of the country will call to mind. It happened to myself on a number of occasions, and according to the time tables, which I have consulted, the discrepancy still exists. The farming section, I think, should also give a good deal of attention to the Bill. Recently when we were discussing the cost of living, and the necessity for a better method of marketing goods, the Minister for Agriculture complimented the Secretary of the Cork Farmers' Association on having got his members to market foodstuffs, and the like, cattle, sheep and pigs from Co. Cork, during the time of the dock strike, directly to England instead of waiting on the shipping merchants. On that occasion Bantry was used for the purpose of shipping the various kinds of agricultural goods to England. I would like to mention that from the Macroom area during the time railways were controlled by the British Government it was quite possible to put goods on the railway at Macroom and send them direct to Bantry.

Simply because the Cork and Macroom Railway is under different management from the Cork, Bandon and South Coast Railway, when control was removed in 1921, the points connecting the two lines were lifted at the orders of the management of the Macroom line. The result was that during the recent dockers' strike, farmers who tried to get their goods away were compelled to send them by road to Bantry, instead of direct by train from Macroom. I also remember about six weeks ago a deputation came from Macroom to wait on the Minister for Industry and Commerce and to ask him to use his power to compel the Cork and Macroom Company to connect their line with that of the Cork, Bandon and South Coast Company. They pointed out that to bring coal to Macroom, by way of Cork, it was necessary to cart it from the quay-side, a distance of about half a mile, to Capwell station. Although there was a connection from the quay-side with the Cork and Macroom Railway the management would not allow it to be used. In some discussions which we had on the matter, the manager of the Cork and Macroom Railway asked, in the event of this connection being made again as it was during the war, what would become of Capwell station? We find this peculiar state of affairs under the present system—that instead of the Cork and Macroom Railway, about twenty-three miles in length, existing for the benefit of the people, it exists solely for the benefit of Capwell station. That is a thing that would not exist if there was unified control or State control of the railways. They would be used in the interests of the people. In Berlin I believe there is a railway museum housed in a station that became derelict after the nationalisation of the railways in Germany. There they did not hesitate to scrap a station or any other part of a system that was of use no longer.

Deputy Hewat pointed out that the railways were mostly a failure when promoted or subsidised by the Government. I would like to point out that subsidising a railway and leaving it under the control of private interests is different from State ownership and State control. During the war, and for a number of years prior to it, I believe the railways of Ireland were subsidised to the extent of over ten millions, which was paid by the taxpayers of this country into the pockets of the private owners of the railways without the people of the country having one pennyworth of control in the running of those railways. We merely want to get away from that. All the Commissions which dealt with the railway problem realised that the railways are inefficient when run and controlled privately, and that they will never prove paying concerns for the present owners. We claim, if there is to be any subsidy, we should go the whole hog, and if we have to pay the difference between the amount necessary to run the railways and the amount the railways can make, we should get full control, and if there are any profits, we should get the profits that are made. I should like to point out, for Deputy Hewat's benefit, that in Prussia the State railways earned sufficient money to pay the interest on capital and yielded a surplus which increased from one million in 1882 to twenty-three millions in 1907. In 1907-8 the amount yielded by the railways in profit to the State was three times as much as the amount of money got from income tax, and more than double that got from the income and property taxes combined. The total surplus from 1882 to 1907 was two hundred and sixty millions. I would like to read from a book called "The Nationalisation of Railways." It is a bit out of date, but the arguments apply at any time. Here is a quotation contained in it from the "Sunday Times." I see that Deputy Gorey laughs, but I do not mind that. I am rather pleased that he is in such good health as to enjoy a laugh. I would like to point out that writers in a paper like the "Sunday Times" cannot be accused of being favourable to State ownership or nationalisation. On the contrary, the people who control the "Sunday Times" and papers of that class always shout the loudest for hands off on the part of the State from interference with private interests. In spite of that, the writers in the "Sunday Times" can recognise facts when they see them, and state them in a way that can be understood by common people. I mention that to show that there is some justification for treating you to this quotation. There was a discussion in the different papers at this time on the question of the nationalisation of railways, and this is what the "Sunday Times" said:—

Under these circumstances, it is of interest to see how Prussia, the cradle of nationalisation, has fared by its policy. If we summarise the budget of that kingdom we find that its administration costs six hundred and eighty-seven million marks, of which three hundred and fifty-nine millions are covered by taxes. There is thus a shortage of three hundred and twenty-eight millions balanced by the surplus from the working of State properties. Forests and demesnes supply 68 millions, mines 18 millions, lotteries 9 millions, the State bank four and a half millions, and the mint half a million, while no less than two hundred and twenty-eight millions come from the railways—the latter after providing two hundred and ninety-three millions for interest on debt created for purchasing the property. In other words, one-third of the State's expenditure is provided by the surplus profits of the railways, whose total receipts amounted to 2,052½ million marks. The financial position of Prussia has, of late, been subjected to criticism, but, as a matter of fact, it remains sound, thanks mainly to the revenue derived from Bismarck's acquisitions. Indeed, if we capitalise the goodwill of Prussia's industrial surplus of 328 millions on a 4 per cent. basis, we arrive at a capital of 8,250 million marks. Deducting therefrom the net Government debt, not represented by assets, 500 millions, there remains an asset of 7,750 millions, or £387,500,000 as national wealth. Not an unfavourable balance, and mainly due to the timely nationalisation of the railways. No doubt, the railway problem presents itself in different forms in the various countries. But a study of the results of State railway administration in its classic home is not without teaching some useful lessons."

Deputy Hewat asked as to why we should specify railways, and he wanted to know what was the difference between railways and other concerns. In my opinion, all other private businesses in the country depend to a large extent on railways and the other transport facilities. He also pointed out that, through the operation of political forces, a preferential and peculiar position for rail servants was established, a position which, he said, would never have applied in this country under ordinary conditions. He suggested by that, that the railway workers in this country used their political power, such as it was, to obtain conditions that were not warranted, and that would never have been obtained in the ordinary way if the railways had remained under private control. He implied by that that the wages of railway men were something extraordinary; his exact words are: "preferential and peculiar." I would like to point out that if they got increases in their wages during the days when the railways were controlled by the British Government, the wages they got then certainly did not bring them to a great state of prosperity, and that the wages they had in pre-war days, prior to Government control, were not such that either Deputy Hewat, or any railway shareholder or business man, or employer of labour, might cry about them. Mr. Keogh, representing the railway companies at the late Railway Commission which sat here, said that the average wages of all grades—many of them including skilled men—in 1913 was 20s. 8d., while the average paid to Scottish workers was 27s. 4d. On that showing, the average wage here was 6s. 8d. less than in Scotland and in England in pre-war days. If that is the case, I certainly think the railway workers here were entitled to some increased remuneration, in view of the fact that they had been so badly paid, comparatively, in pre-war days, and also in view of the fact that the cost of living had been considerably increased. I would like to point out to Deputy Hewat—he admitted it towards the end of his remarks—that this is not altogether a Rail Bill, but that it is a Transport and Communications Bill, and that it proposes to control the waterways as well as the road transport of the country.

As things are at present, there is no connection between road transport and rail transport, but if the whole transport work of the country were put under one Ministry, with power of improvement in the general interest, it is very likely that arrangements would be made between the different railway companies and the boats to Cork which Deputy Hewat mentioned, as well as with those who control the roads at the present time. He also pointed out that the law of increasing wages will not apply in this country in the future.

Deputy Bryan Cooper mentioned an incident in his experience to show that privately-owned railways were worked more efficiently and gave a better service to the travelling public than publicly-owned railways. He said that he saw some passengers in a German railway train looking out through the windows while passing through a station—

Major BRYAN COOPER: On a point of explanation, it was Deputy Woulfe said that.

Mr. NAGLE: I am sorry. Deputy Woulfe explained that, on inquiry, he found that the reason the passengers were looking through the window was that there were no seats. He instanced that to prove that State-owned railways gave worse facilities than privately-owned railways, either in Great Britain or Ireland. I would like to go a little bit further and to point out that these passengers were in fourth class carriages, and that there never have been any fourth class carriages in these countries on railways under private management. I would also like to point out that the fare that was paid for travelling fourth class on German railways was a fare that has never been touched in these countries. As a matter of fact, you could travel a little more than five miles for twopenny in pre-war days, when the charge here was a penny a mile. I think that altogether negatives the claim of the Deputy regarding the people who had to stand up. In this country you would not be allowed to stand, even in a cattle truck, for any distance, for the fare charged there. I am not cognisant of the conditions that exist at the present time, but I believe that the rates on the Continental State-owned railways are much lower than the rates charged on the privately-owned railways in these countries, either for passenger or goods traffic. In some cases you can go as far on the Belgian railways as three thousand miles for the same amount that you would pay for a journey of fifty-one miles, between two points, in England or Ireland. In some cases the Austrian State Railways gave a journey of six miles for 2d., pre-war, twelve miles for 4d., and four hundred miles for 16/3. These prices have never been approached in these countries. If the matter were seriously considered, it would be found that there was a better case made for nationalisation of the railways than ever has been made for the continuance of the present system. Before I finish, I would like to mention the views of a couple of people who are very interested in this problem, and in other problems—

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

It is not in order to read the views of anybody in that way. You can mention them.

Mr. NAGLE: It is only a quotation. The first is Sir Eric Geddes, who, in moving the second reading of the—

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

You cannot read another person's speech here.

Mr. NAGLE: I am only giving you a quotation from it. It is less than a paragraph in length. I am not reading another man's speech.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

We do not know how far it may go.

Mr. NAGLE: In any case, he said that there was a great necessity for a go-ahead and vitalising system of transportation, and that the House—that was the British House of Commons—as a whole was committed to that system. I would like to point out that, if Sir Eric Geddes considered, and the British House of Commons was convinced, there was a great necessity for a change in the system of railway control in England, the necessity exists to a greater extent in this country, because the railways in this country, it will be admitted by every Farmer Deputy in this Dáil and every farmer in the country who talks about the rates for transportation, are even worse than the railways of England. If it is necessary to make a change on the railways of England, in the interests of economy, the interests of better administration, and in the interests of the people of the country as a whole, it seems more necessary to do so in this country. Therefore, I desire to support the Second Reading of this Transport and Communications Bill.

Mr. THOMAS O'MAHONY: Deputy Johnson, in the remarks he made on the Second Reading of this Bill, stated that it was not going to make any revolutionary changes, and he did not presume that it was going to result in any substantial saving to the community. Thereby he gave away his whole case. If no material change for the benefit of the community could be anticipated, why does he embark upon a dangerous experiment of this kind? State and corporate control of undertakings do not encourage us to embark upon a sea in which there have been so many wrecks. If—and it has not been suggested so far; it was not suggested by Deputy Johnson—the position of Irish railways, taking all the associated circumstances into account, was in any degree much worse than the conditions where railways are under control of private ownership in other countries, why should we here embark upon a policy of what I look upon as a capital levy in a disguised form?

Mr. DAVIN: The writing is on the wall.

Mr. O'MAHONY: The writing may be on the wall but is it going to materialise? I am not at all in agreement with the optimistic view expressed by Deputy Johnson, when he stated "when this Bill is passed" for, though I am ignorant of the Government proposals with respect to railway control in this country, I think I can confidently commit myself to this, that with the Government the policy of commonsense is going to prevail and we are not going to pass this Bill. The doctrine has been laid down by Deputy Johnson that pre-war conditions are impossible conditions for the workers. Is the stockholder in a Railway Company in a different position with regard to increased expenditure to the worker? Has the stockholder of the Railway Company ever received out of the company in which he invested his money anything more than a reasonable return, and, in very, very many cases, much less than the return he might reasonably expect, taking into account the capital invested and the risks that he undertook?

The plea has been made that the finance of this Bill is fashioned on the finance of the Land Bill. But the two parties whom you propose to buy out will never be put upon the same plane as regards the moral right they have—the one to the land and the other as a stockholder in a railway company. It has never been admitted here that the landlords of Ireland had a moral right to the land. Their ownership was the result of confiscation. The stockholder in the railway company created the property; the landlord of Ireland did not. In dealing with these two people we were dealing on the one side with one who acquired his property as a result of a policy that sought to make the Celt as rare on the banks of the Shannon as the Red Indian on the shores of the Manhattan, and on the other side with the Irish investor who had the courage, when the Government would not do it, to put his money into railway development and make modern transit possible in Ireland. Under those conditions you cannot deal with these two people, it is not an equitable proposition to deal with these two people on the same basis of settlement. What would be the net result to the stockholder in the railway companies if effect were given to the proposals of Deputy Johnson? Take the case of the company in which the average earnings for the five years ending 1913 would be 4 per cent. The Deputy proposes that the maximum capital of stock payment in that case would be 15 years' purchase, or £60. He does not guarantee the figure at 15 years' purchase. There is not the same fixity as in the case of the Bill promoted by the Minister for Agriculture, but it is clearly stated that the maximum cannot be more than fifteen years' purchase. Now, £60 would be three-fifths of the par value of that stock, and three-fifths of the four per cent. stock will give the stockholder an income over a limited number of years, as was pointed out by Deputy Cooper, of something like £2 14s. or £2 15s. per cent. per annum, so that the stockholder not alone is not to have the income that he had before the war, but he has to face the world and all the increased cost of living, entailed as a result of the war, with a considerably reduced income.

The Deputy does not recognise such a suggestion as being in any way possible when he deals with labour. What is the stock held by the stockholders in this country? It is the fund provided as the result of labour and activities in some form or another, and provided in many cases by people who, through penuriousness and through denying themselves the ordinary little luxuries and enjoyments that they may have in this life, were enabled to make some provision for the future, and I look upon the proposal to conscript, and to conscript substantially, the miserable income that they enjoyed previous to the war, as an absolutely immoral thing. No case has been made or presented so far for an alteration such as is suggested in the Deputy's Bill. It may come in time.

Mr. JOHNSON: Hear, hear.

Mr. O'MAHONY: At any rate, we have not yet reached that time. When it does come, and when conditions would warrant such a substantial change as the Bill suggests, then the good sense of the Dáil would, in the altered conditions, make the change. Why is it desirable to make this change? Why is this change in any degree necessary? It is a change which, if at all necessary or at all desirable, is a change following upon State management, or rather State mismanagement, of railways during the period of the war. Associated with the railways of Ireland was expenditure in labour and expenditure in other details that the circumstances of the time, to a certain extent, possibly may be an excuse for, but that the conditions of the Irish railways and Irish traffic by no means warranted.

The Deputy further on in his speech absolutely gives away any pretence of making a case in favour of his proposal when he says: "I am very doubtful whether an efficient railway system can, in this country, be provided without some form of public assistance," so that even under the new conditions that he proposes, the conditions that are supposed to end all difficulty with respect to an effective, an efficient and an economic railway service in Ireland, he admits that this Bill is not going to provide for all that efficiency and particularly for that economy. He still anticipated that a State subsidy will be necessary to enable the railways to continue to function.

Deputy Nagle quoted some Scotch case. I will quote particulars from a Scottish railway as compared with Irish railways, and they will show that where there is not a material difference in the capital, the Irish railways, for a much smaller revenue and a much smaller transit of merchandise, have to travel considerably longer distances with, I need hardly say, less satisfactory results for the shareholders. If, as the Deputy surmised, and as we all hope and believe, things in the near future are going materially to improve in this country, do we not think that the people who built the railways and who put their monies into railway concerns, and who had the courage to do that which the Government of the time had failed to do, should receive some consideration? If that improvement is going to result, do we not think that before it takes place it would be absolutely unfair that their ownership in the railways should be conscripted, and that if we are going to purchase, that they should at least get the benefit they are legitimately entitled to from the improvement that would result in the State in which we are all common citizens?

I will take the case of all Irish railways. The capital expenditure on all Irish railways up to the end of 1913 was £43,364,255. The Caledonian Rail-

[Mr. O'Mahony.] way in Scotland had a capital expenditure of a little over £56,000,000. For their smaller capital the Irish railway system ran 3,410 miles, and the Scottish railways ran only one-third of that, or 1,111 miles. The revenue receipts in Ireland were £4,782,000, and in Scotland the revenue receipts were £5,467,000. The receipts per mile in Ireland amounted to £1,402, and in Scotland £4,920. The revenue expenditure in Ireland was a little over £3,000,000, and on the Caledonian railway about £3,250 000.

The tonnage carried, merchandise, coal and minerals, in Ireland was six and two-thirds millions, and twenty-eight and a-quarter millions in Scotland. Passengers in Ireland were thirty-one millions, as against forty-seven millions in Scotland. Now that goes to show that when we are dealing with the railway system in Ireland we must remember the circumscribed opportunities that it has as compared with other countries. We must also remember that hitherto the shareholders in Ireland have had a very inadequate all round return on the capital invested in the companies. Some Deputies will remember that some seven weeks ago the Great Southern and Western Railway published a schedule showing the rates of wages paid to their employees, as compared with the cross-Channel rates of wages, and while, in the instances I have quoted, the earning power of the cross-Channel railways was considerably more than the earning power per mile of the Irish railways, the wages paid to the Irish employees were considerably more than the wages paid across the water.

Mr. JOHNSON: On what date?

Mr. O'MAHONY: About six or seven weeks ago. That, I think, is near enough.

Mr. DAVIN: Can the Deputy give the figures?

Mr. O'MAHONY: I will give one of the figures, and the Deputy may not be so pleased when he gets the information. In this particular case the Great Southern Railway pointed out that the cost of producing a carriage at their Inchicore works under the favourable conditions existing at the time when they made the statements, that is, after a reduction of six shillings a week had taken place in the wages of their employees, the cost of producing the carriage even under the new conditions would be £300 more than it would cost them to import it from across the water. And they stated that prior to the reduction which had taken place—this statement did not appear in the papers, but I got it myself—the difference in the cost of the production of the carriage for the same specification, landed at North Wall, and produced at Inchicore works was £527. Is it to bolster up a condition like that that this Bill is introduced? If that is the 8 o'clock policy we are adopting, whether Deputy Johnson denies it or no, the principle of Nationalisation is associated with it.

Mr. JOHNSON: When did I deny it?

Mr. O'MAHONY: I think the Deputy in his speech said it was not Nationalisation or Bolshevism.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Are they interchangeable terms?

Mr. O'MAHONY: Here are the exact words: "It is not put forward here in deference to any preconception in regard to nationalisation or State ownership."

Mr. JOHNSON: Is that all?

Mr. O'MAHONY: There is the remark later on: "It is neither revolutionary, radical Bolshevism, nor anything of an abnormal nature." Therefore Deputy Johnson recognises Nationalisation is of an abnormal nature.

Mr. JOHNSON: You are a logician.

Mr. O'MAHONY: At any rate the principle does apply to this, and I think the Deputy in the last twelve months made a statement in this Dáil that shareholders in railway companies, having had the shares in their possession for a certain number of years and having got a return equivalent to their capital under private ownership have no moral ownership any longer as their money was returned to them. That is a most dangerous doctrine to enunciate because it could be applied to the farmers in a few years time. If a man having purchased his land in a couple of years received in produce from that a return equal to his capital it might be argued that then his ownership was at an end. It would apply to the ordinary trader. Any business having had a certain amount of capital put into it, and having had a return equivalent to that capital it might be argued that the owner was no longer entitled to the ownership of the business. If that is the doctrine the Deputy stands behind, and if that doctrine was pressed successfully Ireland would be a very unhealthy place for the ordinary citizen to live in.

Everyone admits that the pre-war wages of the railway workers were too low, but we have to consider if the present wages are warranted by the earning powers of the railways in Ireland, because it is not a good enough policy to suggest that if the State takes over the railways the taxpayers can again be approached to make good any deficit on their earnings; that is not a good enough national policy. We have to consider whether the existing conditions in Ireland warrant the payment of the present rates of wages. If they do we must continue to pay them, and if they do not, wages must be fitted in as one unit in the economic machine, because if the factors are against us it is only by increasing the rates that the wages can be continued at their present level.

I agree with the Labour members that the existing railway charges are, in a sense, prohibitive. Railway fares and railway rates are too high to make progress in the country. If we are going to have substantial industrial or agricultural progress, railway rates must come down. It is a question that ought to be considered in conference. The conference should be representative of the Government, of the railway employees and of Labour generally, and of the industrial and farming elements of the community, and an effort should be made to see to what extent conditions might be altered so as to enable more favourable terms to prevail in the country as regards the transit of goods. There is no doubt but that the present rates are a stranglehold upon development, but at the same time we realise that the railway returns go to show that any material interferences with these charges will result, if not in actual loss, at least in a miserable return to those whose capital is invested in the different companies. Deputy Johnson quoted the capital figures involved in the case of seven railways. In the case of the seven principal railways in the country there is a sum of something like £40,400,000 invested. In the five years included by the Deputy in his Bill, the net distributive earnings of these Companies was £1,558,570.

Mr. JOHNSON: Is that the average?

Mr. O'MAHONY: Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON: Is that figure official?

Mr. O'MAHONY: Yes. I am dealing with the seven principal railway companies in the country. The amount of money invested in these represents 85 per cent. of the railway capital in Ireland. The loss in revenue, if effect were given to this Bill, would be £506,535. In addition, since the year 1913, a sum of £466,000 of additional capital has been put into the Irish railway companies. The Deputy makes no provision as regards the discharge of liability on this, except that I assume he intends that it should water down the return on the others. He is only going to pay apparently from his Bill on the figures as we find them at the end of 1913, and, therefore, the additional capital of nearly £500,000 will be a further watering down of the return to the shareholders.

Mr. JOHNSON: Can the Deputy say in what year the additional capital was sunk?

Mr. O'MAHONY: I cannot give the year, but it was since the year 1913.

Mr. JOHNSON: Was it prior to the year 1917?

Mr. O'MAHONY: I cannot say that, but it was certainly since the year 1913. At any rate, it is outside the ambit of your Bill, or the period which you provide for. I think a strong case was made for unification by Deputy Nagle. He addressed himself particularly to the policy of unification, and, to my mind, at any rate, I do not know whether it commends itself to other Deputies or to the Government, but I believe that unification is the immediate solution of the question. Let us, I say, proceed by easy stages. If unification is a success—

Mr. HEWAT: On a point of order, I desire to ask if this question of unification is before us?

Mr. O'MAHONY: It was discussed at some length already by previous speakers.

Mr. JOHNSON: I submit it is in order, because it is one of the principles involved in this Bill; that is to say, unification with national ownership.

Mr. HEWAT: I desire to ask if it is open to me to discuss unification on this Bill?

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy cannot discuss the question now as he has spoken already.

Mr. O'MAHONY: Deputy Hewat suggested that State control or nationalisation is the big point of unification. Unification, as we look upon it in this country, will represent two controlling bodies, the two big companies, and bring them into one. At any rate I am going to be very short on that point with which Deputy Nagle dealt with at some length. I think it would be a safe step to adopt in railway policy, and that it would mean more effective and more efficient control. You could, I believe, embody with the principle of unification representation of different interests on the new controlling bodies, if the Government so desires, and I think it would be desirable. You have an instance of that in the control of the Port of London, a very big project in which various interests, labour and other, are incorporated in the controlling body, with most effective results as regards the working of that body and as regards a satisfactory revenue and a satisfactory profit. We all have community of interest, whether we be employers or employees. We have a common country, and in the success of that common country we ought to take a common interest and take occasion to sink all prejudices and all the differences that are sometimes unwisely associated with us as individuals. I am sure that if the voice of labour gives expression through men of moderate views and of individual capacity, such as the Deputy at the head of the Labour Party and of others associated with him, that not alone should we agree to sink our differences, but that in the sinking of them we would undoubtedly put the country, as regard labour disputes and the settlement of undertakings of this kind, on the high road to progress.

There is just one matter in connection with unity of control which I did not refer to. In Ireland, at the end of 1921, we had 170 railway directors. On the Caledonian Railway in Scotland, with its larger capital and its bigger operations, they had 11. Let us all join forces to get rid of a condition of things such as that, and I believe we can then, without resorting to this Bill—which I think is premature—evolve a new and more effective system of railway control, administration and operation, which will result in much greater benefits from every point of view to the country.

Mr. DAVIN: I beg to move the adjournment of the Debate, as there is a matter coming up on the adjournment.

Debate adjourned until 7 o'clock on Wednesday evening.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE DAIL.

CUSTOMS ARRANGEMENTS AT DUN LAOGHAIRE.

The PRESIDENT: I move the adjournment until 3 o'clock to-morrow.

Major COOPER: I gave notice that I would call attention to the conditions of the Customs examinations at Saorstát ports, because I was not entirely satisfied with the reply I got from the Minister for Finance as to the arrangements that are to be adopted at Dun Laoghaire. The problem is not an easy one, because the pier at Dun Laoghaire was not intended for the purpose of Customs examination, and there is, consequently, a very considerable shortage of space. The proposals of the Minister, or rather of his subordinates, and the railway companies concerned, will not, I think, remedy that shortage of space in anyway whatever. The congestion that exists at present is due to the fact that the arrival platform has been cut in two by a fence, and that in half of the space of the ordinary platform, there is established a counter at which the lighter goods are examined. Then there is barely room for the truck-loads of heavy luggage that are brought off the boats and wheeled up to await examination, once the hand luggage has been disposed of. At a time, for instance, like Christmas and when the schools break up, the congestion is immense. There is hardly room to move. I do not know if the Minister has been down there at such a time. With the crowd of people and porters who have luggage to be examined and the people who have had luggage examined trying to get to the platform, there is a great congestion, and old people and children find it very difficult to get through. The congestion is such that it is necessary to shut everybody off the pier who wishes to meet people. If a child is travelling over alone and relatives wish to meet the child, they have either to go to Westland Row or meet the child at the exit from the pier. That is not due to any fault of the Minister or to any fault of any Department, but to the fact that the pier is very small. The one redeeming feature is the great efficiency of those whose duty it is to search luggage. They do their work thoroughly, quickly and courteously, and if they were not extremely competent, the situation would be very much worse.

The Minister got together, last week, representatives of the Revenue Commissioners, the Board of Works, who are responsible for the pier, and the two railway companies concerned. He got them round a table to consider what should be done. That was a very sound first step, but if I might suggest it, the Minister should have done one other thing. He should have locked the door and said that they could not come out until they had propounded a scheme for dealing with the whole question, and not merely the palliative which is suggested, which is to put up some form of shelter which will keep the rain and wind off the people whose luggage is being examined and those whose duty it is to examine it. That would be a good thing, but I am afraid it will have the effect of making the congestion even worse. The Minister, in his reply last week, told me that some inconvenience was inseparable from Customs examination. That is undoubtedly the case, but if he consults the more travelled members of the Ministry, who went to Bobbio and other places, he will find that neither at Dover, Calais, Boulogne, or other places, is the congestion so great or the conditions so uncomfortable as at Dun Laoghaire. That is partly, no doubt, because the thing is improvised. It gives, however, a bad impression to those coming to Ireland for the first time.

Many suggestions might be made. One is that all the heavy luggage labelled for Westland Row should go through and be examined there. Another suggestion is that the hand-baggage should be examined on the boat, as is done on some of the steamers from Dover and Folkestone to Calais and Boulogne. That might be possible. No doubt if you add the risk of seasickness to their other duties you would probably have to pay a slightly higher salary to officers. Taking the situation as it stands and assuming that you are going to examine the luggage at Dun Laoghaire, there are two suggestions. One is that the space at the seaward end of the pier should be used and that all the baggage should go down there. There is a space there occupied by a turn-table which the railway company do not use. A shed could be built there and permanent counters installed. The luggage could pass through there and be examined, and the people could then come from that to the train. The other alternative is that the whole of what I may call the arrival platform—the platform against which the steamer berths—should be used for Customs examination instead of only half. This fence, which cuts the place in half, should be done away with and the train should be loaded on the other side. I have been told that the railway companies object to this because the boats arrive and leave about the same time. That is the sort of argument that has been accepted by Government Departments. In point of fact there are three hours between the arrival of the boat and the departure of the boat, and I imagine, even in time of pressure, that there will be ample margin. This is a question which can be solved if there is a real intention to solve it. It is one of the occasions on which the Minister would wish he had a Parliamentary Secretary to deal with this problem. If he could depute somebody, or if he had time to take the matter in hands himself, and got the representatives of the railway companies and the public departments concerned round a table I believe it could be solved in less than three hours, and a real solution found, not merely a palliative like putting up shelters. In any case I hope the Minister realises that the Christmas traffic is upon us and is likely to be heavy, and that the conditions are bound to be uncomfortable. The conditions should be minimised by putting on as many searchers as possible, so that the people would get through quickly instead of being held up, as sometimes happens, for one and a half hours. It was tolerable in the summer time with daylight. Now it is dark and stormy. I hope the Minister will see his way to make some concession in that respect.

Mr. DAVIN: I desire to associate myself, not with all Deputy Cooper has said, but certainly with the causes of complaint he has mentioned. Those who have any practical knowledge of the working of passenger and mail traffic at this pier know that the accommodation on the west side is entirely unsuitable. At the west side of the pier, to which Deputy Cooper referred, the covered shed is only about 400 feet long, and the width, before the Customs regulations came into operation, 34 feet. That has been reduced to 20 feet, and after the conference held the other day—I do not know if it is responsible for what has been done—it has been further reduced by 3 feet 6 inches. It is within the knowledge of travellers and others who use the pier that under the old arrangement, when passengers in excess of 400 had to be dealt with, accommodation on the west side of the pier was absolutely unsuitable and resulted in confusion, inconvenience and delay. I suggest to the Minister that the whole question is an engineering one. If there is any means by which the platform space on the west side of the pier can be extended or improved, there, I think, lies the real solution of the difficulty. Deputy Cooper suggests that hand luggage should be searched on the passage between Holyhead and Dun Laoghaire. That suggestion was put forward before, and if the Minister is prepared to meet the necessary expenses involved, it is for him to say so.

In my opinion, it would not meet the difficulty that exists. I suggest that the engineer to the Board of Works and engineers of the companies interested in the development of traffic and the proper working of the pier, should be brought together and asked to try and devise a permanent solution of what is a very real difficulty. There is another aspect of this case, and it is a very serious one. This harbour was looked upon as the natural entrance to the Irish Free State for tourist traffic from England and elsewhere. The reception afforded passengers, especially when there is a big crowd at the pier, is one that they would not like to undergo a second time. People with hotels and boarding houses in Bray and Dun Laoghaire have suffered for the past five years for lack of tourist traffic. Any improvement in the arrangements for dealing with passengers would be welcome. It would also help to remove the confusion that undoubtedly has occurred for the past two years, and particularly since the Customs regulations were enforced on the 1st April. Apart from the Customs regulations, there are many things to be taken into consideration when dealing with this matter.

Mr. JOHNSON: I want to press this point, not only in regard to the inconvenience to passengers at Dun Laoghaire, which is very great and liable to deflect passenger traffic to other places, perhaps to other countries, but also to the delays in the examination of parcels and the delay in examination of dutiable traffic of all kinds at the various ports. From the information in my hands, that is especially so at Greenore. That is due to the insufficiency of the staff of the Customs. Deputy Mahony or Deputy Good might be surprised if I were to say a word on behalf of the railway company, but in respect of Greenore, of which I have some information, it seems that the railway company, as a matter of fact, have gone to considerable expense in providing assistance, in the way of railway servants, to deal with this parcels traffic, to the extent, up to a month ago, of paying £150 a week in wages for this service. An insufficiency of Customs officers practically compelled the railway company to look for a reduction of that staff, leaving the commercial community at a loss because of still further delays in dealing with Customs traffic. There were had arrangements there up to a month ago, and I do not think there has been any change for the better since. I hope the Minister will be able to say definitely that the complaints that were made three weeks or a month ago no longer exist. Up to that time the practice was that the Customs officials who did ordinary work in the day time entered upon the special work of examining consignments after hours, that work being paid for by the traders at overtime rates. One week, for instance, on a Monday, there were 25 consignments cleared before 4 o'clock, and 16 after 4 o'clock.

On Tuesday 20 consignments were cleared before 4 o'clock, and 73 after 4 o'clock. On Wednesday 14 consignments were cleared before 4 o'clock and 15 after 4 o'clock. On Thursday 13 were cleared before 4 o'clock, and 7 after 4 o'clock. On Friday 4 consignments were cleared before 4 o'clock, and 22 after 4 o'clock. The railway companies have to pay the Customs people 4/- an hour overtime to examine dutiable goods after 4 o'clock. That charge is thrown upon the companies and the public solely, because the staff for dealing with Customs matters is insufficient. The consequence is very considerable delay in forwarding the traffic. On a day in the early part of November, which is not the latest information that I have, there were 477 consignments, and some of them were waiting since last May to be dealt with. They were lying at Greenore uncleared, and the whole of the responsibility for that lay with the Customs. It is quite evident that there is an accumulation of consignments, and that there is general dissatisfaction with the manner of dealing with them. It is clear from facts placed before me that the service is being transferred in other directions and is going by other routes, and is coming by rail from Northern ports. The complaint in regard to Greenore may not be typical. I hope it is not; but there have been complaints from Waterford, Cork and Dublin in regard to the delays to consignments and in the transportation of goods. If it can be shown, as I am led to believe it can, that much of the delay is caused by the shortage of Customs officers then some improvement should be made by the appointment of a larger number of examiners.

MINISTER for FINANCE : (Mr. Blythe) : I am sorry Deputy Cooper gave in his notice in the form he did. He simply stated that he would draw attention to the Customs arrangements at Free State ports. I was not sure if he meant to speak about Dun Laoghaire or on some question he had not raised before. His form of notice amounts practically to no notice at all. It will be obvious that I could not, with such notice given me that a matter would be raised on the adjournment, have any details about Greenore or other places. A Minister can only give satisfactory answers on any matter raised on the adjournment if he is given reasonable notice, and if something fairly specific is mentioned, so that if it is a matter about which facts can be brought forward, he can have some opportunity of getting them. I answered a question in regard to Greenore, and I know there was a serious failure on the part of the railway company in giving us the facilities we were entitled to at Greenore. The only weapon we would have would be to refuse to recognise the place at all, and so shut down the traffic, and we could in that way get the facilities which up to this we have not had. We have not got the facilities from the railway company at Greenore that we should have got. Further than that I cannot say at the moment, without having some notice of the matter. The Dun Laoghaire case is really a matter for engineers. There are remedies that could be applied there, but they would cost very considerable sums indeed. Some remedy that would be cheap, and still quite a sufficient remedy, is a matter that is being looked into. I certainly desire to do everything possible to facilitate the work there, and everything I can do will be done; but I will not be rushed into any costly scheme until I see that it cannot be done more cheaply. I have taken all the steps that I consider necessary at the moment. I have had a conference of people interested, and I have given instructions to have the matter examined. It has been examined to some extent and is still under examination.

Mr. HEWAT: Would the Minister think of bringing the Mail Boats into Dublin, and I will guarantee we will give them accommodation there?

Mr. BLYTHE: That, of course, would be a remedy. But I really have nothing at all to add to what I have said on the question of the suggestions put forward. There is nothing new in any of them.

Mr. GOOD: Might I point out that an important aspect of the situation has been lost sight of. Owing to the congestion on the pier arising from the examination of luggage, it is very difficult for persons meeting children to get on to the pier. That is a very important matter, particularly coming to the Christmas season, when a number of youngsters are coming home. I understand that the existing arrangement is that if one wants to get on to the pier one has to apply to the Harbour Master's office for permission, and in that way get a ticket. I am told that such applications have been refused on account of congestion on the pier, so that, from that point of view, I think it is absolutely essential that the examination of luggage should be removed altogether, if possible, in order that accommodation might be given to those other people, for whom I think it will be generally agreed some form of accommodation should be provided. This matter has been engaging the attention of some of the commercial bodies in the city, and I think they came to the conclusion that the practical solution of the difficulty would be to do away with the examination at Dun Laoghaire altogether, and let a similar method to that which Deputy Cooper has referred to be adopted at Dún Laoghaire as in the case of passengers arriving at Dover and going through to London. The examination of luggage should be done away with at Dun Laoghaire and should take place at Westland Row.

Accommodation could be easily provided there, and the work done in a much more expeditious way than at the moment. It is quite obvious that a certain amount of examination of luggage would still be necessary at Dun Laoghaire, for a number of people leave the pier there and go to places in the South, but that would be only a small portion of the amount of luggage going through. If the other method were adopted the greater part of the difficulty could be got over. I hope this matter will be kept before the Minister, and some solution provided.

Mr. BLYTHE: The question of examination at Westland Row is one of the suggestions that has been considered. That would involve expense and delay. A number of people might be going from Westland Row to different parts of the country, and it would involve difficulties for people who wanted to get down to Wicklow and Wexford. All the suggestions put up here have been examined. I do not see that better arrangements could be made, but the matter is under examination. It is impossible to find a way that would satisfy everybody. In fact it is impossible to find a way that does not create some new inconvenience. I believe it is impossible to allow people on the pier in any numbers without making congestion very much worse. There could be arrangements such as having an examination in Dun Laoghaire somewhere away from the pier. I do not know whether there is space there or not. I think the examination that is done at Dover is done at some considerable distance away from where the boat comes in.

Major COOPER: No, it is adjoining the quay.

Mr. BLYTHE: Yes, it is some hundreds of yards away. Perhaps some arrangement could be made that would do away with the bringing of trains on to the pier. I assure the Deputies that they are not full of new suggestions that nobody else ever thought of, and that the various suggestions that have been put forward raised their own difficulties. I can only promise that the matter will be kept under consideration.

Mr. GOOD: Would the Minister see that the question of access is made as easy as possible for children arriving there and expecting to see their parents on the pier, and that some arrangements could be made to meet their special grievances?

Mr. BLYTHE: I will take that into consideration, but I believe it would be difficult to allow any considerable number of people on the pier.

The Dáil adjourned at 8.40 p.m. until 3 o'clock to-morrow.

CEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS.

ORAL ANSWERS.

COMMITTEE OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

Captain REDMOND asked the President whether "The Committee of Public Accounts" as provided for in Standing Order No. 100 of Dáil Éireann has yet been appointed, and, if not, when it is proposed to do so.

The PRESIDENT: The Committee has not yet been appointed, as the first Appropriation Accounts of Saorstát Éireann are not yet due to be rendered. It is proposed to take steps for the appointment of the Committee as soon as the Comptroller and Auditor-General presents his Report on these Accounts.

REPORT OF COMPTROLLER AND AUDITOR-GENERAL.

Captain REDMOND asked the President whether the Comptroller and Auditor-General has yet made his Report on the Accounts for the last Financial Year, and, if so, when that Report will be presented to the Dáil.

The PRESIDENT: Under the Comptroller and Auditor-General Act of 1923, which incorporates the Exchequer and Audit Departments Acts, 1866 and 1921, the Appropriation Accounts of the several Supply Grants comprised in the Appropriation Act of each year, together with the Report of the Comptroller and Auditor-General thereon, shall be submitted to Dáil Éireann on or before 31st January, 1924, after the termination of the Financial Year to which the Accounts relate—that is, the 31st January next year for the accounts of 1922-23. There has been a certain delay in some Departments, owing to the circumstances connected with the transfer of the Exchequer and the general conditions prevailing last year, in furnishing the Accounts and Vouchers for the latter part of the Financial Year 1922-23, but it is, nevertheless, hoped that the Report on the Appropriation Accounts for the Financial Year, 1922-23 may be completed by the 31st January, 1924.

Captain REDMOND: Is there any possibility of a report for the end of the last financial year?

The PRESIDENT: That is for the year that I mentioned—1922-23. It is hoped that these accounts will be ready on the 31st January, 1924. I should say, with regard to that, I have some experience of public accounts, and the delay is not unreasonable. It is about three months beyond the date when some important local bodies manage to furnish their accounts. They are not audited for a long time after that.

DIRECTOR OF NATIONAL GALLERY.

Captain REDMOND asked the President if the Board of Governors and Guardians of the National Gallery of Ireland have just appointed a gentleman to be Director of the Gallery, and if, having regard to the importance to Ireland of the post and to the widespread disapproval which the announcement of the appointment has caused, the President is prepared to endorse and ratify the choice of the Board.

The PRESIDENT: The appointment of a Director of the National Gallery rests with the Board of Governors, which is a statutory body and are representative of the Art Institutions and art lovers of the country. There is no question of ratification or endorsement of the appointment by me.

Captain REDMOND: Does the President mean to say that he has got nothing to say to the appointment?

The PRESIDENT: Yes.

Captain REDMOND: Is the President aware that the gentleman proposed to be appointed has not been recommended—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: If the President has nothing to say to the appointment, he cannot answer.

Major COOPER: Arising out of that answer, surely some Minister is responsible for the appointment of the person who will be paid out of public funds, and, if so, to what Minister should we address our enquiries?

The PRESIDENT: I have stated that the Board of Governors is a statutory body. The Minister is not responsible any more than if the present judicial system were to prevail; it would not be the business of a Minister to interfere with the appointment by the Lord Chief Justice of a person in the Courts.

Captain REDMOND: Is the President aware that this gentleman will have at his disposal for expenditure a sum of £2,500 a year of public money?

The PRESIDENT: It depends on the Vote of the Dáil. I do not think the sum is £2,500; I think it is £1,000, but if the Deputy persists in saying it is £2,500, I will accept his statement.

Captain REDMOND: Would not the Minister have the right to control the appointment of a gentleman who would have at his disposal such a large sum of money? I think it is rather strange if he would not.

Mr. JOHNSON: May I ask a further question with regard to the answer of the President? In the Bill before us the Minister for Education is put in charge of the National Gallery. Are we to take it that the salary of any person appointed will be on the Estimates, and, therefore, can be discussed?

The PRESIDENT: I think it is a fair question, though I do not think it arises out of the original question put by the Deputy. I believe the salary will be on the Estimates, and it is open to the Dáil to refuse to pass it and to refuse to pay if it so desires.

PREMISES OF FERMOY EX-SERVICEMEN.

Major BRYAN COOPER asked the Minister for Finance whether he is aware that the premises of the Ex-Servicemen's Club in Fermoy have been taken over compulsorily by the Board of Works for the accommodation of the Gárda Síochána; whether a representative of the Board of Works promised the officials of the Club that they would be fully compensated both for the £200 worth of improvements they had made in the premises and also for disturbance, and whether, as nothing has been paid, he will expedite the settlement of this claim.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. Blythe): The premises referred to in this question consist of the old R.I.C. Barrack, in which the Civic Guard at Fermoy are accommodated. It was held by the R.I.C. on a lease for 21 years from 1903, the interest in which passed to the Free State Government. Between the dates of vacation by the R.I.C. and that of occupation by the Civic Guard the premises were occupied by the Legion of Irish Ex-Servicemen. Such occupation took place without the knowledge or consent of the Free State Government, and no claim by the Legion of Ex-Servicemen in respect of disturbance or for improvements would ordinarily lie against the Government, which, under the lease, is not responsible for the upkeep and maintenance of the premises.

I am having inquiries made regarding the promise of compensation which is stated to have been made by the representative of the Board of Works, and concerning which the Commissioners of Public Works have no knowledge.

INQUIRY INTO THE CASE OF NOEL LEMASS.

LIAM O DAIMHIN asked the Minister for Home Affairs what steps have been taken to comply with the demand of the Jury at the inquest on the late Noel Lemass, for a full judicial enquiry into the evidence, in view of their finding that the armed forces of the State were implicated in the removal

[Liam O Daimhín.] and disappearance of Noel Lemass from the streets of Dublin.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. K. O'Higgins): A Coroner's inquest is itself a judicial enquiry, and no machinery exists for enabling any further enquiry of the kind suggested to be held. If at any time sufficient evidence is forthcoming to connect any particular individual or individuals with the crime the appropriate court proceedings will be at once instituted for the purpose of having the charge investigated and dealt with in due course of law.

It is to be observed that the opinion expressed by the Jury to the effect that armed forces of the State were "implicated in the removal and disappearance of Noel Lemass from the streets of Dublin," was entirely unsupported by evidence.

REGISTRATION MACHINERY OF TRADE MARKS, ETC.

PEADAR UA DUBHGHAILL asked the Minister for Industry and Commerce if he is aware that the necessary facilities and machinery for the registration of Trade Marks, for the protection of Copyright, and for granting of Patents do not exist in the Saorstát; if steps are being taken to enact the legislation necessary to establish such powers and machinery; if he can say when the registration of Trade Marks, of Copyright, and of Patents will be possible, and if provisional protection of a reliable kind can be given in these matters pending legislation.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. Hogan, replying for Minister for Industry and Commerce): A Bill dealing with Patents, Trade Marks, and Copyright has been prepared and is now undergoing final consideration. It should be possible to introduce the Bill soon after Christmas.

In the meantime applications to register Trade Marks, Copyrights, and Patents are being recorded, and effect to be given to such applications will be determined by the provisions of the Bill.

HIRE OF WATERFORD POLLING STATION.

Captain REDMOND asked the Minister for Local Government whether the residence of Mr. John Power, 32, Peter's Lane, Waterford, was used as a polling booth during the recent Election in Waterford; whether Mr. Power has applied for payment both locally and to the Ministry, and whether the amount due to him will be paid forthwith.

Mr. BLYTHE: I will answer this question. The facts are as stated.

Payments of this kind are primarily a matter for the Returning Officer, to whom advances have been made enabling him to meet any reasonable claims.

I may say that the last advance was on December 11th, when £300 were sent. If the matter is not now settled, I will inquire further into it.

REPAIR AND MAINTENANCE OF CORK BRIDGES.

MICHEAL O HAONGHUSA asked the Minister for Local Government whether he is aware that the damage to the Crompane Bridge, near Youghal, Co. Cork, has not yet been repaired; that many heavy ratepayers living over a large area served by the bridge are very seriously inconvenienced; to ask what action, if any, it is intended to take to compel the Cork County Council or other Local Authority responsible for the repair and maintenance of this and many other destroyed bridges in Cork County to restore this bridge.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. Burke): The answer to the first part is in the affirmative. It is estimated that the reconstruction of this bridge will cost £2,500. The total estimated cost of repairing and reconstructing damaged bridges in the County is £163,961, and provision was not made by the Council in their rate estimates for the carrying out of this work. As regards the particular bridge referred to, I have not sufficient information before me as to whether rebuilding could be undertaken during the winter. If an application is made by the County Council for a loan for the purpose of rebuilding, the matter will receive immediate consideration.

Advances will be made from the Road Fund in the Spring of next year in connection with damaged bridges. The Road Fund will not receive until next month the first contributions from the special sixpenny rates under the Damage to Property (Compensation) Act, 1923.

COMPENSATION FOR PRE-TRUCE VOLUNTEERS.

SEAN O LAIDHIN asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that Divisional Commandant James Tormey, I.R.A., was killed in action at Cornafulla, Athlone, on February 2nd, 1921, and that Lieutenant Joseph Tormey was shot dead in Ballykinlar Camp on January 17th, 1921; further, whether it is proposed to grant compensation to the parents of the above, who reside at Moneen, Moate, and who are in poor circumstances owing to the loss of their sons.

MINISTER for DEFENCE (General Mulcahy): I am informed that James and Joseph Tormey were killed as stated. The question of compensation will be considered under the provisions of the Army Pensions Act, 1923.

Mr. LYONS: Will the Minister say if the same will apply to Joseph Sloane, who was killed at Ballykinlar at the same time?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is a separate question, I think.

FLOODING OF THE BARROW.

Mr. JOHN CONLAN asked the Minister for Local Government whether he is aware that great distress prevails in large areas of Counties Kildare, Leix and Offaly owing to the River Barrow overflowing its banks and ruining corn, hay, and other crops; that the people in consequence are unable to pay Land Commission annuities, to ask what steps, if any, he proposes to take in the matter.

Mr. HOGAN: I will answer this question. The conditions referred to have been in existence for a great many years, and they were considered when advances for purchase were being sanctioned and when annuities were being fixed.

With regard to the drainage of the Barrow generally, it involves financial, engineering and legal difficulties, which could not be settled at once, and, while it is recognised that a scheme for the drainage of the Barrow would bring real relief to the farmers in the districts mentioned, it is clear that work of this magnitude is not for the Land Commission. Whatever measures may be appropriate in connection with the drainage of the Barrow and the relief of the farmers concerned, Land Commission annuities must be paid.

Mr. CONLAN: Is the Minister aware that very exceptional circumstances exist this year?

Mr. HOGAN: Does the Deputy mean exceptional circumstances in connection with the flooding of the Barrow?

Mr. CONLAN: Yes

Mr. HOGAN: I am aware that the flooding this year is a little more than usual. As I stated, when these lands were being valued by the Land Commission, and when advances were made and annuities fixed, the fact that these lands were liable to periodic floods was taken into account.

Mr. GOREY: Is the Minister aware that in this and in other districts the position is getting worse, inasmuch as the waterways are being choked up in a manner worse than they were ten or twenty years ago?

Mr. HOGAN: I am aware the conditions are a little worse this year, and I will ask a rhetorical question which is really an answer to the question. Is the Deputy aware that it is absolutely essential for the credit of this country that Land Commission Annuities should be paid up?

Mr. GOREY: Is the Minister aware that Land Commission Annuities cannot be recovered from water and swamps?

Mr. HOGAN: That question does not arise.

DIVISION OF MOATE ESTATES.

SEAN O LAIDHIN asked the Minister for Agriculture whether it is intended to acquire under the Land Act, 1923, the estates of Captain Bailey, situate at Ballinaderry, Moate, for division amongst congests.

Mr. HOGAN: It is not possible at present to state whether the lands referred to will be acquired or not.

WRITTEN ANSWERS.

ACQUISITION OF LAND IN CO. WESTMEATH.

SEAN O LAIDHIN asked the Minister for Agriculture whether it is intended to acquire through the Land Commission for division amongst the people the ranches of Mr. Harris Temple, of Drumraney, Colonel Malone, of Shinglas, Ballymore, Mrs. Hall, Clare Hill, Ballymore, and of Mrs. O'Donoghue, Rosemount, Moate.

Mr. HOGAN: It is not possible at present to state whether the lands referred to will be required for the relief of congestion.

CHARLEVILLE ARMY ACCOUNTS.

MICHEAL O hAONGHUSA asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that Messrs. Cahill and Kelleher, Merchants, Charleville, Co. Cork, have repeatedly furnished long overdue accounts to the Military Authorities for payment, and if he will state when those accounts will be disbursed.

General MULCAHY: Claims have been received from Mr. Michael Cahill, Main Street, Charleville, in respect of hire of and damage to a motor lorry. The investigation of the claims is being expedited, and it is hoped to have them cleared very quickly. Assuming that Messrs Cahill and Kelleher refer to different firms, there is no trace of a claim from Mr. Kelleher at Headquarters.

INTERPRETATION BILL, 1923.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Before entering upon the Orders of the Day, there is a report from the Special Committee appointed to consider the Interpretation Bill. It will be necessary to decide whether the Bill, as amended, is to be printed, and to fix a date for its consideration on the Report Stage.

Professor THRIFT: As Chairman of the Special Committee that sat, I move to report progress. The Special Committee on that Bill met this morning and made certain amendments, which are now in the copy of the Bill laid on the Table. I move that progress be reported and that the Bill be printed and circulated.

Question: "That the Bill, as amended in Committee, be printed"—put and agreed to.

Report Stage ordered for Thursday, 13th December.

DAIL IN COMMITTEE.

MINISTERS AND SECRETARIES BILL, 1923—THIRD STAGE (RESUMED).

Discussion of Section 7 resumed.

Mr. THOMAS NAGLE: I beg to move Amendment No. 32, to delete Sub-section 3.

The object of this amendment is to make the position of Parliamentary Secretaries an honorary one. The whole question has already been discussed pretty fully, and I do not think

I need say anything further on the matter.

Amendment put and negatived.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I beg to move Amendment No. 33:—To insert before the word "each" at the beginning of Sub-section (3), line 43, the following words:—

"There shall be paid out of moneys provided by the Oireachtas to," and after the word "Act" to insert at the end of line 43 the following words:—

"Who shall not by his appointment be declared to be appointed without salary, such," and to delete line 44 and to add at the end of the sub-section the following proviso:—

Provided however that the total number of persons who shall at any one time be in receipt of salaries as Ministers or as Parliamentary Secretaries shall not exceed fifteen."

The object of this amendment is first of all to provide that the number of Parliamentary Secretaries in receipt of any salary that may be paid, shall not at any one time, together with the number of Ministers, exceed 15. That will not prevent the appointment of honorary Parliamentary Secretaries in accordance with the wishes just expressed by Deputy Nagle. One of the effects of the amendment will be that, on appointment, it must be declared whether a Parliamentary Secretary is appointed with or without salary.

Major BRYAN COOPER: I want to congratulate the Government upon the action they have taken in this matter. They have met the opinion which I expressed on Second Reading when I stated that seven Ministers and seven Parliamentary Secretaries would be enough. I am not going to quarrel with the fact that the Attorney-General requires one more, so that the number fourteen, as contemplated by me, is increased by the Government to fifteen. If they desire to appoint one extra, by all means let them do so. What I call attention to is that when I urged that course on Second Reading the Attorney-General stigmatised my arguments as superficial and unsound. Yet, after mature deliberation, he adopts that very scheme as his own. The explanation is a simple one. I did not convince the Attorney-General. I do not think I have convinced him even now, but I think I convinced the Minister for Finance, who adopted my view yesterday on this matter. This, I think, affords a very good indication of the value to be attached to discussion. If Ministers take a little longer time to get their Bills through, they may be comforted by the fact that in the end they do get their Bills in an improved form, as compared with the form in which they were introduced.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: May I point out that while argument may be unsound, conclusions may be sound.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I would like to congratulate the Attorney-General on having introduced this amendment, and I only desire to say that I doubt that such an amendment ever would be introduced but for the putting forward of argument inside and outside the House that was stigmatised by the Government in opprobrious terms.

The PRESIDENT: I might, perhaps, draw attention to the fact that when introducing this Bill, I said it was not intended to appoint more than three Parliamentary Secretaries.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: I beg to move Amendment 34. In Sub-section (3), line 46, to delete the figures "£1,200," and to substitute therefor the figures "£600."

My object in moving the amendment is very much the same as that which animated me in moving a previous amendment in regard to the reduction of salaries of Ministers.

In this matter, however, in suggesting the reduction of the salaries of Parliamentary Secretaries, as fixed by the Bill, I am on surer ground than in the case of the former amendment. Here we are dealing with appointments and with salaries to men who have not yet started to perform their duties, and we are dealing with salaries which are to apply to positions that did not exist before. I think, for these reasons, it is very important, at the commencement at least, that the salaries to be paid to the Parliamentary Secretaries should be fixed at a reasonable amount. It seems to me that when we get more experience of Parliamentary work, and know the material of which the secretaries are composed, it would then be in the power of the Oireachtas to increase these salaries, if they thought well to do so. I also think—and it is very reasonable to expect—that we have here in this Dáil many young men who would be anxious to take up the duties of Parliamentary Secretaries at comparatively small salaries, in order that they might serve their political apprenticeship, and at the end of that time might rise to greater eminence and higher salaries.

The PRESIDENT: I would like to say, on this amendment, that I am rather surprised the Deputy did not compare the salary which he proposes to pay in this case with the salary paid in similar employment outside. We are not concerned in getting Parliamentary Secretaries who will serve an apprenticeship at the cost of the State. We are concerned with the appointment of Parliamentary Secretaries who will do more than what we call Parliamentary duties, as I have explained on one or two occasions. I have examined this amendment from the point of view of how much extra the Deputy would receive for the duties which it is proposed to impose upon him or to ask him to discharge. In the case of a single man appointed to this position, his salary would be £166 17s. 6d. per annum, a little over £3 a week, over and above what he would be entitled to receive as a member of this Dáil. I thought the Deputy would be in a position to give the Dáil some information as to what is usually paid to the Secretary of the Farmers' Union or a Secretary of a County Council, or some other official associated with the activities of the party to which he belongs, and of which he has got expert knowledge. I would like to know of a case of any whole-time officer to any one of these bodies—a County Council or a Farmers' Union—who has only £166 17s. 6d. per annum. There is nobody that I know of in a position to take up such important duties at this particular price. I think the Deputy ought to take the Dáil into his confidence, and tell us where these great men are to be found who are capable of doing so much at such a figure, because we certainly do not know.

Mr. WILSON: I would like to point out to the President that the Secretary of the Wicklow County Council has a salary of £500 a year, and that although there is only a difference of £160 between a Deputy's allowance here and the salary proposed to be paid to these Parliamentary Secretaries, it is well to point out that it is not intended, I think, that these Parliamentary Secretaries would be living outside the City of Dublin. Therefore, the £360 a year allowance would in that case be more or less a salary. It will not be considered in the light of expenses, because the Parliamentary Secretary would be living at home. The salary of £50 a month for a beginning, except of course in the case of a man of exceptional ability, is, I think, a very fair start. It is a salary which a man in the Civil Service takes years to reach. Therefore, we think that the salary to be paid to these Parliamentary Secretaries should start fairly small, and that they should be given gradual increments in the future.

Amendment put and negatived.

Mr. C. HOGAN: I beg to move Amendment 35, to delete in Sub-section (3), line 46, the figures "£1,200" and to substitute therefor the figure "£800."

The effect of the amendment is to have the salaries proposed to be paid to Parliamentary Secretaries reduced from £1,200 a year to £800 a year. We are all very well aware that this salary cannot be regarded as setting up a very generous standard. But all things considered, it cannot be regarded as meagre or as unfair. A man's work in any Department is conditioned by two things: First, the service he renders, and secondly, the capacity of the nation to pay. The services rendered by these Parliamentary Secretaries would be of a subordinate, if not of a subservient, character. They will not have the responsibility of the Minister, and consequently they will only be filling a minor rôle. As a matter of fact, I think a well-trained Civil Servant would be a greater acquisition, and a more desirable asset in any Department than a Parliamentary Secretary, for, when everything is considered, you must regard your proposed Parliamentary Secretaries for some time to come, at least, as unskilled labourers. Secondly, as to the capacity of the people to pay, I do not think that at the present time, when we are faced with a deficit of eighteen and a half millions, that we should set up a champagne standard of emoluments. It would be very undesirable, all things considered, seeing the poverty of the country, that such high salaries should be paid. I think the Dáil should set a good example and leave the salary of these Parliamentary Secretaries at £800 a year.

The PRESIDENT: I did not know that there were any unskilled labourers in the country earning £800 a year. I do not know whether any are paid that salary down in the Deputy's own county or not. In this case an unmarried man would get £320 a year, over and above his allowances, and, as I said before, we have got no information from the financial experts on the benches opposite, as to what they pay the secretaries of their own Farmers' Union. I think they ought to take us into their confidence and give us some idea as to what they pay these secretaries, because I have very great respect for the organisation of the farmers. I have seen the activities of these men, and I know of their usefulness, and it would be a headline for us, perhaps, if we were told the salaries paid to them. The Deputy stated that the salary he suggested would be, in essence, what a civil servant would get. The salaries paid to Executive Officers in the Civil Service range, I believe, from £700 to £900 a year with bonus. But, in this case, the Deputy proposes to pay less to Parliamentary Secretaries than is paid to the higher Executive Officers in the Civil Service. While the Deputy may say that these Parliamentary Secretaries had not got the responsibility, I may say that they have practically the responsibility of a Minister, with the difference, perhaps, that fewer bricks are thrown at them than at the Ministers.

It is very doubtful whether they will not suffer the same discredit in the event of any catastrophies occurring that a Minister will have to bear. One cannot say that an allowance is not eaten up if the member stays in Dublin. Everybody knows that the expenses in connection with membership of this House are not confined to hotel expenses. A Minister or a Parliamentary Secretary, or anybody of that sort, will have certain expenses over and above what attaches to the ordinary member. It has been stated on many occasions, as a reason why people should be paid a fair wage, that they should have a reasonable hope of comfort or a reasonable chance of keeping themselves free from the burden of debt, and that where such conditions do not obtain one does not get really good results. In this case a Parliamentary Secretary is in more or less the experimental stage. One can only say that during our experience Parliamentary Secretaries have had practically the same hours of work, as, and perhaps on some occasions, even longer hours of work than, Ministers themselves.

When calculating what salary ought to be paid the persons taking up those positions, one must take into consideration the value received for that work. I am satisfied, from my experience, that we have had good sound value for the work. I am satisfied, even with the deficit of eighteen and a half millions that the Deputy has mentioned, that it is still an economic proposition to incur this extra expense. I am not satisfied that a reasonable case has been made for the acceptance of the lower figure.

Mr. GOREY: I think the Minister makes his defence on the assumption that there is somebody in the service of the Farmers' Union or some other Union in receipt of a bigger salary than this. As far as I can gather from his remarks, his whole case turns on that. The highest salary paid to an official of the Farmers' Union—our General Secretary and Organiser—is £700, and that salary was fixed in 1918 or 1919, the peak years. What our policy will be in reconsidering that salary, it is not for me to say at the moment, without consideration. That gentleman has been sent to America on the business of the State. He was described by a Minister as a superman, a man I believe who was not to be found on their own benches. In my time in the Dáil I have seen very little signs of supermen. There may be supermen amongst the Ministers, but I was unable to see amongst the rank and file any trace of these supermen. I think them very ordinary individuals, and the general public think them very ordinary individuals, men who are to be met in almost any walk of life, commercial or otherwise. To offer £800 to these young men who are, as Deputy Heffernan said, being placed on the road to still greater things, I think is a very respectable inducement. Even £800, with income-tax—I forgot to mention that our Secretary is also subject to income-tax—is a very fine start for our ambitious and capable young men. I think the amendment is a reasonable one.

We were charged here the other day with eye-wash, a charge that I resent personally, and on behalf of the Party that I represent. My idea in facing the economic situation, the situation described by the Minister for Finance, was that everybody should lend a hand in tiding over the difficulty, that everybody should accept a cut. That is a very fine doctrine for everybody except ourselves. When it comes to ourselves we find a very different outlook. We find ourselves making a case for ourselves. And our case, when made, is a very bad case in comparison with that which other men in the country can make when the question of a ten per cent. cut is put to them. The case we can make personally is a very poor case, indeed, in comparison with that of every other class of the community. I think this amendment offers fair remuneration even for the super work required from these supermen. We do not begrudge men holidays; we do not begrudge them amusement. But our own officials have not been seen unduly on racecourses or anywhere else. We do not object to anybody else being there, but we do think that £800 is a fairly decent salary to offer. It is as much as this State can afford. Therefore, I support this amendment.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: I rise to support the Deputy who put forward this amendment. If the President is anxious to get facts and figures with regard to the salaries paid the County Secretaries of Farmers' Unions, I will be very pleased to give him all the facts and figures he requires. I would be more or less ashamed to state here in the Dáil the actual salaries they receive, and I can say that if the President will base the salaries of his Ministers and of his Parliamentary Secretaries on the salaries of the County Secretaries of the Farmers' Union, we will be perfectly satisfied with the work he is doing in the interest of economy. He also mentioned the Secretaries of the County Councils. In that regard, I see more or less eye to eye with him. I believe the salaries of Parliamentary Secretaries ought at least to be equal to the salaries of Secretaries to County Councils, or, perhaps, somewhat more. But I am also strongly of opinion that the salaries of the Secretaries of the County Councils are in most cases too high, and should be reduced, as also the salaries of other officers of Local Government Boards throughout the country. I notice that the amendments on the paper dealing with this matter are on an ascending scale. They start at £600, go up to £800, and from that to £1,200. I would suggest to the President, before he allows the amendment to be put, that he should do what is commonly done in the farming business—split the difference and fix the salary between £600 and £1,200.

The PRESIDENT: The point I mentioned in connection with the last recommendation that the salary should be £600, still holds with regard to this. The salary is only £322 over that of a member, and no member of the Farmers' Union has proved that £322 is a fair salary for this position.

Amendment put.

Major COOPER: I beg to move:—
 “In Sub-section (3), line 46, to delete the figures ‘£1,200’ and 4 o'clock. to substitute therefor ‘£1,000.’” I did not vote on the last division because I think the salary would be too low. At the same time, I was not anxious to endorse the President's arguments, because I knew they would be probably used against me on this amendment. I shall try and give the Dáil some of the reasons that actuated me in putting down £1,000 instead of £1,200 as a suitable salary for these new secretaries. The President stated yesterday that the reason he was calling them secretaries was because of the British precedent, and because it was a post that was known. In fixing their salaries I hold it is not unfair to adopt a British precedent also. The salary of a first-class British Minister, such as is attached to the Colonial Office, would be £5,000, and the Secretary to such a Minister would get £1,500 a year. The salaries of second-class British Ministers, such as are attached to the Board of Education and the Ministry of Pensions, amount to £2,000, and the Secretary would get £1,200. We are proposing to pay our Secretaries on the same scale as the British Secretaries are paid in the Board of Education and the Ministry of Pensions and other Ministries.

I hardly think a case can be made out for that. There should be some ratio between the salary of the Minister and the salary of the Secretary. It would obviously be absurd for the Secretary to get more than the Minister. I venture to think this amendment preserves that ratio in the fairest manner. A British Minister gets £2,000; our Minister gets £1,700. Where a British Secretary gets £1,200, our Secretary should get £1,000. I suggest, as our Ministers get £300 less than British Ministers, so our Secretaries should get £200 less than the British Secretaries. In that case we preserve the ratio and make a smaller cut in the smaller salary. That is a reasonable contention.

The President will, no doubt, tell me what the total amount will be when he has deducted the salary of the Deputy, together with income-tax, etc. I would like to point out that by being appointed a Secretary, a Deputy will gain certain advantages. Some of his duties as a Deputy will not be quite so arduous as before. He will not be expected to put down questions, and unless questions are addressed to his Department he need not be in his place in the Dáil during question time. He will have facilities, if his correspondence is rather heavy, because he will presumably be given a Secretary from the Civil Service who will help him to deal with his correspondence. There are those advantages to be set off against the £360. It is suggested that he will also get a certain amount of free postage. I do not know about that, but it has been suggested that Ministers get free postage for their correspondence. I can hardly believe it, but yet it is suggested. I am not going to make that a definite charge.

Most important of all, however, is that the Secretary will have his foot on the ladder of promotion. A Secretary of a County Council can never become anything more, but a Parliamentary Secretary, who performs his duty efficiently, and pleases the Dáil with his advocacy, has a very good chance of becoming a Minister. He is not in a blind alley, and therefore I think £1,000 is a reasonable salary. It is not an enormous amount, I agree, but it is an amount consistent with our means, and it is also sufficient to keep up such dignity as the position of Secretary possesses.

The PRESIDENT: The Deputy asked me what is the difference between this salary and what he would receive as a Minister. It would depend whether the man is married or single. If you take a single man, the net salary he would receive, if the proposal was passed, would be £387. That would be in addition to his £360. I do not know whether the Deputy has carefully examined the clause as amended. In any case the words "an annual sum not exceeding a sum of £1,200," do not give any undertaking that in the case of any appointment there would not be a recommendation for less than £1,200. As the Deputy says, there is always an opportunity of having those appointments criticised, and it would be better, I think, that it would be left at £1,200, because as the work decreases—and we hope it will—there will not be the same need for appointments of Parliamentary Secretaries, or, perhaps, for the appointment of them, at such salaries. I do say, from our experience of the last twelve to eighteen months, that it is not a fair comparison to put these Parliamentary Secretaries along side Parliamentary Secretaries to British Ministers. I do not think there is any comparison with the British Cabinet so far as the hours of work are concerned. It may have been a fair comparison during the war. I read on one occasion where a member of the British Cabinet complained they had been working 14 to 16 hours a day. During normal times it is not likely such hours of service would have to be given. It may be so for some years to come, but I think, in the exceptional circumstances of the times, the suggested salary is scarcely a fair salary. Parliamentary Secretaries have not got the same opportunities as Ministers. Even though there is an apprenticeship in an appointment such as this, there is not the same opportunity as Ministers have of making a name or, perhaps, of losing it. It is a case in which a man cuts himself away from his profession or his business without the notoriety of doing it, and perhaps with a good deal of criticism for doing it. The impression sometimes circulated about a person like that is that it is a soft job. I think those Deputies who have come in contact with men doing that work are satisfied that good services have been rendered. I think in view of the circumstances, the Deputy should not press his amendment.

Major COOPER: I am afraid I am not entirely convinced by the President's argument. In practice the maximum salary nearly always stands to be the normal salary. Where it is laid down that it shall not exceed a certain amount, there is always strong pressure brought to bear that it shall be that amount. Once posts are established, and once people draw salaries from those posts, it is very hard to make a reduction. I do not know whether those Secretaries will be acknowledged as Ministers within the Constitution, so that no reduction will be made in their salaries. Even if they are not given that protection, it would be a painful and unpleasant thing to come here and propose a reduction of the salary of an individual you know, and very possibly like. Nothing is easier than to increase a salary. When we are starting let us get on sound lines.

If it is found impossible to get men for the post at £1,000, I am quite certain the Dáil would give its confidence to the President if he said the salary must be £1,200. I think £1,000 is quite enough, in the circumstances of the time, and in view of the fact that these men will not have served a long political apprenticeship. I am, therefore, afraid I will have to stand by my amendment.

The PRESIDENT: The point with regard to having the salary fixed at a lower figure, has been raised. There is nothing to prevent the Minister or the Dáil from doing that, but there is this objection: it would mean an Act of Parliament. That is where the difficulty comes in. It would mean passing an Act to give £200 a year more to a Parliamentary Secretary.

Major COOPER: The President passes Acts very easily and very quickly.

The PRESIDENT: I am not so sure of that.

Amendment put.

Mr. JOHNSON: I move Amendment 37:—

“ Before Sub-Section (4) to insert a new Sub-Section as follows: ‘ Not more than one Parliamentary Secretary shall be appointed in respect of any Department of State.’ ”

I take it this merely puts into words what is the intention of the Minister, but I think it is desirable that there should be a definition in this matter and that the number of Secretaries to be appointed should be restricted to one for each Department of State.

The PRESIDENT: We will accept this amendment, or, at any rate, the principle of it, but it may be necessary to alter the wording of it later on.

Mr. JOHNSON: I take it that the amendment is accepted and that if any verbal alteration is needed it can be made at a later stage.

The PRESIDENT: Yes, that is so.

Amendment agreed to.

AMENDMENT 38.

In Sub-Section (4), lines 51 and 52, to delete the words “ Executive Minister ” and to substitute therefor the words “ Executive Councillor or Minister not a member of the Executive Council," and in lines 53 and 54 to delete the words "Executive Minister with the concurrence of the Executive Council" and to substitute therefor the words "Executive Councillor or Minister not a member of the Executive Council."

Mr. T. MURPHY: Is it necessary to move this amendment standing in my name?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Part of this amendment has been disposed of on amendment 29, but another part has become necessary owing to amendments passed already.

Mr. JOHNSON: May I suggest it will be necessary, in view of previous amendments, to delete the word "executive" before "Minister" in lines 51 and 53, inasmuch as it is provided that non-Executive Ministers may appoint Secretaries, so that the word "executive" as placed before "Minister" in each case should be deleted.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: That part of the amendment is a necessary consequential amendment to amendments already passed.

Mr. JOHNSON: I move in lines 51 and 53 that the word "executive" where it precedes "Minister" should be deleted.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Amendment 38 is, therefore, withdrawn, and a new amendment is proposed by Deputy Johnson, in lines 51 and 53 to delete the word "executive" where it occurs before the word "Minister."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS O'CONNELL: I beg to move Amendment 39:—

In Sub-section (4) to delete all after the word "shall" in line 52 and to substitute therefor the words "give such assistance to the Executive Council or such Minister as may be required of him."

The object of the amendment is to make clearer the powers and duties of those Parliamentary Secretaries. I think we have it clear now that they are really, if not so called, Assistant Ministers, and the amendment seeks to make it quite clear that they are to assist the Minister. The sub-section, as it stands, speaks of the delegation of powers, but I think these are rather inadvisable terms to use in this connection. It would rather take from, or might possibly take from, the responsibility of the Minister to this Dáil. I think the position is that even though Parliamentary Secretaries are employed, the Minister, and the Minister alone, is primarily responsible, and it is that I desire to be made clear by the amendment.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I hardly think that Deputy O'Connell's amendment is an improvement on the provision as it stands. I do not quite know whether the provision that they are to give assistance to the Ministers has any relation to the figure at which their salary is placed. I am afraid that the phrasing of the amendment as proposed is not clear enough; but it does occur to me that sub-section (4), in view of the amendments carried, will require some consideration, and I think it might be well reconsidered before the Report stage in connection especially with the two paragraphs inserted on the motion of Deputy Johnson.

Mr. JOHNSON: I take it the intention is still to retain the Minister as the responsible person in the matter, and that there must be some alteration in the phraseology. It will remove the suggestion that he may delegate not merely duties but responsibilities. I think, in view of that, the Deputy might withdraw his amendment in its present form on the intimation that the intention will be provided for at a later stage.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question: "That Section 7, as amended, stand part of the Bill"—put and agreed to.

SECTION 8.

(1) There shall be and there is hereby constituted a Council of Defence to assist the Minister for Defence in the administration of the business of the Department of Defence, but without derogating from the responsibility of the Minister for Defence of the Executive Council and to the Oireachtas respectively for all the administration and business of the Department of Defence and for the exercise and performance of all the powers, duties and functions connected therewith.

(2) The Council of Defence shall consist of the following members, namely, the Minister for Defence, who (under the style of "Commander-in-Chief") shall be Chairman of the Council of Defence, and four other members amongst whom shall be distributed the principal divisions or branches of the business of the Council of Defence, that is to say, a civil member being the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for Defence who shall be responsible to the Ministry of Defence for the finance of the Military Defence Forces and for so much of the other business of the Council of Defence as may be from time to time assigned to him by the Minister for Defence and three military members being commissioned members of the said Defence Forces who shall be the Chief of Staff, the Adjutant-General and the Quartermaster-General and shall be respectively responsible to the Minister for Defence for the administration of so much of the business relating to the raising, training, organisation, disposition, personnel, supply, equipment, armament, management, discipline, control and maintenance of the Defence Forces as shall be from time to time assigned to them or any of them by the Minister for Defence.

(3) The Minister for Defence may specially reserve to himself any of the business of the Council of Defence.

(4) The Secretary of the Department of Defence shall act as Secretary of the Council of Defence and shall perform such duties as may be from time to time assigned to him by the Minister for Defence.

(5) The Military members of the Council of Defence shall respectively hold that office at the pleasure of the Minister for Defence.

(6) The Council of Defence shall meet and act as a collective body and shall be collectively responsible for all matters entrusted to it in its collective capacity whether by any Act of the Oireachtas or otherwise.

(7) The Council of Defence may, subject to the approval of the Minister for Defence, regulate its own procedure and time and place of meeting but it shall meet whenever required by the Minister for Defence so to do and in any case there shall be at least one meeting of the Council every six months.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I beg to move Amendment 1, to delete this section. We have in various parts of the Bill been discussing matters of very great administrative importance. I take this to be a matter of quite a different character altogether. This raises not merely a matter that is important from an administrative point of view, but is important respecting a fundamental principle concerning the future conduct of this State. We are, in this Bill, making provision, presumably, for the administration of a civil body, and of a civil Executive responsible to this Dáil, and quite gratuitously there has been introduced into this Bill a semi-responsible military body which is described as a Council of Defence. This Bill is entitled "The Ministers and Secretaries Bill." The Attorney-General indicates that perhaps at a later stage it might be called "The Ministers, Secretaries and Attorney-General Bill." All those various persons designated in that title are civil authorities responsible to this Dáil. Here we have introduced the principle of persons who shall constitute a military tribunal not responsible to this Dáil. No one military person is really responsible to this Dáil at all.

I wish to draw attention to certain words in particular that fall under Subsection 6, where it reads, that "The Council of Defence shall meet and act as a collective body, and shall be collectively responsible for all matters entrusted to it in its collective capacity, whether by any act of the Oireachtas or otherwise." These are very extraordinary words. We have the words "collectively responsible." I ask, collectively responsible to whom? They cannot be collectively responsible to this Dáil, because this Dáil has no knowledge of any military person at all. It has only knowledge of a Minister for Defence who shall not be a military person. To whom, then, is this Military Council to be collectively responsible? I suggest that the answer is a very obvious one, and not a pleasant one, and that is that the collective responsibility of the Council of Defence will be a collective responsibility to the Army.

The Minister for Defence and myself have participated, from different points of view, in a movement that resulted in the establishment of the Free State, and he knows, and I know, that at an earlier stage when the Army, as the Irish Republican Army, was first established, that it was then placed under Dáil Éireann in the year 1919. Prior to that the movement had been known as the Irish Volunteers. The Minister for Defence knows, and I know, that the Irish Volunteers met in a special deliberative convention to decide whether it would permit itself to be placed under civil authority or not, and the decision taken was that it should be placed under that authority, under a Military Council, and a Military Council, did, in fact, for a long number of years exercise powers that were, under the circumstances, inevitable; but unfortunately this Military Council was not so completely under the Civil Authority as it might have been, and I fear that there is a tendency in this Section to create a Military Council of Defence that is intended to act as a corporate and as a collective body. Collectively responsible, as this Bill says, is collectively responsible not primarily to this Dáil or to the Oireachtas, but to the Army, and that is a very serious state of affairs. In any case there are the words "collective responsibility." It cannot be said that the Council of Defence are collectively responsible to this Dáil, because the only person whom the Dáil recognises in any military authority or responsibility whatever, is not a body comprised of persons, most of whom are not members of the Dáil, but of one person only, and that is the Minister for Defence, who, in order to become a member of this Dáil is no longer to be a military person.

Captain REDMOND: He is to be under this proposal.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Yes, but the words by which he is so placed in that position in this Section are in conflict with the words "collectively responsible." That is the point I want to make. One part of the Section states that the Minister for Defence shall be responsible to this Dáil; another part of the Section states that a Council of Defence shall be created of which he is only Chairman, and that the Council of Defence shall act as a single collegiate body. That leads to the next point that I wish to deal with, which is in Sub-section 2. It says that the Council of Defence shall consist of certain persons, chief of whom is the Minister for Defence.

Here is a remarkable fact with regard to this sub-section 2. As Chairman of the Council of Defence he is no more the Minister for Defence. He becomes there the Commander-in-Chief. He shall be styled Commander-in-Chief. That is not only an undesirable provision in itself, and a very dangerous provision in itself, but it is actually contrary to the law of this country. I have in my hand the Defence Forces (Temporary Provisions) Act (No. 30) of 1923. Part I, Chapter I, Section 5, states "the command-in-chief of and all executive and administrative powers in relation to the Forces (including the power to delegate authority to such persons as may be thought fit) shall be vested in the Executive Council." That is part of the permanent provisions of this Act, but, lest there should be any confusion, the very phrase is repeated in the temporary provisions of this Act, in Part IV, where it says "the command-in-chief of and all executive and administrative powers in relation to the national forces" I exclude the parenthesis—"shall be vested in the Executive Council, and exercised through it, in the name of the Minister." In other words, the law of this State has laid it down, quite clearly and quite firmly, that the Commander-in-Chief is not a person, but is the entire Executive Council. That is a safe and right and necessary provision. It has a parallel in the provision in the United States' Constitution, by which the Chief Executive, who is the President, by reason of being Chief Executive of the State, is ipso facto the Commander-in-Chief of the United States army. In Ireland, the Chief Executive is held, in fact, in the Executive Council. The provision that I have just read from the Defence Forces Act states that the Executive Council, who have executive authority in the Free State, acting as a body, is the Commander-in-Chief. But here it states that the Council of Defence shall consist of, amongst others, the Minister for Defence, who, under the style of Commander-in-Chief, shall be Chairman of the Council of Defence. In the Dáil we know him as a member of the Executive Council; we know him as a member of the highest responsible authority in this State, in which is vested the Commander-in-Chief of the army, but when he removes himself from here and becomes part of the Council of Defence, which is the Army Council in a new guise, he becomes a military person, though we knew him here in a non-military capacity. We knew him here as a Minister amongst other Ministers, but there he becomes Commander-in-Chief of the army. I say that that is a very dangerous provision to adopt. I do not know that any country would consent to a provision of this kind. In other countries the practice is, as members of this Dáil are very well aware, that there is no Commander-in-Chief, as such, of the army. There may be a Commander-in-Chief appointed in charge of an expeditionary Force; there may be a Commander-in-Chief appointed for an army in a certain location, but there is no Commander-in-Chief of the entire army. That is the prerogative of Parliament as it should be and was intended to be. I know that nominally the title is held by the king, but in the various Acts that have been passed (Mutiny and Army Acts) it has been laid down as a principle that the actual command should vest in the authority that issues the money by which that Force is maintained, and the real Commander-in-Chief is the Chief Civil Authority. Therefore, when those words were adopted in our Army Act we were glad that they were adopted. Now they are to be departed from, and I say that if these provisions, standing as they are, are to be adopted, we are taking in a very dangerous principle into this State, a thing that strikes at the fundamental principle of Statehood, which is that the civil authority shall be supreme. I do not see, in any case, why military matters of this kind should come into a Bill of this nature, which is a purely civil Bill. Apart altogether from that, if provisions are to be adopted, they should be of a kind not like the provisions in this section; they should insist that the Minister for Defence is purely Minister for Defence, and that all persons acting under his authority should act separately under his authority as Minister for Defence without admitting the dangerous principle that is embodied in this section. I move that this section be deleted from the Bill.

Mr. JOHNSON: I do not want to repeat the arguments of Deputy Figgis, which follows very much the lines I had intended to elaborate if I had moved this motion. I would like the Minister for Defence, or the Attorney-General, to inform us whether the army has been established under Section 22 of the Defence Forces (Temporary Provisions) Act, and whether the date has been fixed by proclamation. The necessity for this Section is not understood by me. I cannot understand why it is necessary to insert in this Bill a provision respecting the Ministry of Defence, which has not been found necessary respecting other Ministries.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE
 at this stage took the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON: There has been no suggestion, for instance, of appointing a Council to assist the Minister for Fisheries or the Minister for Home Affairs. Nevertheless, each of those Ministers has, within his authority, the right and power to delegate certain responsibilities to persons in the control of his Department. In the Defence Forces Act it is laid down that the Minister may delegate authority to such persons as may be thought fit or that the Minister and Executive Council together may do so, but that the Minister shall not allocate to himself any Executive military command. All the requirements of the case regarding a Council to assist the Minister in the technical work of the Ministry of Defence are already embodied in an Act of the Oireachtas. It seems to me that the introduction of this Section has the effect of placing the Minister for Defence in a different category from Ministers having charge of other Departments. I agree with Deputy Figgis that the effect of the section is to distribute responsibility, notwithstanding the statement in Section 1, that there shall be no derogation from the Minister's responsibility. The very fact that we are, by Statute, asked to appoint a Council of Defence to assist the Minister, imposes upon the Council certain authority, as distinct from the responsibility of the Minister. The fact that there is appointed by Statute a Council to assist the Minister, and that the Council is, in part, named beforehand, imposes upon the Council a responsibility direct to the Dáil, thereby relieving the Minister of some of his responsibility. A Council of Defence, which may be necessary, can be appointed under the present law by the Minister and Executive Council. If the Bill which is before us passes into law, a Parliamentary Secretary may be appointed. But Sub-section 2 of this Section insists that there shall be a Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for Defence, rather suggesting that it is contemplated in the future that the Ministry of Defence is going to be a very much more important body than one would hope the future of the country would require. Surely, we are not contemplating permanent Defence Forces of such a character as would require not only a Minister but a Parliamentary Secretary. The arguments that have been used in favour of the appointment of Parliamentary Secretaries may be strong in respect of Finance, Justice, Home Affairs, Industry and Commerce and Agriculture, because one can imagine that, as the development of the country proceeds, these Departments will have more and more to do. But if that development, industrially and agriculturally, proceeds in the manner we would like, one would hope that the Department of Defence would have very little to do except keep in being the skeleton of a Defence Force.

We are asked to lay down as a necessity that not only shall the Minister for Defence be a member of the Oireachtas but that he shall appoint a Parliamentary Secretary and that, by law, there shall be established a Council of Defence to assist this Department. One would imagine that it is contemplated that this Department is going to be the biggest and most important of the whole Ministry. I hope that is not the expectation of any Deputy here. There is no necessity, so far as I can see, why the Department of Defence should be singled out for special consideration in this Bill. The Dáil places the responsibility upon the Minister and he has power, under present enactments, to organise his Department in such manner as he may think well. That, I think, should be sufficient. He is in exactly the same position as any other Minister in that respect. I think the inclusion of this Section in the Bill is unnecessary. Therefore, I support the motion to delete the Section.

Mr. HEWAT: I have no hesitation in saying, at this stage, that I will both vote for and use every effort to support the amendment Deputy Figgis has moved to delete this Section entirely. It seems to me that it would be rather a calamity if this Section were to go through in its present form. I have never taken part in any military operation and, therefore, I am not qualified to speak technically on the subject—unless, perhaps, a little difference of opinion now and again with some of my friends on the Labour benches might be regarded as a military operation. This whole clause visualises a state of affairs which I, for one, hope none of the Deputies here looks forward to. It places an importance on military organisation which a small agricultural, and I hope peace-loving, country will not consider necessary. Deputy Johnson has said that he hopes—and I also hope—that in the future the skeleton or nucleus of a Defence Force will be sufficient for all the military needs of this country. We are all approaching a frame of mind when we can look on that state of affairs as likely to arise. Under the circumstances, to introduce a clause in connection with the Ministers and Secretaries Bill, such as we have before us, seems to me a very retrograde step in the affairs of State. The Commander-in-Chief, as Deputy Figgis has pointed out, is not a recognised appointment. I think I may accept that as being correct. A Military Council, surely, is not necessary under those conditions. To elaborate all these clauses in connection with the matter seems to me to be entirely unnecessary. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I propose to vote in favour of Deputy Figgis's motion, and if it be lost to vote on the same lines in connection with every other amendment.

5 o'clock.

General MULCAHY: May I say first with regard to the point raised regarding Sub-section 6, where it is stated that the Council of Defence shall be collectively responsible, the purpose is, and it can be amended, that they shall be collectively responsible to the Minister for Defence for all matters entrusted to them. From the point of view of his position in the Executive Council, and his responsibility to it, and through the Council to the Dáil, the Minister for Defence does not stand in any different position to any other Minister. With regard to the Army and its position, and what people who have never touched the Army want to make of it in this country, there is nothing in that but troubled imaginings. Deputy Figgis speaks of the old days, when you had an army that more or less met and asked whether they were going to be subject to the civil power or not. One of the outstanding points with regard to that trouble was that there was a time when the elected representatives of the people did not think it advisable to accept responsibility for the Army or for the Army's doings. In spite of that political position here there was maintained a perfect understanding and a perfect trust as between the Army of that time and the Dáil. And when the political situation was such that the Dáil could see its way to take responsibility for the Army and its doings, it was the Dáil acted, and it was not the Army. With regard to the Ministry of Defence, there is no proposal to put the Minister under this scheme in a different category to any other Minister, as is suggested. But the Ministry of Defence, in that it provides and keeps in readiness the military arm of the State, is in a very different position from any other Minister. There is no other Department of the State that may find itself called on in the same manner as the Ministry of Defence in a time of national emergency. When we realise that the State provides a Ministry of Defence in order to be able to organise its forces and to be able to defend the interests of the State, that does not mean to say that as a people or as a State we are out looking for war. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that we have been the victims of war in this country, and that the people who lie on every side of us have been the victims of war, and that war in one country has reacted willy-nilly on the peoples of other countries. It is to be prepared for national emergencies, when your defence forces are called into action, that you have a Ministry of Defence.

I have pointed out on the Second Reading that the holders of particular Army positions who, it is suggested, shall form members of this Council of Defence, are heads of administrative Departments. As far as the Military members of the proposed Defence Council are concerned, they administer Departments that run peculiarly into one another. As I have suggested, these heads of Departments would, in time of national emergency, become the Staff of the Executive Commander-in-Chief in the field. In envisaging the problems that would face this country in time of war, personally, I think it would be inadvisable for the Dáil to accept a position by which the Executive Council would simply nominate the Minister for Defence, and would not give any idea as to how that Minister ought to look for the highest possible counsel in preparing the policy, plans, and supervising in a matter of policy the technical plans that must be prepared if you are going to be in a state of preparedness in any national emergency.

It has been suggested that this is giving to the Army a particular position outside and away from the authority of this Dáil. It is, on the contrary, indicating that the Minister will have about him a Council of Defence consisting of persons who have administrative duties of a particular type, but who, for those particular duties, are from time to time the selection of the Executive Council. They have selected for these positions, on the advice of the Minister for Defence, the particular officers who hold those positions, and, therefore, they are much more closely in touch and control the direction from which the Minister for Defence gets his counsel, advice and assistance. It is necessary in the settling of the policy of defence that a number of minds connected with the technical side shall get their proper base, or at any rate shall get their proper arena for the exchange and formulating of views, and it is most advisable that they will be brought together in a statutory rather than in a non-statutory way. It is absurd to say that this Council of Defence suggested is a military tribunal not responsible to the Dáil, and it is absurd to say that this is dragging into what is a civil matter a military body. The functions of the Defence Department are more technical in a way than the functions of the other Departments of the State can be regarded.

As regards the point raised by Deputy Johnson, the Defence Forces, under Paragraph 22, have not yet been called into being by the Proclamation that is contemplated there, for the simple reason that in the reorganisation and settling of our army machinery, we are not in the position that we would like to be in before we call the Defence Forces into being. We are at present working under the latter section of the Defence Forces Act. With regard to the title of Commander-in-Chief, I have already stated that is vesting, in what is considered the most suitable member of the Executive Council, the title which corresponds to the fact that the Commander-in-Chief of the Army is vested in the Executive Council.

Captain REDMOND: On the occasion of the Second Reading of this Bill, I took exception to the inclusion of this Section and I did so mainly upon two grounds. In the first place I said that it pre-supposed the setting up of a Standing Army in this country, and that, to my mind, was a question which should have very serious and weighty consideration before it was decided upon. In the second place, I objected to the various proposals included in this Section because I understood, and still understand, them to be unconstitutional. Almost a week after I gave expression to my views in the Dáil, the Attorney-General made a vigorous—I do not think I would quite style it a virile—reply to my observations. His reply was composed, for the most part, of sneering personalities regarding my own knowledge and the source from which it was derived. I do not know whether this method of argument in the Dáil is worthy of a King's Counsel and the leader of the Irish Bar; but I do know that as a junior member of the Bar I do not consider it worthy of reply. Suffice it for me to say that as it is common knowledge that the Attorney-General favours a change in the robes of Barristers, it would now seem apparent that he is also in favour of a change in their manners.

What I would say to the Attorney-General is, that when he has been as many months in public life as I have been years, he will come to know the true value of personalities. As far as I am concerned in this case, they leave me cold; but after five days of, I presume, incessant labour, the mountain hath brought forth a mouse. What is this mouse? A contradiction of a statement of fact. In spite of the Attorney-General's gibes about my humble knowledge of constitutional law, he does not answer my constitutional point. I stated, as a matter of fact, that in my opinion the Commander-in-Chief of the Army of this country was the king. But that was only incidental to my argument that there was no necessity for the setting up of such an office, and that a person in that position, and at the same time occupying the position of Minister of the Department which controls that office, was in an unconstitutional position. Let us examine the Attorney-General's contradiction and his authorities for it. He is very fond of shying text-books around the Dáil, but I had occasion to look up a well-known text-book known as "The Laws of England," by Lord Halsbury; and I find on page 418 almost exactly word for word the speech of the Attorney-General. It is there stated that the Executive command was delegated—mark the word delegated—to a Commander-in-Chief, who advised the Secretary of State upon all military matters, the latter—that is the Secretary of State—remaining responsible to Parliament and the Crown.

Mr. JOHNSON: Is that a commentary on the laws of Saorstát Éireann?

Captain REDMOND: Is this a commentary? I am now replying to a contradiction of the statement I made upon the occasion of the Second Reading of this Bill.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy must address the Chair, and I am afraid he is travelling somewhat outside the scope of the amendment.

Captain REDMOND: With all respect, I submit this is an amendment to delete this section, and that in the Section it is proposed that a Minister of this Dáil shall be styled "Commander-in-Chief." I submit most respectfully that I have the right to argue that there is only one Commander-in-Chief in this country, and that is the King.

Mr. D'ALTON: Your argument.

Captain REDMOND: It is my argument. Will you allow me to follow it?

Mr. D'ALTON: Yes.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE at this stage took the Chair.

Captain REDMOND: I made that statement and it was contradicted by the Attorney-General, and the words he used were almost word for word taken from Halsbury's "The Laws of England"; but he forgot to quote some of the remarks made upon the rest of the page.

Professor O'SULLIVAN: I think the Deputy has been called to order and he refused to obey the ruling of the Chair. Now he goes on without any permission from the Chair.

Captain REDMOND: I beg respectfully for a ruling as to whether it is in order for me to discuss the status of Commander-in-Chief in this country upon this amendment.

Professor O'SULLIVAN: What the Deputy is doing is replying to a speech made, not on this amendment, but that was made some weeks ago.

Capt. REDMOND: On the point of order, may I say this is the first opportunity I have had to reply to it, and I am entitled to reply to it.

The PRESIDENT: The Deputy is also discussing the appointment made by the Provisional Government and gazetted I think on the 12th day of July, 1922, and subsequently, I think, on the 23rd day of August, 1922, and is calling that Act unconstitutional.

Mr. P. McKENNA: Further, on that point of order, may I say that I think the Dáil and the country are entitled to know who is the Commander-in-Chief of the Army in this country.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputy McKenna should keep to the point of order. This is a Section for the constitution of what is called the Council of Defence. The amendment is to delete the Section. The question, therefore, I take it before the Committee is whether there should be a Council of Defence.

Capt. REDMOND: I respectfully submit there is more in the Section than the instituting of a Council of Defence. The words "Commanded-in-Chief"—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The principle of the Section is the constitution of the Council of Defence. Could not objection to other matters be successfully met by amendment of the Section, or by deletion of portion of the Section? If this present amendment is defeated the Section would be open for the consideration of the Committee.

Capt. REDMOND: I submit, on an amendment to delete a Section, a Deputy has the right of discussing the whole Section and giving reasons as to why it should be deleted; and whether one is replying to previous speeches or not I do not think that that enters into the consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON: May I submit that so far as the Deputy has gone he has only reached objection to sub-section (2). I take it it is quite likely he will add to his objection to the Section by criticising other sub-sections, and therefore he is entitled to discuss the merits of sub-section (2) and all it contains within it.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I will hear the Deputy myself.

Capt. REDMOND: I will be as brief as I possibly can, but I feel I am bound to reply to the Attorney-General upon this point. The Attorney-General contradicted my statement that the King was Commander-in-Chief. He said that previous English Kings were Commanders-in-Chief, but the office had been delegated to an officer, and that in the year 1904 that office had been abolished; at the time, I believe, it was held by Earl Roberts. Nobody denies that that office was abolished, and if the office was abolished what I say is that it reverted to the Sovereign and is provided in our Constitution to-day in Article 51 where it is stated that the Executive Authority of the Saorstát is vested in the King and where it is expressly laid down to that effect I maintain that the supreme command of the Army in the Saorstát to-day is also vested in the King.

On the occasion of the Second Reading I mentioned the fact that if there was an army at all it was the King's army, and that fact was not contradicted. I still say it is the King's army, just as much as the Attorney-General is the King's Counsel, and just as much as the President and other members of the Executive are the King's Ministers. Now this may seem to some Deputies as beside the point, but it is not, and for this reason, that according to our own Act—an Act passed by the Oireachtas, namely, the Defence Forces (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1923 (Part 1, Section IV.), actually bears out the position that I have outlined. It is stated in this Section that it shall be lawful for the Executive Council to raise and maintain an armé force consisting of such number of officers, and it goes on, in Section V., to state: "The Commander-in-Chief and all the executive and administrative powers shall be vested in the Executive Council." According to Article 51 of the Constitution, the Executive Council is a Council consisting of a President and other members to aid and advise the King in the government of this country, and therefore I come back again to my original proposition that the Commander-in-Chief of the Army is vested in the King. When I say vested in the King I say that not in any derogatory sense, because I am as proud to have borne the King's Commission as, I am sure, the Attorney-General is proud to be the holder of the King's warrant.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy is now travelling outside the amendment.

Captain REDMOND: I challenge the Attorney-General and the Government to give one instance where the Commander-in-Chief or even an officer with a lower designation is also a Minister and head of a Department which controls the Army anywhere throughout the British Empire—I might even say the world. When Earl Roberts was Commander-in-Chief, was he the Minister in the British House of Commons responsible for the Army? Was he the Minister for War in the British Government? Nothing of the kind. I suppose it is because it was not the case elsewhere that we are anxious to make it so here.

This Section, to my mind, is the most, if not the only, obnoxious Section in the whole Bill. It proposes virtually to set up a Council of Defence responsible to a gentleman who shall be styled Commander-in-Chief—a sort of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde arrangement—a person who may be Commander-in-Chief one moment outside, and Minister for Defence the next moment inside the Dáil. Such a proposal, I say, would not, and never has been, tolerated in any of the Dominions of the King. And there has been no reason put forward so far for this proposal.

Is it that the civil authorities in this country are not to be the masters? Is it that the army, if there is an army, or if there is to be a standing army, is not to be placed permanently under the supervision and control of the civil and not the military authorities? If that is so, what other reasons govern the course which has been taken. I hope, and we all hope, that very shortly we will be able to diminish the army. If possible it would be well if we could adopt the Canadian system, as we have in so many other respects adopted it, namely, have a force of militia or territorials, and not a standing army at all. I say that the bringing in of this proposal in this measure is a very sinister way of enabling the military of to-day to lay the flattering unction to their souls that they will be rulers both of to-day and of to-morrow. I think that it is a bad precedent, therefore, for the future civil government and control of this country, and in making these few remarks I want it to be understood that they are in no way derogatory to the army, because the principle that I am in favour of having applied to our army in Ireland is equally applied to the British army in England, and to every other force throughout the King's Dominions. I believe that if this Section were dropped, and if this, I might almost call it, military policy were not persisted in, that it would give great reassurance and great confidence to the civilian population of this country and show them that the Government are determined that it is to be a civilian and not a military regime which shall rule the future of this land.

Major COOPER: I do not propose to address myself to the question of the Commander-in-Chief. I have an amendment on the subject later on, on the paper, and it was my personal feeling that you, A Chinn Chomhairle, should have ruled both Deputy Figgis and Deputy Redmond out of order for skimming all the cream off my milk. There was one passage in the speech of the Minister for Defence which caused me to feel considerable apprehension, and that was when he said that the head of the Department of the Ministry of Defence would be head of the Army Council, and in time of war would be Commander-in-Chief in the field. I hope that is not the considered policy of the Minister for Defence or of the Executive Council. It suggests what happened to the British in 1914. They had no adequate arrangements, no efficient general staff, and no experienced Adjutant-General when they muddled into the Dardanelles. The whole thing was muddled. Artillery were converted into cavalry, and cavalry were transferred to the infantry. It was exactly the same in the Quartermaster-General's Department; everything was in a state of confusion. Is that the policy to be adopted here? The Minister for Defence is to sit here and be responsible to the Dáil or a Parliamentary Secretary acting for him, and the three military members of the Council of Defence are to take the field. I thought that reference in the Minister's speech was merely an obiter dictum and not an indication of his considered policy, and I do hope that he will give a little further consideration to this matter in the light of experience elsewhere and by the light of such experience will alter his present attitude.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: As Deputy Redmond is in the House it will not be five days before he hears any observations that I have to make with reference to his remarks. I regret that comments upon the admitted sources of argument should be considered by Deputy Redmond as personalities. The matter he put forward here on the second reading of this Bill was in his own words gleaned from what he called his little experience in the British Army. If the complaint that that experience had not been sufficiently educative is to be regarded as personality or to be called personality then I must plead guilty to personalities, but I think it is quite legitimate and far from impertinence to state that even experience, whether it be on the battle-field or in barrack, may not be quite as informing or educative as other sources of information which are available to the soldier as well as to the civilian and more particularly when that civilian purports also to have a legal training which should place at his command a certain volume of knowledge which he might not have otherwise so easily accessible during the time, that he referred to himself, as his little military experience.

Now I take it that the patriotic speech that we heard from Deputy Redmond will be recognised as his last patriotic speech has been, as material upon which certain broad-sheets built up their futile polemics. I shall look forward with interest to the coming weeks products of that particular Press and I know that I shall find Deputy Redmond the hero of that particular type and clique in this country.

Captain REDMOND: Who does the Attorney-General refer to? Will the Attorney-General kindly say who are the persons that form this particular clique to which he refers?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The Deputy will not have to go far from the haunts of the people in the centre of the city, not far perhaps out of his own path to find the headquarters of the clique to which I refer.

Captain REDMOND: That is not an answer.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Deputy Redmond says this provision for the Council of Defence presupposes a Standing Army. I say nothing but ignorance could produce such a statement. In several of the Dominions where there are not standing armies, there are Councils of Defence, existing by Statute, even in Dominions where the minimum army establishment is maintained, where the militia and territorial system that one has heard advocated, is the system that is established—even in those Dominions provisions are made for an Army Council for the administration of matters connected with the Army and the Department of Defence. There is, I understand, a learned work called "Halsbury's Laws of England." I do not think you will find—and I should not have sought there—material appropriate to a discussion upon the Constitutional status of a Council of Defence, whether in this country or in the various Dominions.

Captain REDMOND: Commander-in-Chief.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: Nor with reference to the office of Commander-in-Chief. Deputy Redmond is apparently unaware, because his studies have not carried him, perhaps, to that page of a rather large book, that in none of the Dominions is the office of Commander-in-Chief held by the King—in not one of them. Perhaps another piece of enlightenment, if only a reminder to Deputy Redmond, is this, that the office of Secretary of State for War in England—I mention this by way of correction—was actually held, I think in Deputy Redmond's recollection, by a soldier—the late Lord Kitchener.

Captain REDMOND: Was that during peace or war?

The PRESIDENT: The Deputy knows perfectly well whether it was or not.

Captain REDMOND: I do, sir.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: The Crown should not be dragged unnecessarily into the discussion. The Crown, as was explained during the long Constitutional debates here, is in this Constitution of ours in an impersonal capacity. I do not propose to engage in any heated discussion as to the King or the

[Attorney-General.]

King's person, as the Deputy appears to be anxious.

Captain REDMOND: I must really interrupt the Attorney-General. I have never mentioned the King's person. I will not allow that statement to go.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: This provision of the Bill is simply for the organisation of the civil administrative side of the army. When the question of responsibility is raised, sight is lost of the preliminary clause in the Section, which provides for the establishment of this Council, without derogating from the responsibility of the Minister for Defence to the Executive Council and to the Oireachtas—which, as a matter of fact, I think should read “to the Dáil.”

If there is any suggestive gap between that and Sub-section 6, the matter can be very easily set right. I am sure no one on these Benches will object if, after the word “responsible” in the second line of Sub-section 6, the words “to the Minister for Defence” be introduced. It is the clear sense of the clause. It is the clear intention and meaning. Notwithstanding the sinister recollections and dire fears of Deputy Figgis, there is no question as to where the responsibility of this Council lies, and to whom. This Council of Defence, which has attracted to it a certain amount of perhaps unusual feeling, is really a very simple matter. In all the other Departments which we have taken over you have an organised Civil Service, Departments organised to a large extent on a statutory basis. We are now creating, for the first time, and organising for the first time, a Department of Defence. It has been found in many countries a useful and important thing to have a Council of Defence consisting of the heads of the main sections of the military arm, associated with civilians, as is proposed here; and it does surprise one that the association of the military organisation with those who are responsible in civil capacities calls forth an attack which rather indicates apprehension of some form of militarism, when, in point of fact, the obvious intention and purport of these provisions is quite the opposite. The matter, Sir, is a simple one. It comes here naturally when the Department is for the first time being organised. It makes clear the responsibility and it sets up a check on finance in the person of a civil member. In that connection, I may perhaps be permitted to call attention to the fact that there is an amendment upon the Paper which makes it not necessary to have as a permanent institution a Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for Defence.

The PRESIDENT: While Deputy Redmond may possibly boast a longer time in public life than many members here, and while many members here may possibly boast a longer time in public life than I have spent in it, I do not think, in all the experience that I have had of public life, that I have ever listened to a more mischievous and more mischief-making statement than that made by Deputy Redmond this evening. I say that the pity of it is that it was deliberately mischief-making, and that it is not certainly in the interests of himself or his late Party or his late friends or any friends of this country that a statement like that should have been made here. It is no thanks whatever to the Deputy that after a hard struggle we made friends with our late enemy in this country. In the making of that friendship there was a good deal of give and take on both sides.

Perhaps at a particular time it was not with good-will that there was give and take on both sides. But in view of the Constitution passed here by the late Dáil and the rights that are guaranteed to the people of this country, by reason of that Constitution, I think it is not in the power of any genius—lawyer or otherwise—to indict the Ministry of this country, the people of this country, or the army of this country, with any derogation of status or any giving up of the rights and the privileges of a free people. The very first Article of the Constitution placed beyond all doubt what our position is, and the second Article secures and places beyond any question of doubt the rights and privileges and freedom of the people of this country. I say that it was with the purpose of deliberately misleading the people of this country and of giving the enemies of peace in this country an opportunity for attacking the Oireachtas, that the statement was made by Deputy Redmond this evening. Every single syllable of every agreement that we made with the British I will carry out in the spirit and the letter; but I will not accept from any person the insult that we have given away anything—

Captain REDMOND: I must interrupt the President. By way of personal explanation, will you allow me to say that I never ventured to suggest an insult to him or his Ministry, or even this country, by the insinuation that we had given away anything. What he has got now is what I always wanted—Dominion self-government.

The PRESIDENT: I stated during the course of the Deputy's speech on two occasions that the people's representatives had appointed a Commander-in-Chief. Had they the right to do it? The Deputy says we had not—that the right was vested in somebody else. Why does the Deputy state that? Because he thinks it is going to insult us, because he thinks it will give joy to the people who have tried to wreck this country. We have a right to appoint a Commander-in-Chief. We have asserted that right. That right has not been disputed, and we are going to maintain it. We have asserted the right of the people over any army officers. It has been accepted by the army officers. We are going to maintain it. We may be wrong in the manner in which we set up the machine to exercise that authority, but we have done it to the best of our judgment, and having regard to our experience. From our experience, also, the machinery that we set up here is machinery to see that there will be civil control over the army. I do not know that there is any officer of the army worthy to wear the uniform he is wearing who will dispute that right of the representatives of the people to control the army and control every service there is in the country.

Captain REDMOND: Mr. Speaker, I cannot allow the President's remarks to pass—

Mr. BLYTHE: Is the official designation of the Ceann Comhairle not "Ceann Comhairle"?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It is.

Captain REDMOND: I cannot let the President's remarks pass without making an observation or two. He accused me of mischief-making in regard to the statements I made concerning the status of Commander-in-Chief. I am afraid that I will not be able to disabuse his mind in that direction if he has already so made it up. I can only assure both him and the House that it was the last thing that occurred to me. But what I wanted to show, and what, I think, I have shown, is that according to our Constitution—a Constitution which I thoroughly admire and which I whole-heartedly support—the Command-in-Chief of any Forces in this country is vested in the King.

DEPUTIES: No, no.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Order!

Captain REDMOND: I was not mischief-making. That is my point.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I take it the Deputy's point, which I have been endeavouring to grasp since he first spoke, is that the provision in Sub-section 2 of Section 8, which mentions the Minister for Defence under the style of Commander-in-Chief, contravenes the Constitution. Is that the exact contention?

Captain REDMOND: Yes.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Well, the Defence Forces (Temporary Provisions) Act, which was passed on the 3rd August, 1923, and which is valid now and until the 3rd August, 1924, states (Section 5):

The Command-in-Chief of and all Executive and Administrative powers in relation to the Forces, including the power to delegate authority to such person as may be thought fit, shall be vested in the Executive Council—

I would draw attention to the word "vested"— and exercised through and in the name of the Minister, who shall not, however, allocate to himself any Executive Military Command and who may not be a member of the Forces on full pay.

[An Ceann Comhairle.]

Under Part 4 of the Act, Section 236, it is set out:

The Command-in-Chief of and all Executive and Administrative powers in relation to the National Forces (including the power to delegate authority to such persons as may be thought fit) shall be vested in the Executive Council and exercised through and in the name of the Minister.

Here in the Dáil we are bound by the Acts of the Oireachtas. When a matter has been settled by Statute it cannot be questioned. If a point is made that something which has been passed in an Act of the Oireachtas contravenes the Constitution that point must be made before the Court which the Constitution, in Article 65, provides for the purpose of deciding upon the validity of any law having regard to the provisions of the Constitution. It would not be for me to decide whether a particular matter was in order on a question being raised that it contravened the Constitution. In this case, we have actually a Statute which states that the Command-in-Chief is vested in the Executive Council. That, I think, prevents the Deputy from making the point that it is not vested in the Executive Council, and if his point is that the Constitution is contrary to the Act, then that point must be brought elsewhere; it cannot be pleaded here.

Captain REDMOND: Perhaps I may be allowed to say that before you, Sir, came in, I actually quoted Section 5 of this Act, and I never suggested that the Command-in-Chief was not vested in the Executive Council. On the contrary, I say it is, of course, according to this Act.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is what we are bound by. We are bound by our own Acts, and if the Command-in-Chief is vested in the Executive Council by Act, then the Command-in-Chief is vested in the Executive Council. If any point is to be made against that, it must be made in another place and in another way—

Captain REDMOND: Perhaps I may be allowed—

DEPUTIES: Chair!

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I have given the Deputy great liberty—

Captain REDMOND: Perhaps I may—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Order! I will not allow Deputy Redmond to speak when I rise. His experience elsewhere should, perhaps, teach him that. I allowed him to speak on this matter for 24 minutes, simply because I did not want to prevent him from expressing anything he wanted to express. The time allowed by the Standing Orders is 10 minutes. I will not allow the point to be raised again.

Captain REDMOND: I will not raise that point again, with due deference to your ruling. But I do 6 o'clock. think that the President's characterisation of my speech as mischievous is rather unfair, because if there is one thing above all others I do not want to do—and I can say it with absolute candour—it is to imperil in any way the fortunes of this country in the new State in which we have found ourselves. As far as the Constitution is concerned, which the President referred to, I am a complete subscriber to that Constitution. I believe it is, perhaps, the widest Constitution any country could desire, and as one who never advocated anything but a large measure of Dominion Self-Government, such as we are now enjoying, I think I am entitled at any rate to say—as one who never was a Republican, but was always in favour of the present Constitution, which we are now enjoying—that nothing I said was in any way derogatory to that Constitution. Now, Sir, I do not want to occupy any more of your time—

DEPUTIES: Hear, hear.

Captain REDMOND: If you do not want to hear me, you can go outside.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I will protect the Deputy, if he addresses me.

Captain REDMOND: He will not require protection in that respect. I do want to disabuse the mind, if possible, of the President. I do not mind so much about some of his supporters.

Mr. P. HUGHES: A Chinn Chomhairle, is this House to be insulted? Are you going to see that the people on these Benches are not insulted by Deputy Redmond when he says that he does not mind whether or not he insults people on these Benches? On a point of order I say it is disgraceful.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I do not remember hearing Deputy Redmond saying that he did not mind insulting the people on those Benches.

Mr. HUGHES: That is what he did say.

Captain REDMOND: I beg your pardon; I never used the word "insulting." Withdraw it.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I understood the Deputy to say that he desired to disabuse the mind of the President of certain ideas, and was not so much concerned about disabusing the mind of certain other persons of those ideas. Is that correct?

Captain REDMOND: Quite.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is not insulting.

Mr. HUGHES: I think the words the Deputy used were that he did not mind the persons sitting behind the President.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputy Hughes will have to take my recollection of the matter.

Mr. HUGHES: I bow to your ruling.

Captain REDMOND: I leave the matter there.

Mr. MILROY: I was not in for the full speech made by Deputy Redmond, and I am not sure whether he is supporting or opposing this amendment. I arrived here when he had got into the full stride of his exhortation regarding the British Monarchy.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Did

Deputy Milroy hear my ruling on this question?

Mr. MILROY: I did not.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Then perhaps he will let somebody else speak and inquire about that ruling before he makes his speech.

Mr. MILROY: I would like to be informed in regard to that ruling.

Mr. MCCARTHY: If Deputy Redmond spoke for 20 minutes about the King's Army, surely Deputy Milroy is entitled to reply?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I am not desirous of preventing Deputy Milroy from speaking so long as he is in order. I only wanted to know whether he heard the ruling in regard to the question of the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, and in whom it is vested.

Mr. MILROY: I have no intention of raising the point.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I am very pleased.

Mr. MILROY: I have no intention of discussing the matter of the Commander-in-Chief, because I am quite satisfied that position is satisfactorily filled. While Deputy Redmond was speaking, some lines of poetry occurred to me, which I am sure he will recollect. They are:—

"The boy stood on the burning deck, Whence all but he had fled."

I thought it was singular that amongst all our deliberations, where the King has been the King to whom Deputy Redmond protested his goodwill, it never troubled us in the slightest degree. Why he should be unduly obtruded upon us now I fail to see. I do not know whether Deputy Redmond has much knowledge of a place now temporarily described as Northern Ireland—

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: On a point of order, as the person responsible for the amendment, may I ask if this is relevant?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I am waiting for the end of the sentence.

Mr. MILROY: Deputy Figgis need not be in the slightest degree apprehensive that I am going to ignore him. In due course his time will come. I said I was not quite certain whether Deputy Redmond's knowledge extends to a place called Northern Ireland. I happened to be elected to that Partition Parliament, for the creation of which his party had a good deal of responsibility.

Captain REDMOND: Question:

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputy Milroy is not at all making himself relevant to the amendment.

Mr. MILROY: On a point of order

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputy Milroy will have to accept my view of what order is.

Mr. MILROY: I have no intention of questioning it.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Unless the Deputy can begin to be in order now, he must stop speaking.

Mr. MILROY: I am doing my best. Let me say, with all due respect, that there is hardly a sentence I have uttered that has not been broken into before I was half way through, and it is impossible to address oneself coherently to the Assembly in a matter of this sort if such continuous interruptions are allowed. If the point I wish to make is not relevant to the discussion, I will not press it. It is this: There were 800 national soldiers who applied to be registered as voters in Derry City, and the tribunal before whom they appeared decided against the application, on the ground that they were not soldiers of the King's army. I leave it at that, and I come now to the Deputy who was apprehensive that I was going to ignore him while I was devoting all my attention to Deputy Redmond. I believe the Deputy who proposes the amendment to delete this Section is Deputy Darrell Figgis. To delete this Section is practically a proposal to delete the army. There are many people in this country who would, I am sure, be glad to delete the army. There was a time when they would have been very reluctant to have had the army deleted, and there may come a time when they will betray a similar reluctance. For instance, supposing there was an attack upon that hirsute appendage of which Deputy Figgis is so proud—

Mr. JOHNSON: On a point of order, allow me to say that Section 1, which has been passed, definitely agrees to the setting up of a Department of Defence, and a question of the elimination of this Section, a proposal for which I am partly responsible, does not at all attempt to go back upon Sub-section X. of Section 1.

Mr. MILROY: I take it the object of this Section, towards which this amendment is directed, is to create some kind of effective head of the Army which will give effective direction to the policy of the State's military arm. I should have prefaced my remarks with this: I take it one of the objections to the Section is the appointment of a Parliamentary Secretary to the Council of Defence. That seems to me to give the Dáil added control over the army. In previous debates I have heard it urged it was quite the reverse. If certain proposals were put forward by the military members of this Council of Defence, a Parliamentary Secretary attending could decline to agree with them and say that he would have to put the matter before the Dáil before assent could be given to them. I do not know what precisely will be gained by the deletion of this Section, or what precisely is the objective of those who support the amendment, unless it be to prevent the State securing an effective military force, coherent in its control and its guidance. I will not raise the matter in reference to which your ruling was given. I regret your ruling has been such, because certain arguments have been put forward which your ruling prevents any attempts to rebut. I do not intend to contravene that ruling.

The arguments I have heard in support of this amendment have not in any way convinced me that anything would be gained by the acceptance of it; possibly very much danger would ensue to the State by its acceptance.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Since I

first raised this amendment, we have certainly travelled a very long way. Permit me to express my regret that it should have travelled a good deal of the ground that has been travelled. I do not touch upon that now. I come back to where I was when I raised the proposal that this Section should be deleted. Deputy Milroy says he fails to understand what purpose will be achieved if this deletion be carried. Supposing Section 8 of this Bill does not form part of this Bill, what happens? The army remains the army. The Minister for Defence remains the Minister for Defence. The Ministry of Defence remains the Ministry of Defence. And that Minister in his Ministry may to-morrow, if he so wishes, for his better guidance, create a Council of Defence, without anybody to say him nay. It has been said that a Council of Defence has not been brought into a Bill styled a Ministerial Bill and so given semi-ministerial rank. That is the gain. The Minister does not require this Bill to give him power to create such a Council. It does require this Bill to create such a Ministry, but not to create a Council of Defence. There is certainly nothing to stop him doing it, but by bringing it in and enjoining upon him to do it, in a statutory provision in a Ministerial Bill for creation primarily of Ministries, that Council of Defence is given a semi-ministerial rank in the State, and that is a very deplorable thing to do. I do not criticise the Sub-section as a Sub-section. I criticise the Sub-section because I believe that Sub-section 6 has revealed the minds of those who drafted that Section. It was there stated that the Council of Defence shall be collectively responsible. I asked to whom the Council of Defence should be collectively responsible. The Minister for Defence made answer which left me in extreme wonder; a wonder that was only enhanced when the answer was repeated in so many words again, by the Attorney-General, who said the Council of Defence will be collectively responsible to the Minister for Defence. Let us go back to Sub-section 2. The Council of Defence "shall consist of the following members, namely, the Minister for Defence; who, under the title of Commander-in-Chief, shall be Chairman of the Council of Defence. . . ." So the Council of Defence, of whom the Minister is one, is to be responsible to the Minister who for that purpose is stepping outside the Council of Defence presumably. In other words, the Commander-in-Chief is to be responsible to himself as the Minister for Defence. That might be thought to involve an absurdity, that he should in one capacity be responsible to himself in some other capacity. Let us examine that absurdity and see where it lands us. If the Minister for Defence, as Commander-in-Chief, is to be responsible to himself as Minister for Defence, then there is a distinction between the Commander-in-Chief and his ministerial position, although this Act of the State has stated that the Commander-in-Chief is the Minister plus certain other Ministers.

Mr. MILROY: On a point of Order, I understood your ruling was that the question of the Commander-in-Chief could not arise again. I bowed to your ruling, but I now—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I am afraid Deputy Milroy did not get the whole of my ruling.

Mr. MILROY: I am sorry I did not.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: That is the point I raise, and I urge that the matter is of very great importance. The Attorney-General has said here what is perfectly correct and what we all recognise to be true. It is a fact that in the Dominions and in this Free State there are Councils of Defence set up. In the greater number of the Dominions I believe such Councils of Defence exist. It is perfectly true that they are set up by Statute in certain of the Dominions, but not in all. They are not set up in a statute that is called "The Ministers and Secretaries Bill." That is my point. The reason why I think this should be eliminated is because it has no place in a Bill of this character. The Attorney-General drew attention to the fact that the first clause did assert positively that the Council of Defence should be under the responsibility of the Minister for Defence, of the Executive Council and [Mr. Darrell Figgis.] Oireachtas (presumably the Dáil, as he suggested), respectively. I am opposed even to the inclusion of the first paragraph of this section because I do not desire to see in any Bill of this nature mention of a Military Council. But if it were to be left at that first paragraph, a good many of my objections would disappear. It is obvious in the Section as it stands, embodying seven sub-sections, that sections two to seven are in many of their features contradictory to the provision set out in sub-section one. They are contrary also to the earlier enactments of this State. The chief reason which I emphasise, because it is the essential of the case, apart from everything else that has been said, is that there is nothing whatever to stop the Minister from creating a Council of Defence. If this section be deleted, the Minister, the Army, and the Ministry remain, and the power to create a Council of Defence remains.

All that will have been saved, if this Section be deleted, is the creation of a Council of Defence under a Bill entitled "The Ministers Bill," or the giving to it of a semi-Ministerial rank which is not consonant with the place of any Council of Defence in a properly organised State subject to the civil power.

Mr. JOHNSON: I have listened carefully, in the hope of hearing some reason stated for the inclusion of this Section in the Bill. The Minister for Defence said it was most advisable that this Council be brought together in a statutory way. Now, I am sure the Minister believes it is most advisable, but I think it is due to the Dáil that they should be given the grounds for his belief that it is most advisable, that the Dáil should also be persuaded that it is advisable; but we have had no reasons adduced to us for the inclusion of this Section constituting the Council, in the manner in which it is constituted, to assist the Minister for Defence, thereby distinguishing this Ministry from other Ministries. I hope we shall be acquainted with the reasons which make it most advisable. The Attorney-General says it was simply an organisation of the civil administration end of the Army. Again I want to know why insert that in the Bill? We are told, I think, by the President that it is because in this case a new Ministry is being set up, and that in the case of the other Ministries they are already existing Departments. Hence the reason for inserting this Section in the Bill. But I do not think that can be a reason.

I think the President does not recall the position. It is true, no doubt, that there was a Department dealing with Agriculture and a Department dealing with the administration of Justice. It might also be said, but not quite with the same force, that there was a Finance Department, though I think I have heard it stated, when trying to persuade the Dáil in another direction, that an entirely new Department had to be set up for Finance. But, I ask, will it be contended that there was no Department for External Affairs or anything approximating to a Department for External Affairs. Yet, under Sections I and II, we set up a Department of External Affairs, but we do not, as a matter of fact, indicate in subsequent Sections how that Department shall be constituted, whether the Minister in charge of External Affairs shall have an Advisory Council or not. As a matter of fact, the organisation of the Department is left to Ministerial responsibility in that case. Now, some reason must be adduced, more than has been given, for treating the Ministry of Defence in a different way from that, let us say, of the Ministry of External Affairs. Deputy Milroy has left again. He does not intend to follow the discussion subsequent, as he did not follow it prior to his intervention. I was going to draw his attention to the fact that his reference to Parliamentary Secretaries was not appropriate, inasmuch as there is nothing in the Bill yet to indicate that Parliamentary Secretaries are responsible to the Dáil. They are responsible only so far to the Ministry.

I want to direct attention further to Sub-Section 6 which Deputy Figgis, who also has gone, dealt with. The Sub-Section says that the Council of Defence shall meet as a collective body. How it could do otherwise, I do not know, but the Section says it shall meet and act as a collective body, and shall be "collectively responsible for all matters entrusted to it in its collective capacity, whether by any Act of the Oireachtas or otherwise." It is contemplated in this Section that there shall be entrusted to the Council and not to the Ministry or to the Minister, but to the Council of Defence set up under this section, certain responsibilities by Act of the Oireachtas. I maintain that that is not the same as setting up an administrative organisation within the Ministry as is done in other Ministries. It is contemplated here that the Council of Defence shall be nominated as a body to whom will be entrusted responsibilities directly by Acts of the Oireachtas. If that is not creating a distinction between this Ministry and other Ministries I do not know what it is.

I hope some satisfaction will be given to the Dáil as to the meaning of that, and perhaps while on that the Attorney-General or the Minister for Defence will enlighten us as to what is meant by the words "or otherwise." I submit that no case has been made for the inclusion of this Section. The Bill would serve all the necessities covering the Department of Defence without the Section. The Minister has been granted powers to act with the Executive Council, which is responsible to the Dáil for the organisation of his Department, and I think it is unwise of the Dáil, notwithstanding the assurances given, that the Army shall be under the control of the civil authority. I fear that the inclusion of this Section defeats the purpose in view. One may ask is there any fear that without this Section the Army would not be under the control of the civil authority. I think that both the Minister for Defence and the President have stated fully and clearly that there is no such fear. Then I say there is no case, even from the arguments adduced from the Ministerial benches, in favour of the inclusion of this Section.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I desire to say a word on a point which Deputy Johnson has referred to. The Deputy referred to the words in Sub-Section 6 "Entrusted to the Council whether by any Act of the Oireachtas or otherwise." That is intended to cover the two methods of entrusting; the one may be either directly by specific Statute, as, for instance, when a permanent Defence Forces Act is passed hereafter. There would be certain things which would be definitely within the duty of the Council of Defence, or there may be other matters referred by other Statutes directly and specifically to the Council of Defence. The word "otherwise" would refer, for instance, to the indirect delegation or direction rather of the discharge of certain functions, and the performance of certain duties by the Minister himself as Chairman and head of the Council of Defence, and responsible for it to the Executive. The meaning of "collective responsibility," notwithstanding the play of Deputy Figgis is, I think, fairly clear. The Commander-in-Chief is ex-officio the Chairman of this Council, and through him that Council is responsible to the Executive Council.

The Act to which reference has been made, the Defence Forces Act, is a temporary Act and opportunity was taken then in order to enable things to be carried on until this Bill should be in a position to be laid before the Dáil so as to make temporary provision in that temporary Act for the setting up of a Defence Council. Now, the position of the definite organisation of the various Departments of the State has come to the point at which they must be settled on a more or less permanent basis, and this seems an appropriate time to deal with the matter in this Statute, which is not a temporary Statute.

As regards differentiation between other Departments, I may refer to the fact that in this Bill provision is made for the organisation of the various Departments under different Sections. Section 2 deals with the appointment and the number of principal officers and other officers in the various Departments, and Section XI. provides the machinery for the organisation of the various Departments. It is usual in dealing with that particular type of Department that one refers to others. A military department of this kind could deal with them in that way, but, on the other hand, a fairly established practice now is to provide by Statute for the organisation of a Council in relation to the military section of the Government.

Mr. JOHNSON: Was that done by the British in the formation of their Army Council?

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: In the case of the British Army the way it was done was this. In England the army, being directly the army of the King, the whole thing is carried out by Order in Council. I can show the Deputy the Orders in Council which were made after a certain Commission sat in the year 1904, under which all that organisation was given definite effect by specific Orders in Council, and the present organisation in England has been set up under elaborate and detailed Orders in Council. It is true that under the Constitution, the army is the army of the Parliament and of the people, and that this Parliament and this Oireachtas is the established Constitutional Government of the army as of the rest of the population. This section does not, for the first time, create Parliamentary control of the army. What it does is, it associates specifically and beyond all question the government of the army with the civil government.

Mr. JOHNSON: May I say this, that in speaking in favour of the deletion of this section I dissociate myself utterly and entirely from the line that was taken by Deputy Redmond in support of my motion.

The PRESIDENT: I take it that it is now a question of judgment as to whether or not this is the best machine for controlling the Army. The question has come to that. I must say that it is only right that we should acknowledge the fairness with which this question has been approached by Deputy Figgis, Deputy Johnson, Deputy Hewat and Deputy Bryan Cooper, who spoke on it. This is certainly a new organisation and a new Department absolutely. Foreign Affairs had, to some extent, the advantage of being assisted in the administration of its work by the Civil Service. There is not the same organisation possible in the case of the Army, and we must set up an Army machine of some sort or kind. That is only reasonable. If it were only a football team which was under the control of a particular Minister, somebody on the team would have to be in touch with the Minister if he had charge of it. I do not mean any disrespect to the Army by mentioning it in that way, but we will take it that there is a body of men, twenty or thirty thousand, or, say, only five thousand, and that to that extent they have an organisation. I should say it grew during peculiar times and had to be adapted to still more peculiar times. It is now in a state of discipline and of organisation, peculiar, I suppose to some extent, to all the circumstances and all the phases that it has passed through. We want here to get established by Statute regulations under which that machine will be placed, in the first instance, under the Minister, and, in the second instance, through the Minister under the Oireachtas. The machinery that we have elaborated here in this particular Section is, to our minds, the best method of doing that.

I could have wished that the motion had not been the elimination of this Section, unless some other particular method of control or of administration were to be put in its stead. This is a new service, different altogether to any other that we are administering. I should say that if we were starting to-morrow with regard to the Ministry of Finance that it is possible you would have a separate organisation. You would consider the question of associating the various heads of particular sections under the Minister for Finance in a sort of Council to advise him. One member of that Council, say, would have his mind on administration and expenditure; another member, say, would have his eye to some extent on the question of raising taxation, and so on. At any rate it is open to the Minister at any time to organise such a machine. I do not say it would have been so easily open to him, and I am not saying that now as giving the slightest indication that I have ever heard that the Minister had any difficulty in it. It is right and proper that in a young army we should lay down in black and white what its relations are to be to the man responsible to the Dáil, and how it should be organised. As I said before, an alternative suggestion would be much more satisfactory than a simple deletion which leaves the Minister free to organise the Department in whatever way he wishes.

Mr. JOHNSON: There are provisions in the Bill, as the Attorney-General pointed out, for describing the organisation of various Departments and stating what may be done. These orders would have to be laid before the Dáil, and I think that inference may be read into Sections XI. and XII.

Will the Attorney-General or the President indicate their view of Amendment No 3, which makes the position somewhat different, and gives authority to the Minister to establish such a Council to assist him, as distinct from a deliberate Act of the Dáil setting up this Council in this manner?

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: In urging the President to answer that question on the lines that Deputy Johnson would wish, I would like to say that I agree entirely with him that it is merely a question of the best way to achieve what we hope to be the best method of getting the control of the army by this Oireachtas. I would like to feel that Amendment 3 would be accepted. While still perfectly convinced that the amendment I moved was the right one, and that the reasons I gave were reasons why the amendment should be carried and the Section be deleted, I must say that much that has transpired and intervened since then has filled me with a considerable amount of distaste for all that has preceded. I would like to feel that under the circumstances it could be possible to meet half way on this. If this is pressed to a division, I will, of course, vote for my amendment, because I am sure that when the passing distaste is gone my convictions will show that this Section should not remain part of the Bill. I agree very heartily with the President that he looks at it from one point of view, that I look at it from another point of view, but that our common intention is the same, and that is, the best method of getting proper civil control over the army of this Oireachtas.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: May I point out in answer to Deputy Johnson's inquiry with reference to Amendment No. 3 that there is this difficulty. In the Council of Defence as proposed—if I may now refer to it in conjunction with an amendment that stands in my name later on—it is proposed to constitute the Council of Defence by having a civil member who may or may not be a Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister, but who must be a member of the Dáil, and whose special charge will be to watch questions of finance. It does occur to me, as a matter of great difficulty—if it be desirable, as we think it is desirable to have a civil member of that kind—to leave the organisation merely to the Minister for Defence. It is difficult to see how he can organise the machine on the lines that are indicated here in conjunction with that amendment. In the case of the other Ministries, you have the ordinary civil service lines and ruts which are as little disturbed as possible in organisation, but here you are creating this new thing. You want to be able to call on a member of the Dáil to assist in this controlling and checking capacity, and it is proposed to associate this additional civil member with the Ministry of Defence, who is, of course, a civil member himself.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: That will mean only the addition of one extra to amendment 3, which is not yet before the Dáil. I do not think that that would present any insuperable difficulty. As there is only ten minutes intervening between now and the coming on of private business, would it not be just as well for the Attorney-General to consider this point, and in order that there might be some kind of agreement between the first three amendments, to report progress now.

MINISTER for DEFENCE (General Mulcahy): I do not think there could be agreement to accept the idea contained in Amendment No. 3. You have, in considering this matter, to take yourself to a long drawn-out crisis and to consider the responsibility of the Executive Council and of the Minister for Defence himself.

In reviewing plans from the military point of view, and taking any of the things that war involves for a people, the different aspects, and the strain of war on a people, you have to satisfy yourself in the organisation of the Ministry of Defence that all these are looked at from a systematic point of view. You have to see that you do not arrive in the middle of a crisis, before matters have developed, we will say, to a war point, that the policy, the thought, the mind and the interchange of ideas were not, perhaps, haphazard. You set down in the organisation of the Ministry for Defence that the Minister for Defence shall have this Council; that it shall be selected from the people mentioned here, who in their ordinary administrative work perform the duties set out for them. That is the way of securing that the very heavy responsibility of foreseeing and foreplanning is carried out in a systematic way by people who have had systematic experience, and whose appointment to the administrative positions they hold have passed the review of the Executive Council. The important point about it is the obligation to have this Council, and it would be entirely getting away from that important point if you accepted Amendment No. 3, were you to simply say, it shall be lawful to have such a Council.

Major COOPER: I am inclined to agree with the Minister that the statutory obligation to have a Council of Defence is a very valuable and a very important thing. In some respects I prefer the proposal to Deputy Davin's amendment. A point that I think has not been made clear is why this particular Section is in this Bill and not in the Army Bill which we are to consider in the future. It would seem the natural way to begin an Army Bill by creating your organisation, by laying down such and such a Department to the Chief-of-Staff, such and such a Department to the Adjutant-General; and such and such a Department to the Quarter-Master-General. Having set up your organisation in the Army Bill, you should develop down to the various duties of each branch. It seems to me that this is an excrescence on this Bill. I agree that statutory authority is absolutely necessary, but it would come better in conjunction with the rest of the Army, rather than merely with Secretaries, Ministers, and Schedules, relating to Government Departments. I should have thought that it would be sufficient to detail in the Schedule the responsibility of the Minister for Defence, and leave the rest to the Army Bill that we are bound to have, as at present these are only temporary provisions dealing with military matters.

General MULCAHY: The fact is the Council of Defence is the Ministry and not the Army. I have not

7 o'clock. fine feelings on the point as to whether it should be included in a Ministry Bill or an Army Bill, but it is definitely the Ministry side of the question as distinct from the Army side of the question. I would run a smaller chance, I am sure, of getting the financial member of the Defence Council and a Parliamentary Secretary in an Army Bill than I hope to have in a Ministers Bill.

Major COOPER: But I gather that the Minister's chance is going to be taken away from him by the Attorney-General.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS BILL—SECOND STAGE (RESUMED).

Mr. DAVIN: When Deputy Mahony finished speaking yesterday evening I could not escape hearing Deputy Gorey murmur: "Divide, divide." I felt that was the first indication we had in this Dáil from Deputy Gorey that there was introduced a measure as to voting for or against which Deputy Gorey could not give any reason. I felt if the Labour Party had done nothing more than bring in a Bill upon which Deputy Gorey could not express his views it had justified its existence as a party.

Mr. GOREY: Do not be too sure.

Mr. DAVIN: It may be that the views of the Farmers' Party were expressed in this matter in the Commission when Mr. Young of Stradbally gave evidence. I come from Mr. Young's area. In the recent election, as a member of the Labour Party that had put forward this policy of nationalisation of railways as one of the main planks of its platform, I headed the poll at that election. If Deputy Gorey assumes that he is putting forward the views of the farmers of Leix and Offaly he has no right to say he is doing it on their behalf. The Labour Party polled 9,040 votes. Deputy Gorey's three nominees polled 5,400. None of them was elected, and one of them lost £100. Perhaps it is for that reason that Deputy Gorey is silent in the debate. I am sorry Deputy Figgis intervened yesterday in the debate, and prevented a member of the Government Party from giving expression to his views. I regret it, because I remember that particular member, as well as a number of other members to-day sitting on the Government benches around him, being on the hustings as advocates of a policy of railway nationalisation. I was eager for some of them to give reasons why they changed their minds in this matter. I also regret that since the introduction of this Bill, the Minister responsible for railway matters has not been present in the Dáil. May I express the hope that this is not an indication of his lack of attention to a matter as important as that contained in this Bill? Deputy Hewat said: "As a novice in political matters, it strikes me as strange that a Bill of this public importance should be introduced as a Private Bill. Whereas the Bill is brought forward by a leader of the Opposition, the attitude of the Government seems open to question. They have given us very little guidance in the matter, and it seems to me the Government are in the happy position of looking on while the Opposition exploit the proposition of how far it will go down in the country."

May I assure Deputy Hewat that so far as the Labour Party are concerned they had decided previous to the dissolution of the third Dáil to introduce a measure which it is now my pleasure to support. Therefore, so far as that is concerned, they are not the instruments of any other parties or persons in this Dáil. The measure Deputy Johnson introduced was drafted after very long and careful consideration by people who have had a long experience of railway administration in Great Britain and Ireland. I am not supporting this Bill in the interests of railway servants. Railway servants, like every other section of the trades union movement, are only too well informed of what they might expect since the Free State Government functioned in this country. They are under no delusion as to the treatment they might expect as servants of the Free State Government. That aspect does not weigh with us. I hope that unlike what has happened in the previous division that the members of this Dáil who have thought over this matter will not be running out to the lobby when a division is called, but that they will be here to give expression by their votes to their feelings on this measure. It is too common for members to take up the time of this Dáil speaking to amendments to Bills, and when the division bell is rung, they go outside in the lobby and have not the courage to give expression to their views by voting on the matter. Nationalisation of the Irish railways is looked upon by Deputies of this Dáil as an impossible proposal. It is looked upon as a bigger question than it really is. What do we find? It may be of interest to have on record the capital of the Irish railways as returned on the 31st December, 1921.

The Irish railways had a capital upon which interest or dividend was paid amounting to £47,875,824. The number of the staff employed on the whole of the Irish railways, and I am quoting from the last record issued, was 30,511. So far as we can gather, and there is nothing on record to prove it, as no statistics have been published since the Free State Government began to function, there are only 20,000 railway employees in the Free State. What is the position with regard to the great English combines? Take the London, Midland, and Scottish Company with a capital of £398,929,175, a mileage of 6,962 miles, and a staff of 268,835. Somebody—I cannot recollect who—suggested in the debate yesterday that it would require a superman to control the Irish railways under a system of State ownership or control. May I ask the individual who made the statement where the man was found to control a staff of 268,000 as compared with 20,000 on the Free State railways? Would he not describe him as a superman?

Mr. HEWAT: May I explain that I am the culprit in this case. I did not say that it required a superman to manage the Irish railways, but that it would require a superman to manage the Board under which the railways are to be run.

Mr. DAVIN: I quoted figures to show how small a proposition it is to deal with a situation which from that point of view has been touched upon by Deputy Hewat. Since this Bill was introduced many inspired articles have been written in the daily Press with the usual statements against nationalisation. In one article it has been said that Deputy Johnson, in introducing this Bill, made no attempt to relieve the minds of traders and travellers of the scepticism which State management during the war had sown in their minds. Deputy Hewat lent himself to the same kind of arguments when he stated: "In connection with railways we have had some experience of Government control. During the war it was considered necessary that the Government should take control of the railways, and, speaking as a commercial man, I do not think that the result of that experience has convinced many traders that they are going to benefit by the change." One could understand articles in the Press, although inspired, written by people who do not understand the situation, but I am surprised at Deputy Hewat, who has some knowledge of railway work, associating himself with statements of that kind. It is the usual argument put forward to try and mislead people, that the system of British Government control was anything like what might be expected under a proper system of State management. What was the system of State control in the European War? A Board was appointed of five or six of the principal Irish railway managers, with the Under-Secretary as the nominal head. I challenge the Government, if they are prepared to answer this aspect of the case, to produce the minutes of the Railway Executive meetings to show how many times the nominee of the British Government attended. That will show, to some extent, the interest and supervision exercised by the British Government in the control of Irish railways during that period. The railways were placed in the hands of five or six managers with the directors lurking in the background to see if any manager appointed by themselves would do anything against the interests of the railway company with which they were associated.

You can imagine the position of railway managers, many of whom, and perhaps all of whom, are experienced men, taking up a certain attitude in the interests of the British Government which would be opposed to the policy of the Board with which they were associated. I can imagine such men at the termination of control period finding themselves in the ranks of the unemployed. The railways were taken over by the British Government under the very wide contract that they were guaranteed the nett receipts for the year 1913. Referring to that aspect of the case, it has been stated that perhaps that is not a fair test, for the State was not really in control during the war but was under the dictatorship of the trades unions.

I can assure the Dáil that if the trade unions or the representatives of the railway workers had any share in the Management Committee that was set up under the system of British Governmental control many of the abuses which went on during that period would not have been allowed without being exposed. It is fairly well known that the agreement, so far as it existed, between the Government and the railway companies was interpreted in a manner that made the taxpayers of this country suffer to an extent that they should not have suffered if those who were in control exercised that control on behalf of the taxpayers. I will give you a case in point. Assuming that two hundred railway waggons and six engines were built in a certain railway works during the year 1913, that agreement could be interpreted, and perhaps was interpreted so, that although these waggons and engines were not built during the years of control, that railway company, under the very wide terms of the contract, was paid for the building of these waggons and engines, not alone the amount paid in the year 1913 but the additional cost of labour and material for the building of waggons and engines which were really never put into stock. Does Deputy Hewat or any other Deputy contend that if the railway workers, or the Trades Unions, had a share in the Committee of Management such a system as that, and the robbing of the taxpayers in that way, would have been tolerated?

In England the Workers' War Emergency Committee, which was an advisory body of the Labour Party, associated with the conduct of the war, suggested to the British railway companies that for the purpose of saving money and keeping prices down railway waggons should be pooled. They made that suggestion to the Government and the Government referred them to the Railway Companies' Managers and the suggestion, which was a very useful one and would have saved especially a rise on coal prices at the time, was ignored and turned down. It is well known, and it is known to Deputies here, that when traders in Dublin and elsewhere were looking for waggons to convey foodstuffs and other goods during the period of control they were told that no railway waggons were to be had, while at the same time railway waggons were lying empty in every depot.

I rely upon the statements I am making in regard to this matter, that during the whole time British Governmental control during the war both in this country and in England, was used by railway managers, with the backing of their directors, to prejudice nationalisation and State ownership in the minds of the trading and travelling public. In connection with the question of waggons, I would like to know if there is any return in the hands of the Transport Department of the Ministry of Commerce to show the number of miles which empty waggon were carried over during the period of State control. I am sure if all the records that should be available, that were at the disposal of the British Ministry during that period, were handed over, as I believe they were, to the Irish Government, they would disclose many things which even Deputy Hewat would be surprised at.

In addition to abusing the system of control in the manner in which I have stated, the railway companies were given £3,000,000 to represent what was called deferred maintenance. That was supposed to be set aside on the termination of the period of control for renewal of stores, repairs, and other matters of that kind. And, by the way, it is pretty well known, too, that the railway companies interpreted the agreement which I have referred to in a way that enabled them to renew their stores under the terms of the contract and practically to do everything for the improvement of the railways except painting the tracks. They received this £3,000,000, representing deferred maintenance. Was it set aside and used for the purpose for which it was voted? No. If you examine the reports of the shareholders' meetings last year, as reported in the Press, you will find that the £3,000,000 was used for the purpose of paying dividends to shareholders.

I hope I have given such an explanation as will remove from the mind of Deputy Hewat, and any other Deputy, that State control, as we knew it during the period of the European war, was anything like what might be expected from any proper business system of State management. I would go so far as to say that if the Government were unable, and if they are prepared to say that they are unable, to give to each member of the travelling public a better return for the money that was spent during that period, then the case for the State ownership of railways falls to the ground. Deputy Hewat, and, I think, in this matter Deputy Cooper was largely associated with him, asked the Dáil to believe that the railwaymen of this country find themselves in a peculiarly advantageous position as a result of the political forces which they were in a position to manipulate. It is information for me to know that the Irish railwayman, during the period of the European war or since 1916, had any very great political influence with the British Government when they controlled the railways. Deputy Cooper rather assumed that as a constant traveller he would be molested by railwaymen in connection with an aspect of this Bill dealing with their civil rights.

Dealing with the question of their political influence, let us assume—and I think we will not be wrong in assuming—that the number of shareholders in the Irish railways is as large as the number of railway employees—and I think it is larger. If we are to take the arguments that were used by Ministers when they were inviting the Irish public to subscribe to the recent Loan, the men who have the money are the men who really control the machine. Therefore, if the number of railway shareholders in Ireland is greater than the number of railway employees, I take it that the political influence of the men with the money is greater than that of the railway worker, who has nothing but his life invested in the industry.

A shareholder, speaking at the Great Western Railway Company's shareholders' meeting on a recent occasion, stated:—"If we bring to bear our political influence—700,000 votes at least in this case, excluding a great many other votes of people indirectly interested—I think we can bring pressure to bear on the Government which is very desirable and which the Shareholders' Protection Association will concentrate upon. Organise: unity is certainly strength." That is the view of a railway shareholder regarding the political influence of those who have their money invested in the railways.

Major COOPER: Did he succeed in using it?

Mr. DAVIN: I put it to Deputy Hewat and Deputy Cooper that we can take the case of the Postal Servants in the Free State as a fair example, and I would be surprised to hear from any Deputy, or from anybody outside, that when members of the public go to the Post Office counter to buy stamps they are delayed to any great extent by the interference of postal servants in discussing political affairs. That may be taken as a fair example of the arguments that Deputy Cooper and Deputy Hewat are trying to persuade us with, in regard to the question of political influence.

Vol. 5.

Major COOPER: The postal servants do not possess the rights which you are proposing to give under this Bill.

Mr. DAVIN: I can tell Deputy Hewat and Deputy Cooper that the political and civil rights of railway men are not going to be surrendered at any price. I had an experience at the last election, and perhaps it is not wrong for me to relate it here. Down in my own constituency I had the experience of meeting some Civil Servants from Government Buildings working on behalf of the Cumann na nGaedheal, and in opposition to the nominees of the Labour Party, and of Deputy Gorey's Union. Was not that a political interference by Civil Servants, and one would like to know in a case of that kind whether the Civil Servants working for Cumann na nGaedheal were paid by the State at the time they were working against us. I think there is no use in labouring the point here, or asking the Dáil to agree that the present system of railway organisation is a failure. Commission after Commission has been set up by both British and Irish Governments to inquire into and report in regard to the question of railway organisation. President Cosgrave on a previous occasion stated that the Government were unable to adopt the reports of many of the Commissions appointed by himself, simply because the Commissions did not make sensible recommendations. The Commissions, as far as I know, made recommendations in accordance with the terms of reference.

If President Cosgrave in appointing these Commissions will so limit the terms of reference as to rule out questions of this kind, then he will find whether he will be able to get men to sit on these Commissions, and devise recommendations which would suit himself or the Ministry. However, Commissions which have dealt with this question of reorganisation have reported in favour of State ownership. I contend that there is no necessity in a small country like Ireland, much less in the Free State, to have 46 different registered companies with 28 separate managements, and with 170 railway directors drawing, on an average, fees of from £19,000 to £20,000. If that is the

[Mr. Davin.] contention that was put up by Deputy O'Mahony, and the representative of the Farmers' Union who gave evidence before the Railway Commission, then I think that there are very few in the Dáil who will agree with it. We are faced with the proposal that the present system is rotten, and must be got rid of; and what is the alternative? We heard it stated by Deputy O'Mahony yesterday that the Ministry had no policy with regard to this very urgent question. He made a statement on a previous occasion, but it was qualified—

Mr. O'MAHONY: On a point of personal explanation, what I said was that the Government had not revealed their policy.

Mr. DAVIN: Well, if the Ministry had not revealed their policy, even to their supporters, I hope, if a division is taken on the Bill, that those who have not heard the policy of the Government will vote in favour of the Bill. To give an example—I do not know whether it is necessary for me to do so or not—of the present wasteful system of administration, one has only to look at the town of Collooney, with three different railway companies there and three different staffs, stationmasters, signalmen, and all the other paraphernalia operating three different systems of railway administration in that town, with a population of 371. I think I need not go any further than quoting that case in support of the contention that the present system is rotten, and must be got rid of. In most countries where State ownership is in operation, and working with a considerable amount of success, the railways have been originally constructed under certain concessions and limitations laid down by different Acts of Parliament. The first railways, for instance, constructed in Prussia were built by private companies under certain concessions laid down under an Act of 1838. That Act conferred on the then Government power to acquire the railway lines at the expiration of 30 years, at a price fixed at 25 times the annual dividends for the preceding five years. It might be quite rightly said that these are more favourable terms than we are providing in the Bill introduced here. I think Deputy Johnson has made it quite clear that so far as we are concerned as a party, we are not staking our political future on that particular clause. If the Dáil is prepared to take over the Bill and give better terms to the shareholders than the Minister for Agriculture gave the landlords who confiscated the land, then it is the responsibility of the majority of the members of the Dáil if they amend the Bill in that particular form.

With regard to the Prussian railways, a remarkable coincidence, and quite the opposite of our experience here, is that although the Prussian Parliament had powers under the terms of the Act of 1838, yet when eventually in 1873 they decided to acquire the railways for the State, they did not rely on the compulsory Act of 1838, but an agreement between the then owners and the Government was arrived at by friendly negotiation. That example, I think, might be followed by those now in control of the Irish railways; and if it was followed it would make the position of the Government in dealing with this Bill, or any other Bill of the same kind, a very easy matter. Deputy Hewat stated, strange to say, that the Bill was of a confiscatory nature. Deputy Woulfe, speaking yesterday evening, pleaded for the railway companies under the present system of organisation, and laboured to explain—which I think he should not in dealing with that aspect of the case—the insolvency of the present railway systems. If the railways are so insolvent as the Deputy would have the Dáil believe, I do not think he would object if he were a shareholder, to the Government taking them over under the terms described by Deputy Hewat as confiscation. It is, of course, well known to those who have travelled around the country; they can see it from their experience in looking out through railway carriage windows, as Deputy Woulfe said, that the thought of ultimate unification, amalgamation or nationalisation never seemed to have dawned on the people who originally constructed the various kinds of railway lines in this country. We have every system of known railway in the country to-day, from the electric narrow gauge railway to the Mono rail, known as the Lartigue Railway, running between Listowel and Ballybunion.

Perhaps those who constructed the railways at the time were doing it, with the advice of the British Government, to make it impossible at any time in the future to arrive at a system of organisation of the railways that would be suitable to the needs of the trading community. It has been stated in the Press and elsewhere that nationalisation has been ruled out. We have had statements made in the Dáil by responsible Ministers in connection with the Government's policy regarding the future of the railways. I am not aware of any discussion in the Dáil in which it was decided that nationalisation was ruled out by the Government. If the Government is to be taken as the Ministry, then perhaps that has been the case. If the Government is to be taken as the Cumann na nGaedheal, or governing party in the Dáil, then that is not so, according to Deputy O'Mahony's statement. But, if the Government is the majority of the Dáil, which is the only place where matters of this kind should and can be decided, then railway nationalisation has neither been discussed nor ruled out according to my knowledge. On the 3rd January last we had from the Ministry the only statement which could be taken as a statement of policy. If one is to look at the Governor-General's address and observe the language used by the Governor-General, representing as he does the views of the Executive, I think it must be agreed that we are getting further back from the position which the Ministry took up on January 3rd last. The Minister read a very carefully prepared document, in which it was stated: "The Companies were definitely informed that the policy favoured by the Government was the unification of the whole railway systems under one management and the securing of the maximum economies in organisation and administration that unification rendered possible."

It goes on to say: "The larger companies on their part"—it should be made quite clear who these were—"represented that the object desired by the Government would be better secured by a system of grouping than by complete unification. To this the Government has replied that it will keep an open mind on grouping as compared with unification, and if all the companies can agree on a grouping scheme that will secure the same degree of economy and efficiency as is to be expected through unification, without prejudicing in any way the interests of trade and industry in the Saorstát and its ports, it will give any such scheme its most serious consideration." The statement goes on to say: "From a date, early in January, the railway companies had informed the Government that they could agree upon a scheme of grouping, that the Government informed them that that scheme should be brought forward by the end of March, and failing an agreement upon a scheme which the Government could support, the Government would proceed to put their own policy into operation." We have learned very little as to what happened since that. If rumours are to be taken as correct, there has been no agreement among the Companies. I hope, however, replies will make it quite clear what Companies made that statement to the Government, and whether or not all the Companies were consulted. I previously argued in the Dáil, and I am still more convinced now that nationalisation of the railways is the only solution of the difficulty in the area particularly over which this Parliament has jurisdiction.

I have argued, and I still contend, that the solution of the railway question, in the interests of the general body of the community, is bound up very largely with the question of the settlement of the Boundary difficulty. It has been rumoured, and it is quite right that this Dáil should be informed of these rumours, in railway circles that the Northern Parliament, or whatever else you call Sir James Craig's Parliament, has favoured unification of the railway system within the Six County area as we know it and as it exists to-day. The Government will be faced with a very serious problem if that is the position. In my opinion, if the railways of the Six Counties were unified, and all the railway property in that area were unified under one management, it would add further difficulty to the solution of the Boundary problem. We do know at any rate that no matter how long it may be, or what the powers of the Belfast Parliament may be in the future, whether it operates or functions for a Parliament of Six Counties or Four Counties, even with limited powers, it will always create rivalry between the Saorstát ports and the ports of the Belfast area. Picture the position of any great Northern combine, subsidised, as we are told it may be, by a huge British corporation, and imagine the position of a Southern competing combine. That is the difficulty which I believe the Government is confronted with, and that is the position which will force the Government in the near future to take complete control of the railways operating wholly in the Free State. If the policy of the Government is unification of the railways operating wholly in the Free State, I ask the President or the Ministers what control can they exercise over railways operating on the border-line or on railways operating inside the Six County border, to prevent them diverting traffic out of its natural route? What control in any case can they claim the right to exercise in these cases? Can they override any combine of railways operating wholly in the Free State area?

The question of railway rates, both passenger and goods, is a question which should be dealt with, perhaps, more by Deputy Gorey and his party than by anybody associated with the Labour party. In dealing with this matter we realise that high railway rates not alone affect the producer, but are in all cases passed on to the consumer, who has eventually to pay. Now, it is a coincidence that in giving evidence before the Provisional Government Commission that was set up to inquire into the railways, two railway companies operating inside and on the border of the Six Counties gave evidence, to the effect, that their revenue would not meet their working expenses. It is a strange thing, that since that evidence was given these two companies have reduced their rates to a considerable extent. How, therefore, could railway companies who have given evidence before the Railway Commission stating that the revenue would not enable them to meet working expenses, have since agreed to reduce their rates and yet prevent their systems from being closed down? There must be a subsidy in these cases coming from somewhere, and it is up to the Ministry to find out where it is coming from. The question of railway rates, so far as it affects the railways solely in the Free State area, has been dealt with on a few occasions. It is an extraordinary thing that although the railway companies operating in the Six Counties and on the border have reduced their rates there has been practically no reduction whatever in their rates by the companies operating in the Southern area, although the railwaymen's wages have been reduced by £1,500,000 as the result of an agreement that was arrived at between the railwaymen's representatives and the railway companies.

The railway companies had the further reduction of one and a half millions as a result of the reduced cost of coal and other materials. What argument or what reason has been put forward, or can be put forward, by these railways, especially in the Southern areas, for not having reduced their rates, particularly in view of the facts I have stated? The real fact is that these companies having had thrown at them this question of unification, or not knowing the position that they are going to be placed in as a result of the Government's policy, are not going to, and will not, do anything until the Government makes up its mind as to what it is going to do with regard to the railways in the future. As far as I can see, nothing can be done in connection with the question of the relief of railway rates, at least for a considerable period, unless the Government is prepared to take control of the railways in the Free State area. Whether this Bill is passed, or whether any other Bill is passed by the Government, it will take a long time for the Bill to go through. When the Bill has passed through both Houses it will be necessary to set up a railway rates tribunal.

It will then take a long time to prove to the tribunal that there should be a reduction in rates. My point is that if the Government are prepared to give any immediate relief to the people suffering as a result of the present high rates, it will have to make up its mind to face the situation with which it is confronted in a bold and courageous manner. We have seen interviews given to the Press by people who are unable or who are ashamed to allow their names to stand over what they state. We have been warned about the domination of foreign capital. As far as I can see, while the railways are called Irish railways, both North and South, there is a great domination of foreign capital at the back of them. Belgium was confronted with the same position, and in order to prevent the domination of its railway system by foreign capital it decided, in the year 1870, to refuse any further concessions to privately-owned companies for the purpose of building any further private lines. Between the years 1857 and 1906 the Belgium Government took over as many as 20 private companies to prevent what is called the domination of foreign capital. That, I submit, is another argument in support of the Bill which Deputy Johnson introduced.

In 1910, as a result of this operation, 2,697 miles out of a total mileage of 2,915 miles were either owned or controlled by the State. As is well known to those who have experience of travelling on the continent, passenger fares and goods rates on the Belgium railways are the lowest in the world. It is well known that as a result of the arrangements made, especially in pre-war days for tourists in Belgium, that the rates charged to tourists in that country were the lowest practically in the world, and as a result of these low fares, and of the other concessions given, there was a remarkable influx of tourists to Belgium which, of course, was a considerable advantage to the country. While on this question of railway rates, I think it desirable to give a quotation from the findings of the Scotter Commission. This was not a Commission of Irishmen set up by Irishmen, but was a Commission composed of Englishmen and set up by the British Government, who never take into account the Irish outlook, so far as trade and commerce are concerned.

I should have said there were some Irishmen on it. Now, that report contained the following re-

8 o'clock. markable statement in regard to the question of Irish railway rates: "In our view the Irish railways have not, and are not, being fully utilised for the advancement of the general interests in Ireland owing to the competitive rates on imported goods being so much lower in scale than the local rates, so that the advancement of the local manufacturers is discouraged rather than assisted, as it should have been." That is the remark made in the findings and in the recommendations of the Scotter Commission, and it is scarcely necessary to say anything further to prove that the Irish railways in the past have been controlled by men not interested in the development of the country. Now, if these people who are in control of so many small railways in Ireland are going to get control of the bigger combine, if the Government tolerates the setting up of a system of that kind, it will not be a case of dealing with men who dominated the Irish railways in the past, but it will mean that the men who own these railways will own and will run the State. I am sure there cannot be any objection to my reading an article written by the late President Arthur Griffith in regard to this aspect of the railway trouble. Writing "In the Sinn Féin Policy" published fifteen months after he published "The Resurrection of Hungary," he says: "Owing to the attitude of our railways the development of the country is materially hampered," and he goes on to say: "We cannot make up for the deficiency of the railways, but we can certainly do much to alleviate the present situation by the proper utilisation of our semi-derelict canal system. With the proper transit system in Ireland the interdependence of manufacturing and agricultural industry would become manifest, and a larger market would be created for each. By a proper transit system, as the maker of industrial Germany pointed out, not merely are the powers of labour of those who are employed in it brought into activity, not only is the agricultural population enabled to obtain from the natural resources which it possesses a greater return than before, but the wealth heretofore lying idle in the earth becomes useful and profitable. Articles such as coal, stone, salt, gypsum, marble, slate, timber, which the freight of a few miles rendered before unprofitable to work, become distributable over a whole country, and thus the formerly valueless resources of a country become, through good transit facilities, of a high importance in the total of national production. This is what transit means to our country. It is worth working hard to obtain." I can imagine that if President Cosgrave, as the worthy successor of the late President Arthur Griffith, is inclined to take his view in regard to how the transport system should be dealt with, he would, I think, take over the Bill which Deputy Johnson has introduced. He would, I am sure, be particularly gratified to take over the Bill, if he is not in a position to tell the Dáil before he turns it down what his alternative policy is. I scarcely think it is necessary, although I could do so at much greater length, to go any further into the question of the ownership and management of the railways on the Continent, and to prove by figures which I could give and which are at the disposal of every member of this Dáil, that State ownership, where it has been brought into operation, has succeeded in almost every country in Europe.

There is one aspect of the case that I cannot sit down without dealing with, and that is the question of the wages of the railwaymen. A good deal of piffle has been talked regarding the wages of railwaymen, not alone during the discussion of this Bill, but on previous occasions, by Deputy Gorey and others. I want it to be definitely understood once and for all that these statements are absolutely contrary to the facts, and that, as a matter of fact, railway workers' wages are the lowest of any section of workers in this country, with the exception of agricultural workers. Deputy Gorey, of course, could solve that problem, judging from previous statements he has made. He stated: "If the citizen must discharge his duty the State must discharge its duty, and I suggest seriously to the Government that if there are any more strikes or any more attempts to get hold of the key industries of the country, such as the ports and railways, it is their duty to set up a State organisation which could be done and manned within 24 hours." That is the statement of Deputy Gorey when speaking in the Dáil on the 22nd November. I have been asked by people outside if that went further than the terms of our Bill. I would ask Deputy Hewat if what Deputy Gorey suggests there is not confiscation to a greater extent than the proposals contained in this Bill. Deputy Gorey, of course, would settle the whole wages difficulty by providing men from the ranks of the farmers and the farmers' sons to run the railways for the State for nothing. That is what I think is contained in the statement which I have quoted. I would, however, warn the Ministry and Deputies who may be confronted at some future date with a position such as he suggests, that if Deputy Gorey is in charge of the lever of the mail train going to Cork in a fog, and if they are travelling on that train, that they would be very well advised to take out an insurance policy. We have had a little sample of the management of Deputy Gorey's people when they took over SS. Brussels and a couple of other ships. They tried to run them for about three months. They failed, and eventually handed them over to one of the great British combines which we are now told are going to dominate this country in future, proving that what Deputy Gorey has suggested with regard to the railways has been a failure when they previously attempted it.

With regard to railway wages, apart from the free labour which Deputy Gorey has suggested can be provided, traffic porters at present are only paid from 45s. 6d. to 49s. per week, according to the importance of the station at which they are employed. A few parcels' porters at Class I. stations get as high as 52s. I would like to ask Deputy Hewat if he is prepared to go to his men in the coal trade and offer them these wages. Station foremen, with large numbers of men under their control, are paid as low as 52s. 6d. per week, while the highest wage paid to a foreman who controls scores of men is only 62s. per week.

Mr. HEWAT: Will Deputy Davin give us the corresponding pre-war figures?

Mr. DAVIN: I have personal knowledge of a station not very far from Dublin, where 153 trains are scheduled and run each day, and the foreman controlling the staff there is paid at the rate of 62/- per week. I do not know if Deputy Gorey would argue that that is an unfair wage for the responsibility which that man has to undertake. Deputy O'Mahony yesterday evening alleged that while the Bill provided only three-fifths of the present income for shareholders, it provided 100 per cent. in the case of the staffs. If the Deputy will read the Bill again he will find that in the case of all men who may become redundant as a result of reorganisation, the maximum amount which they can get is two-thirds of their present wages, although dismissal is of far more moment to them than any reductions in dividend could be to the shareholders.

It has been customary for railway companies both in England and Ireland, when recruiting staffs, to do so at a very low wage. I am not disclosing any secret when I make the statement that I started work on a railway as a clerical worker at 8/- a week. I ask Deputy Gorey, who is so healthy and happy looking to-day, if he would like, after getting an ordinary reasonable education, to be faced with the prospect of starting work at 8/- weekly and having to pay 12/- for his lodging. I can assure Deputy Gorey that we are not going back to the stone age so far as that is concerned. Deputy O'Mahony quoted figures in connection with the Caledonian Railway as against the whole of the Irish railways, but what he professed to show by the figures it is difficult to see. He said that the receipts per mile were higher in Scotland than in Ireland, but he did not say that the cost of working per mile was infinitely greater in Scotland than in Ireland. I could detain and entertain the Dáil—if such a discussion is an entertainment—at greater length if it was necessary to prove that the Bill I have the pleasure of supporting is the only practical measure that holds for the moment. I could go into many questions connected with the administration of the railways both in pre-war days, and during the period of control. I believe, however, that anything I might say would not convince some people, who are so prejudiced against nationalisation, that even if it was a practical proposition they would not vote for it. I have put forward as briefly as was necessary the principal reasons why this Bill should be taken over by the Government. Deputy O'Mahony must be right when he told us that the Ministry have no policy. If the Ministry are not prepared to announce what, in their opinion, is the only practical alternative to this Bill, I ask the members of the Dáil to take their courage in their hands and vote for the Second Reading of this Bill.

Mr. GOREY: As there is only a quarter of an hour available, with the permission of the Dáil, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

The PRESIDENT: Might I intervene to explain what our proposals are with regard to the adjournment for the Christmas holidays? We intend, if we can get through certain measures by Friday, to adjourn then until the 15th January. If we do not get them through, it will mean either sitting on Saturday or Tuesday next, or coming back on the 8th January. I do not very well see how we are going to finish this discussion this evening. We certainly will not have time to deal with it on Friday, having regard to the other business. There is a motion by Deputy Morrissey for Friday, and I expect we will want two hours anyway for that. It is only fair that the Dáil should realise what the position is. Apart from pressing Bills, I do not see how we could get much further with the Ministers Bill, and I would not mind tying up that to give greater time for this discussion, that is, if Deputy Johnson wishes to have this matter decided before the adjournment. He need not answer to-night—it will do to-morrow—but I just want to put the position before Deputies, so that they will understand the situation.

Mr. JOHNSON: We do not know what other business there may be for to-morrow, but if it is competent to take this Bill, then I think the possibilities of an adjournment on Friday, that the President speaks of, are reasonable. If there is business for the Dáil to transact to-morrow, I do not see how it is possible to get through what possibly is necessary business this week, and in that case I think we should meet next week. It is desirable, in my view, that this Bill should be discussed and a division taken before the adjournment; but I press for due time to consider the motion of Deputy Morrissey, and there is also a motion by Deputy Figgis that has precedence according to the form in which it appeared on the paper. I think the question really is, in view of what the President says about the Ministers Bill, what other business there is to transact to-morrow.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

There is the Interpretation Bill, Report Stage; Local Government (Collection of Rates) Bill, First Stage; Coroners' Qualification Bill, First Stage; the Second Stage of the Dáil Eireann Loan and Funds Bill; Ministers' and Secretaries' Bill, Committee Stage; and the two motions for Friday, one by Deputy Figgis and one by Deputy Morrissey.

Mr. JOHNSON: None but the Ministers' Bill is likely to be contentious, and I am satisfied if we can place this Bill on the Order Paper, leaving the Ministers' Bill over to follow on if there is time.

The PRESIDENT: Very good.

Mr. JOHNSON: Perhaps on Friday a longer time could be given for the two motions down on the Paper.

The PRESIDENT: That would depend on the other Bill, mentioned last night.

Mr. GOREY: I move the adjournment of the Debate until to-morrow.

Question put and agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE DÁIL.

The PRESIDENT: I move the adjournment of the Dáil until 3 o'clock to-morrow.

The Dáil adjourned at 8.20 until o'clock on Thursday, 13th December, 1923.

CEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS. ORAL ANSWERS.

DEPUTY IMPRISONED IN SCOTLAND.

DOMHNALL O MUIRGHEASA asked the President what steps, if any, he has taken, or proposes to take, to secure the release of Mr. John McCurtain, a member of this Dáil, who is a political prisoner incarcerated at present in Aberdeen, Scotland?

The PRESIDENT: Representations have been made on several occasions urging the release of Mr. McCurtain, but, so far, I regret to say, they have not met with success. Advantage will be taken of a suitable opportunity to renew these representations.

SHAW COMMISSION AWARD (DELAY IN PAYMENT).

Mr. P. McKENNA asked the Minister for Finance what is the cause of the delay in the payment of a sum of £2,800, plus interest, awarded by the Shaw Commission to Mr. John J. McGuinness, Kilbeggan, for the destruction of his house and business by British Crown Forces; whether, considering the amount is so long overdue, payment will be made forthwith?

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. E. Blythe): The case referred to by the Deputy is one of a number in which because of the irregular activities of the applicants the awards were withheld.

I may add that, in view of the more settled conditions now prevailing and of the desire of the Government to hasten the economic reconstruction of the country, the position in regard to these cases is being reconsidered.

CO. GALWAY PERSONAL INJURY CLAIM.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Finance if he is aware that a decree for £275, with £19 10s. costs, was obtained at the Galway Sessions in October, 1921, by Patrick Killelea, of Boughill, Ballyforan, Ballinasloe, for personal injuries sustained in September, 1920; whether this sum has yet been paid to Mr. Killelea, and, if not, when payment will be made?

Mr. BLYTHE: No application for payment of the decree referred to has been received in the Ministry of Finance.

If the Deputy furnishes me with additional particulars I shall have the matter given immediate attention.

SALE OF SCOTCH WHISKEY IN SAORSTAT.

Mr. P. J. EGAN asked the Minister for Finance if he is aware that large quantities of Scotch whiskey are being sold in the Saorstát at strengths from 30 per cent. to 35 per cent. under proof, with a consequent loss of from 5s. to 7s. per gallon to the revenue, and serious injury to the Irish distillery trade; to ask what steps are taken to ensure that, where whiskey is sold in the Saorstát at a strength of less than 25 per cent. under proof, the purchasing public are clearly made aware of the fact?

Mr. BLYTHE: I have no information as to the strength at which Scotch whiskey is sold in the Saorstát. The duty on whiskey, whether imported or home-made, is charged not on the bulk quantity, but on the proof quantity as found as a result of test. There is, therefore, no loss to the revenue, as suggested from the practice referred to, if such practice exists.

The second part of the question is not for my Department.

SEIZURE OF CLEEVES' CREAMERIES.

MICHAEL O HIFERNAIN asked the Minister for Finance whether, in view of the considerable losses suffered by a great number of farmers owing to the seizure of Messrs. Cleeves' Creameries in 1922, arrangements will be made whereby farmers will be compensated for their losses?

Mr. BLYTHE: The exact nature of the losses sustained by the farmers in question is not mentioned by the Deputy. Any persons, however, who consider that they are entitled to compensation under the provisions of the Damage to Property (Compensation) Act, 1923, have, no doubt, lodged their applications in accordance with the terms of the Act. Such applications will be heard by the County Courts in due course. Every effort is being made to expedite the disposal of compensation claims by the Courts.

RE-EMPLOYMENT OF C.D. BOARD GANGERS.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Agriculture if he is aware that a large number of men who had given from 10 to 25 years' service as gangers under the Congested Districts Board have recently been thrown out of employment as a result of the stoppages of improvement works consequent on the dissolution of that Board, and whether the Minister can hold out any hope to these men that they will be employed in similar work by the Land Commission in connection with the Land Act operations?

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. P. Hogan): The employment of a number of men who had acted as gangers for the late Congested Districts Board has ceased, as the funds available for the work on which they were engaged have been expended or the work has been suspended until the Land Commission has had an opportunity of considering whether it should be continued. In employing men on improvement works the Land Commission will give every consideration to the claims of men who have had experience under the (late) Congested Districts Board.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Can the Minister say how soon is it likely these improvement works will be taken up again?

Mr. HOGAN: I am unable to say that at the moment. If the Deputy will put down a question at a later date, I will be able to give him further information.

DISCHARGED NEWBRIDGE SOLDIER—QUESTION OF COMPENSATION.

AODH O CULACHAIN asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that Private James Hughes, of Naas Road, Newbridge, Army No. 51939, 48th Infantry Battalion, who attested on the 20th May, 1922, was discharged from the Army at Mullingar in ill-health, and is now suffering from acute inflammation of the kidneys, caused by his having to sleep in his wet clothes while on column duty in December, '22, in County Cavan; whether the question of compensation until this soldier regains his normal health will be favourably considered?

General MULCAHY: Compensation for ill-health contracted on military service is not provided for in the Army Pensions Act, 1923, and is, therefore, not payable. In any case, Private Hughes was not discharged on grounds of ill-health.

SEIZURE OF CLEEVES' CREAMERIES.

MICHAEL O HIFERNAIN asked the Minister for Home Affairs what steps, if any, have been taken to apprehend and bring to justice those persons who were responsible for the seizure of Messrs. Cleeves' Creameries in May, 1922?

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. K. O'Higgins): Owing to the state of affairs which obtained in County Tipperary at the time, no steps were taken against the persons responsible for the seizure of Messrs. Cleeves' Creameries in May, 1922. Enquiries are, however, being instituted with a view to obtaining reliable information against the parties concerned, and, if such information becomes available, proceedings will be instituted.

PREPARATION OF ELECTORS' LISTS (QUESTION OF OFFICIALS' REMUNERATION).

Mr. P. W. SHAW asked the Minister for Local Government whether he is aware that the officers of the Local Authorities have not been paid their fees and expenses for preparing the Electors' Lists for the year 1922, as owing to the order of the Government the completion of the register was held up; whether these fees were taken into account when these officers were appointed, and form a substantial part of their salaries, and if an order will be issued authorising payment of these fees and expenses

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. Burke): The Deputy refers presumably to the register which came into force in February, 1922. I am not aware that officials of local authorities did any considerable amount of work in connection with that register. The position of local officials in this respect is, however, under consideration, but it will be noted that while in some instances franchise fees form a considerable portion of salaries, the extended franchise of 1918, and the further extension of the franchise to all adults in the present register, increased certain salaries over the 1918 rate to a figure out of proportion to the work involved.

CO. CORK RATE COLLECTORS.

TADHG O MURCHADHA asked the Minister for Local Government whether he is aware that rate collectors in County Cork have been requested by the Cork County Council to enter with two sureties into a bond of £100 for the closing of their collection within the next few months, and, in addition, into an agreement giving the Cork County Council power of attorney to obtain judgment against the sureties of such collectors in default of the closing of their collection within the stated period; whether he is aware that many collectors in Cork hold numerous decrees for rates which they are unable to execute, and what consideration he is prepared to give to collectors who have been always willing to perform their duties?

Mr. BURKE: The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative.

The Bonds in question are those ordinarily prescribed to ensure the proper discharge of their duties by Rate Collectors. They had been allowed to lapse during recent years owing to the unwillingness of Guarantee Societies to enter into such contracts, but there is now no reason why such Bonds should not be reintroduced in Cork County as in other Counties.

Every consideration will be shown to Collectors who have honestly done all in their power to close their collections, but who may have been unable to do so, so far, for causes beyond their control.

Mr. MURPHY: Is the Minister aware that many of the Collectors in the County Cork have not got their books back from the County Council, and are thereby unable to proceed with their collection?

Mr. BURKE: I am not aware of that.

GORT (CO. GALWAY) DISTRICT COUNCIL AND CO. AMALGAMATION SCHEME.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Local Government whether the Gort District Council at their meeting on the 8th September last, requested by resolution that a return be prepared and circulated amongst the members, showing the amounts of pensions awarded to officers, prior to and after the County Amalgamation Scheme, as far as it relates to the Gort District, as well as the rents derived from occupation of the Workhouse Buildings, and whether he will explain the cause of the delay in preparing this return.

Mr. BURKE: The resolution referred to was addressed to the Secretary to the County Board of Health, and I am not, therefore, in a position to explain the delay in the preparation of the return asked for. It is suggested that the Deputy might communicate direct with the Secretary to the County Board of Health.

HOUSING IN GORT (CO. GALWAY).

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Local Government whether he is aware that the Gort District Council abandoned the building of nine labourers' cottages during the European War for want of funds; whether the proposed tenants of these cottages are presently living in houses unfit for habitation, and when he will be prepared to advance such sums as may be necessary to proceed with the completion of said cottages.

Mr. BURKE: The reply to the first part of the question is in the affirmative.

No representations have been made in regard to the houses at present occupied. There are no funds available now out of which advances, as suggested, could be made.

WRITTEN ANSWERS.

DEPENDANTS' ALLOWANCE (TIMOLEAGUE, CO. CORK).

TADHG O MURCHADHA asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that Mrs. Ellen Long, of Dunmorley, Timoleague, Co. Cork, has made repeated applications for dependants allowance in respect of her son, Edward Long, Army No. 40680, Pay Book No. 4060, who joined the National Army at Clonakilty, Co. Cork, on 11th February, 1923, and whether he will state the reason for withholding payment of the allowance, and if payment will now be made.

General MULCAHY: Only one application was received—on the 15th September last—from Mrs. Long. Her claim was duly investigated and disallowed, on the ground that the extent of her dependence (if any) on her son, was less than the minimum required by regulations before an allowance may be issued.

DUNMANWAY DEPENDANT'S CLAIM.

TADHG O MURCHADHA asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that a balance of £6 in respect of dependants allowance has been long due to Mrs. Ellen Donovan, Quarry Road, Dunmanway, Co. Cork, in respect of the service in the National Army of her husband, William Donovan, which service terminated in December, 1922, and whether he will recommend the payment of this small amount at once.

General MULCAHY: A Paying Order for £5 17s. 6d. has been sent to Mrs. Donovan, Quarry Road, Dunmanway, Co. Cork, in settlement of her claim.

LONGFORD MILITARY ACCOUNT.

Mr. P. McKENNA asked the Minister for Defence if he will state what is the cause of the delay in the payment of an account, amounting to £404 odd, due to Anthony Farrell, Merchant, Main Street, Longford, for goods supplied to the Thomas Kelleher Barracks, Longford; whether he is aware that this account was certified for payment, and put in order in the Chief Accountant's Office, Portobello, at the end of October, and, notwithstanding this, the amount is still unpaid; whether the payment of the account will be made forthwith.

General MULCAHY: Mr. Farrell's account has been received. Owing to pressure of work some delay in dealing with it has arisen. I am arranging to expedite its settlement.

ARMY ACCOUNTS—ATHLONE CLAIM.

Mr. P. McKENNA asked the Minister for Defence if he will state what is the cause of the delay in the payment of a claim for meat supplied to the Military Barracks, Athlone, by Mr. James Campbell, Victualler, Athlone, particulars of which were furnished on several occasions.

General MULCAHY: Payment of

Mr. James Campbell's claim has not been made, as the account was incurred during a period in respect of which claims cannot be discharged out of funds voted by the Dáil for the maintenance of the Army. The general question as to what extent and from what funds these claims may be settled has yet to receive consideration. Pending a decision, Mr. Campbell's claim cannot get further consideration.

ACCIDENTAL SHOOTING AT MULLINGAR—QUESTION OF COMPENSATION.

SEAN O LAIDHIN asked the Minister for Defence whether a claim for compensation was lodged on June 20th, 1923, by Mr. John Machin, Solicitor, Mullingar, on behalf of Mr. John Bracken, Ballbarn, Moate, in respect of his son, Pte. Peter Bracken, National Army, who was accidentally shot on April 29th, 1923, at Mullingar; whether, in view of the fact that the deceased was the principal support of his parents, the consideration of this claim will be expedited.

General MULCAHY: I am unable to trace the receipt of the claim referred to.

THE POSTAL COMMISSION.

STATEMENT BY POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Postmaster-General desires to make a statement with regard to the decision of the Government regarding findings of the Postal Commission.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. J. J. Walsh): The Report of the Postal Commission has been given the most careful consideration by the Government for many months past, and the Dáil will appreciate that in view of the serious state of the National finances it has been necessary to scrutinise the recommendations of the Commission very closely from the financial aspect, in view of the important alterations both of pay and of organisation put forward.

The main recommendations of the Commission affect the two important postal classes of Postmen and Sorting Clerks and Telegraphists, and a scheme of reorganisation is proposed under which the sorting work at present performed by the Sorting Clerks and Telegraphists will be transferred to certain members of the Postman Class.

In giving the Dáil the decisions of the Government on the Commission's recommendations, I should like to say at the outset that the reorganisation sanctioned by the Government will only apply in those offices where the volume of work justifies regrading, and in which it is estimated that the reorganisation can be effected without appreciable increase in staff expenditure.

I will take first the Postmen Class.

The Commission recommends that postmen be divided into two grades, Grade "A" and Grade "B"; Grade "B" to continue to do work similar to that already performed by Postmen, and Grade "A" to perform sorting and despatching work at present performed by Sorting Clerks and Telegraphists. This recommendation is accepted in principle for offices where the quantity of sorting work is sufficient to provide whole-time sorting work.

POSTMEN—GRADE B.

The Commission recommends that the maximum basic wages of Grade "B" Postmen be increased at Class I. Offices by 3/- to 43/- per week, i.e., basic wage carrying Civil Service Bonus, with pro rata increases for Class II. and Class III. Offices. The Government has given this recommendation very careful consideration, and it is unable to accept it. It is satisfied, after a perusal of the evidence, that the existing basic scales are fully adequate for the work at present performed by the existing grades. Where, therefore, work is not graded as higher work, the Government is unable to accept a recommendation to increase the present wage.

POSTMEN—GRADE A.

The Commission recommends that Postman Grade "A," performing sorting and despatching work, shall have a maximum of 52/- per week, plus bonus. The maximum suggested is too high, and the Government is unable to [Mr. J. J. Walsh.] accept it. It proposes, instead, to adopt a maximum of 48/-, plus bonus, a week for Class I. Offices, the scale being the present scale, rising by increments of 1/6 per week from the present wages point of 39/-, plus bonus, per week, to the new maximum of 48/-, plus bonus, per week, with pro rata maxima and scales for Class II. and Class III. Offices.

I now come to the class of Sorting Clerk and Telegraphists.

The Commission recommends that the class at present known as S.C. and T. should in future be known as Post Office Assistants, who should perform all duties now discharged by the S.C. and T., except those recommended for transfer to Postmen.

The Commission further recommends that P.O. Assistants should undertake all P.O. Clerical work except that discharged by Executive Grades.

With regard to wages, the Commission recommends that P.O. Assistants should go to a maximum of £162 10s. 0d., plus bonus, for males, and £110 for females, except in the case of assistants who shall have passed an efficiency test to be arranged by the Department with a view to proving their ability to discharge the highest clerical duties proper to the grade, who should go to £220 in the case of males, and £155 in the case of females.

The latter recommendation, which involves the payment of a State servant not by reference to the work on which he is employed, but by reference to the work which he is able to discharge, is one which the Government cannot possibly entertain. Nor can the Government accept the proposal that the work at Headquarter Offices should be performed by the manipulative classes, though the Government is prepared to provide a special avenue of promotion for these classes.

The Government has decided to absorb the Sorting Clerks and Telegraphists into a new class of Post Office Assistants of two Grades, Grade A and Grade B, one of which, Grade A, will be employed on the higher duties of the class, viz., counter duties, registered letter duties, and writing duties where the volume of work is such that full-time employment can be provided on these duties; the other Grade, Grade B, will perform the duties at present falling upon Sorting Clerks and Telegraphists, excepting in the case of larger offices, where the duties will be transferred to Postmen Grade A and Post Office Assistants, Grade A.

In the case of Post Office Assistants, Grade B, who will remain employed on their present duties, the Government is unable to authorise any increase of the present basic scales of pay, which are adequate.

In the case of Post Office Assistants, Grade A, who will be employed solely on the higher duties of the class, the Government proposes to adopt increased maxima of 70/- per week, plus bonus, for males, and 47/-, plus bonus, for females at Class I. Offices, to be reached by increments of 2/- in the case of males and 1/- in the case of females, after the present maxima have been reached. Pro rata maxima and incremental scales will be applied at Class II. and Class III. Offices.

The foregoing represents the Government's decisions on the main recommendations.

There are several points of detail and several minor recommendations of the Commission into which I need not now enter. The recruitment of all classes by competitive examination, with reservation of a percentage of vacancies for Postal Officials of junior grades, is a recommendation which the Government readily accepts. In particular, a percentage of the clerical posts in the Headquarter Offices will be reserved for competition confined to Post Office Assistants.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I would like to know whether, when the Postmaster-General speaks of the Government's decision in this circular, we are to understand he means the decision of the Executive Council, or the Government as a whole, or of the Postmaster-General, who is an External Minister responsible to this Dáil. Further, may I say, this is a very important statement of the Postmaster-General's. It deals with a Report presented to the Government twelve months ago, and which, as far as I know, has not yet been circulated or published, and I should like to ask whether we will be afforded an opportunity of discussing the statement of the Postmaster-General, which practically turns down in the main the unanimous recommendations of the Postal Commission.

Mr. WALSH: It was hoped that the Report would be circulated in time for discussion before the Recess, but I am informed, by the Ceann Comhairle, that no opportunity can now be given before that date. What I would suggest is that Deputy O'Connell, who is, perhaps, more interested in this matter than any other member of the Dáil, would avail of an opportunity, immediately after the Recess, to open up a discussion of the whole subject, which would be a better way of dealing with it than piecemeal at this stage.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Report of the Postmaster-General to the Dáil refers to the Report of the Postal Commission. The Report of the Postal Commission is not yet available to the Dáil. Will it be made available in the meantime?

Mr. WALSH: Certainly, at once.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Can the Postmaster-General say, in the meantime, and as there is not an opportunity of discussing the Report, when the terms announced in his statement will be given effect to?

Mr. WALSH: I take it it would be inadvisable to take anything for granted until the Dáil accepts the Report formally. The findings can be made retrospective, of course, covering this period.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Is the Postmaster-General in a position to answer the first question I put to him?

Mr. WALSH: I think it would be more advisable that we should deal with the whole subject at the one time. I do not see any point in dealing with it in part only.

INTERPRETATION BILL, 1923— FOURTH STAGE.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move that this Bill be received for final consideration. As the Dáil is aware, it was referred to a Special Committee, and as it has emerged, with the amendments that now appear upon the Paper, I think it might be taken as non-controversial.

The PRESIDENT: I beg to second.

Question put and agreed to.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: In the circumstances, I ask the leave of the Dáil to suspend the Standing Orders in order to take the Fifth Stage of the Interpretation Bill.

Agreed.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move that the Bill do now pass.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be sent to the Seanad.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (COLLECTION OF RATES) BILL, 1923— FIRST STAGE.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. J. Burke): I beg to move for leave to introduce the "Local Government (Collection of Rates) Bill, 1923," which is:

"A Bill to authorise the adoption of special remedies and procedure for the recovery of arrears of rates now due and to authorise the collection during a limited period of rates through or by means of the Post Office and for other purposes connected therewith."

The justification for the introduction of this Bill is the present financial condition of Local Authorities throughout the country. The condition of many County Councils is, at the moment, very precarious, owing, number one, to the large arrears of rates still outstanding, amounting, I believe, approximately to about three million pounds, and number two, which is to a great extent consequential on number one, to the very heavy overdrafts on which Local Authorities are working at the moment, amounting to over £800,000. It is absolutely essential that these arrears of rates should be recovered without delay. It is essential for two reasons: First of all, because if they are not re-

[Mr. J. Burke.] covered, and if those who are in arrears are not compelled to pay up, then those who have paid their rates will be obliged to shoulder their debts and to pay again when the next rate is struck, and secondly, because if the finances of Local Authorities are permitted to collapse, essential local services such as asylums, public health, poor relief, road repair, etc., will have to be discontinued, and various schemes for the relief of unemployment which the Government has in mind at the present moment, will have to be discontinued also.

For these reasons we have found it necessary, in order to prevent these very serious consequences, to look for very wide powers in order to speed up the collection of arrears of rates.

CORONERS' (QUALIFICATION) BILL, 1923—FIRST STAGE.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS

(Mr. O'Higgins): I beg to move for leave to introduce the "Coroners' (Qualification) Bill, 1923," which is:

"A Bill to declare certain persons who have resigned from the office of Justice of the Peace to be qualified to be appointed to be Coroners, and to validate the appointments as Coroners of certain persons who had not the statutory qualifications for such appointment."

The qualifications for a Coroner prescribed by the Coroners' Act of 1881, are three-fold. The person to be appointed must be a Doctor, duly qualified and registered under the Act of 1858, a Barrister or Solicitor of the Supreme Court, or a Justice of the Peace of five years' standing. Deputies will remember that during the period of conflict with the British, the British Military Authorities ordered the cessation of inquests, and on the other hand the Ministers of Dáil Éireann urged Local Authorities to bring pressure on Coroners to hold inquests wherever there seemed to be a reasonable need for an inquest being held. During that period the Coroner of the City of Limerick and the Coroner for Westmeath died, and the Local Authorities in these areas had some difficulty in finding a successor possessing the statutory qualification.

In Limerick and in Westmeath persons were appointed to the office of Coroner, and functioned as Coroner, who had not the statutory qualifications, and I think it will be agreed that it is desirable to regularise and to validate these appointments. That is the main object of the Bill which I propose to introduce: to regularise the appointment of Coroner in Limerick City and in Westmeath. There is one further object covered in the Bill, and it is this: With regard to the fourth qualification—a Justice of the Peace of five years' standing—the Bill provides that persons who were Justices of the Peace for five years and resigned after January, 1919, shall not, because of such resignation, be now ineligible; that is to say, it would still be possible for a County Council to appoint to the office of Coroner a person who was a Magistrate of five years' standing, and who resigned between January, 1919, and the 6th December, 1921. I move for leave to introduce the Bill.

Question: "That leave be granted to introduce the Bill," put and agreed to.

DÁIL ÉIREANN LOANS AND FUNDS BILL, 1923—SECOND STAGE.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr.

Blythe): This Bill is for the purpose of repaying sums borrowed by Dáil Éireann in the years 1919, 1920 and 1921, in Ireland and in America. The terms of the prospectus have not been literally fulfilled. Interest on the money in certain cases was to be repayable six months after the Irish Republic had received international recognition, and after the English had evacuated Ireland. The conditions of the American prospectus were somewhat similar. At a certain date after the freeing of the territory of Ireland from Britain's immediate control, the said bonds were to be redeemable at par. But the conditions have been substantially fulfilled. We have succeeded in getting control of the national destinies. We feel that the people who put up the money which enabled the successful fight to be made, that was made, should have their money paid back to them, and that payment should not be delayed or avoided because of any quibble with regard to the literal fulfilment of the conditions laid down in the prospectus.

The amount raised by the internal loan was £378,000. It was issued on the 1st August, 1919, and the list closed on the 17th July, 1920. The amount was received in very small sums. Only £114,000 was raised by means of subscriptions of £10 and upwards. It is because of the fact that the subscriptions were, generally speaking, so small in amount that we do not think it desirable to issue stock. It would mean that a very large number of people would hold stock of the value of £1 or £2, and the payment of 1s. or 2s. a year interest would involve an enormous amount of clerical work. Under the terms of the prospectus the loan need not be paid off for twenty years. We propose to pay it back really in about seven years—that is, on the 1st June, 1927. We propose to issue to the people, whom it is definitely established have subscribed to the loan, Savings Certificates; to allow the interest to accumulate, and to pay principal and interest off on the 1st day of June, 1927. We think that this is fair to them, that it is in conformity with the spirit of the agreement entered into when the loan was issued, and that in the majority of cases it will be more satisfactory to the people themselves. Once these Certificates have been issued they can be exchanged, and people who want the cash before the Certificates reach maturity will be able to obtain it by transfer, no doubt.

There were two loans issued in America, one on the 1st January, 1921, which realised 5,236,955 dollars. The second American loan was issued in November, 1921, and it, of course, had hardly got started when the Treaty came. That loan realised 622,720 dollars. The total raised in America, therefore, was 5,859,675 dollars. There is at present held up in America and the subject of litigation two million, three hundred thousand odd dollars. There are provisions in connection with the redemption of the American loan which correspond roughly to the requirements of the American prospectus. That is, stock certificates will be issued to those who have subscribed to the loan. Interest will accrue on these stock certificates, and they can be redeemed either at par, or they can be purchased in the market.

There are one or two small points in the Bill which will be the subject of slight amendments in Committee. I need hardly refer to them now, except to say simply that this Bill provides for the discharge of a moral obligation. There are certain assets remaining still, but in any case the country received very good value for this money. There are shares in the National Land Bank, and there are deposits in the name of the Natland Auxiliary Society, which was simply a device that was thought of to make difficult any British action against the Land Bank.

The National Land Bank was formed at a time when an agrarian agitation was arising in some parts of the country, which seemed likely to cut across and to destroy the national movement. Towards the end of 1919 and the beginning of 1920, there was every disposition on the part of people to indulge in what we would now call irregularism. That centred mostly round the desire of people violently to seize land. For the purpose of checking that agitation and of making some arrangement for the purchase and distribution of land the funds which were being raised by the loan were devoted by the Dáil to the establishment of the Land Bank. There had been previously set up a Land Court under the Dáil which arranged for the purchase and for the division of certain estates. By means of the Land Bank the Dáil was able to see that a certain number, at least, of these estates were bought and divided or made available to various small holders and landless men around them. The result of the operations of the Land Court and of the Land Bank undoubtedly was to settle and to calm the agitation which was threatening to disrupt the national movement for independence at the time.

Certain difficulties did arise later on in regard to these purchased estates and the societies that acquired them, because the slump that followed came very heavily on these particular people. At any rate, a very good purpose was served, and the shares in the National Land Bank are certainly a very valuable asset. In addition to that, there are held by this Natland Auxiliary Society something like, I think, £91,000. There are other sums, of which I have not now the amount, in the hands of trustees and others. Apart altogether from the assets that remain out of this loan, which are being brought into the Exchequer, the payment to the subscribers is a moral obligation. These people cast their bread upon the waters, and it is now up to us to see that it returns. I think very few people, certainly only a small number, thought they were making an investment or that money given in this way would come back. Many people at great sacrifice subscribed substantial sums, for people of their means, in order to enable the struggle that was getting under weigh when the Loan was issued to be carried on successfully. If it had not been for the generosity and the faith of the people who subscribed to the Loan there would be no Free State to-day. The struggle could not have been carried on without the financial resources that this Loan provided. It was used as economically and as sparingly as possible by the elected Government of the Irish people of the day. I believe that we have got very good value. It is up to us to return the money, and I think we must all feel now the sense of victory and the sense of achievement that is due, when we are able to pay back what we at one time regarded as an enormous sum, and pay it back without any great stress. One could hardly help casting one's mind back to the time when the Loan was issued, but when we do we realise the enormous advance that has been made, an advance which I think very few people believed or hoped, when they subscribed, would be realised in their generation. However, they did subscribe, and it is due to us to see that they are paid back in accordance with the terms of the prospectus.

Mr. DOLAN: I wish to draw the Minister's attention to Sub-Section 2 of Section 6, and I hope that he will consider an amendment in reference to it on the next Stage. The sub-section states: "Provided that the Minister may postpone the issue of stock certificates under this section until he is satisfied that all moneys subscribed to the External Loans, or either of them, and not duly accounted for have (so far as the same are recoverable) been paid into the Exchequer." My reason in drawing attention to this sub-section is, that there might be a difficulty owing to the way the Loan was handled in America, and owing to the confusion that existed, since the Loan was subscribed. I think the national credit comes in here, and I am convinced that it is due to the Irish nation to recognise our liability to the people who subscribed this money regardless of how it was handled afterwards. The money was subscribed, and I claim that any receipt held in America or abroad from any official acting under Dáil Eireann should be recognised, and that a fresh stock certificate, according to the terms of this section, should be issued against that receipt.

Mr. BLYTHE: The matter Deputy Dolan has dealt with is one that I had in mind when I said that there would be certain amendments on the Committee Stage. I recognise fully that whether the money was lost through the fault of trustees, or whatever happened to the money, the people who subscribed it are entitled to get it back. I believe, even if we were not to get the funds that are in America for a considerable time, we would be able to borrow sufficient to pay off the subscribers there without waiting for the result of the law suit.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read a Second Time; Committee Stage fixed for January 15th.

MINISTERS AND SECRETARIES BILL.

The PRESIDENT: I said a few words last evening with regard to the business we proposed to deal with. Apparently, I must have overlooked the fact that we were mid-way through a section in the Ministers and Secretaries Bill. I would ask the indulgence of the Dáil to take up that section and dispose of it, and then get on with the other business. I do not think it will take very long, but it would be more satisfactory to have the section dealt with than leaving it open for consideration at the next sitting.

It would depend altogether on the indulgence that is given by the Dáil. I addressed myself on this point last evening to Deputy Johnson, and I had no intention of misleading him. If he has no objection, and if the Dáil is agreeable, I think we might get along with that section.

Mr. JOHNSON: I see the point the President has made, and I have no objection to following the course he suggests. I am just reminded, however, that perhaps we should rather deal with the amendments to the section, leaving a final decision on the section until Deputies who have shown their interest in it are here. It occurs to me that possibly Deputies are not here who are interested in this section because of the understanding that this matter would not be dealt with until later. As they have no amendments down, we might deal with the amendments on the Paper and leave the final decision on the section itself over, unless, in the meantime, the Deputies concerned arrive.

Mr. GOREY: We have no objection to having the whole of the section dealt with.

The PRESIDENT: The Deputy who is absent who had an interest in this matter, and who had an amendment down, is Deputy Figgis. It is quite possible that he might return before we reach that stage.

Mr. JOHNSON: I do not press my point.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Would the Dáil agree to take up in Committee the amendments to Section 8 that have been left over, and when we come to put the section, decide then whether it would be better to take it in view of the Deputies then present?

Agreed.

DAIL IN COMMITTEE.

MINISTERS AND SECRETARIES BILL—THIRD STAGE (RESUMED).

SECTION 8.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: There is an amendment in my name to delete sub-Section 1 of Section 8, and my object in putting it down was more or less to get information. As it only means the deletion of the sub-section, and as that sub-section was discussed rather fully, and, to a certain extent, rather acrimoniously yesterday, I think it would be advisable to withdraw the amendment. I, therefore, ask leave of the Dáil to withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. DAVIN: I beg to move the following amendment:—

“In sub-Section (1), lines 56 and 57, to delete the words ‘there shall be and there is hereby constituted a Council of Defence to assist the Minister for Defence,’ and to substitute therefor the words ‘it shall be lawful for the Minister for Defence to establish a Council of Defence to assist him.’”

The amendment is more or less to give the Minister the option of setting up whatever Council or body that he, in his capacity as Minister, may deem advisable, and not, like the section as it stands, compel him to do so, and give the Council a statutory basis, as it gets in the Bill. While it gives the Minister the option of setting up this Council, it does not relieve him of his rightful responsibility to discharge whatever administrative duties may fall to him as Minister for Defence. While it gives him an option to set up the Council, responsibility will rest with him for any Council set up in his name.

General MULCAHY: We are not accepting this amendment. I do not know how it will affect the 4 o'clock civil member who, it is proposed, is to be attached to the Council. In opposing the amendment the principal strength of my opposition would come from the fact that our own experience has suggested to us to have the Council of Defence set up in this particular manner. The experience in other countries has made them adopt this particular type of Council as a systematic piece of organisation in connection with their Defence Department. I mentioned yesterday that the Defence Department is liable to be put under a strain in a time of national emergency that comes to the lot of no other Department to be put under. The foresight in connection with the making of plans, as well as matters of policy, is a matter that requires most careful and systematic consideration. The Defence Department will consist of the heads of a number of administrative departments which are separate from the point of view that they are administered by different heads, and yet they all have to come together for a common purpose. The three military sections will have to come together for the common purpose of armed operations. The fourth member coming in with the Minister gives you a body of five, who have to come together from the point of view of general administration, and all those matters that concern policy, both from the point of view of administration and of action at any particular time. It is a safeguard to the country; it is a safeguard to the Dáil; and it is a safeguard to the Executive Council that they would clearly understand the machinery by which the Minister co-ordinated his policy and his plans for the future of the Department, and that it would not be left to a haphazard Council that might be selected in one way or in another. It should not be left to the Minister at any particular time, as it were, to say to himself that he was of such a nature that he could do all the co-ordinating himself. That would be putting too great a strain, in my opinion, on any particular man, and it would be putting too great a strain on the faith, perhaps, of the Dáil and of the Executive Council in the capacity of one single man. You require the headship to the Army of that particular type of Council of Defence from many points of view. It does not in any way derogate from the responsibility of the Minister, or derogate from the power that it is necessary for him to have because of that responsibility.

The different members of the Council will be men who are selected for their fitness for a particular position. They will change from time to time, but the heads of those Departments will occupy, as well as being heads of their Departments, a statutory position, and will be required to co-ordinate in a systematic way the work of their different Departments for the general and prime function of the Ministry. It would be wrong, therefore, not to say systematically that this Council of Defence will be created in this particular way, and I would urge very strongly that the amendment would not be for the general good of the Ministry or the general security of the State.

ATTORNEY - GENERAL: Without trespassing too far on the indulgence of the Committee, I would add this. It is really repeating what I said last night in answering a question of Deputy Johnson, that a difficulty of this amendment of Deputy Davin's, is that the persons without a statutory constitution in the Council of Defence would be really without any proper definite status. One of the great advantages from the Civil and Parliamentary end in the scheme proposed, is that there will be a Civil member of this body, a member of this Dáil who will have a statutory position. Without the Clause, as it has been inserted in the Bill, such a person would be a mere volunteer invited by the Minister to act on the body. While the Minister will, it is assumed, have more of his time taken up with considering broad questions of policy, the civil member will be charged with authority for a watch over the finance, that is to say, the handling of the money voted by the Dáil for Army purposes, and it is the virtue of the Clause that it gives the civil members, as well as the others, a Statutory position on the body.

Mr. JOHNSON: I am not yet convinced that it is a good thing to set up this Council in this way in this Bill. The Minister has defended it on the ground that it is necessary to give the various nominated members of the Council a statutory position, and rather suggests that it is too much of a responsibility to put upon the Minister, for the time being, the nomination of such a Council—the nomination of the persons to fill the offices, the holding of which offices is to be by statutory authority. The Council is in the hands of the Minister, so the responsibility he says should not be imposed upon him, is in fact imposed upon him. And there is this further consideration, that in a time of war it might be thought well to bring into a Council of Defence some other person who has not been an administrator of an Army Department, and who is deemed to be specially qualified for the purpose of acting on the Council of Defence during a time of war.

That has been the experience in more countries than one, and perhaps even the Minister will recollect something of the kind happening in this country. If you constitute this Council in this way you will be limited to these members named, and you cannot very well go beyond that. You could not, for instance, call in any Minister who might be specially qualified to act as a member of this Council in a time of stress. You might desire to call in, say, the Minister in charge of Industry and Commerce; it might be found desirable to mobilise all the industrial resources of the country, and that that Minister should be a member of this Council, but you are preventing that possibility, except you adopt other statutes or go outside the law altogether. I contend that the appointment of a Council of Defence should be a matter for the Executive Council and the Minister for Defence, and that such a Council should not be set up, especially in this manner, and placed in a position of authority which, I believe, notwithstanding the desire of the Ministry, would dissipate somewhat the Minister's responsibility to the Dáil. The Council of Defence, which is a Council mainly of military men, might well be tempted to say: "We have authority from the Dáil; we are a majority, and notwithstanding the fact that the Minister is the head of this Council, the Oireachtas has placed on us the responsibility, and we will submit our case to them." I contend that while placing this Council in the position in this statutory way, you are inviting them to take a position such as I have suggested, and that the authority of the Minister for Defence is weakened. Therefore, I support the amendment.

General MULCAHY: The work of the Council of Defence is preparation, and as such it ought not to be confused with what you might have in time of war, and which it would be better, perhaps, to call a Council of War. As far as co-operation with the Minister for Industry and Commerce, and other Departments, is concerned, naturally, in considering the development of our Department of Defence, where you are going to rely on the mainspring of our country's resistance to any emergency, you will review the whole of your Departments of State, but the responsibility for having reviewed them and the preparation of your military weapon will be on the Minister for Defence. So that we must not confuse that preparation with the Council of War, and the work of the Council of Defence is work of preparation. The fact that from that particular point of view it is a statutory body would not preclude, in time of emergency, a Council of War of a very different type being specially set up.

ATTORNEY - GENERAL: May I point out, in answer to the suggestion of Deputy Johnson as to any danger of the majority assertion and domination, that if my amendment Number 12, to Sub-Section 5, is adopted, that position would become impossible.

Amendment put and declared lost.

Amendment by Mr. Davin:—

To delete Sub-Section (2) and to substitute therefor as follows:—

“The Minister for Defence shall be Chairman of any Council of Defence established under the next preceding sub-section and shall assign to the Council of Defence and to the several members thereof such of the business of the Department of Defence as he thinks fit and may at any time withdraw, enlarge or redistribute any of his powers so assigned.”

Mr. DAVIN: This is consequential.

Amendment not moved.

Major COOPER: I move: In Sub-Section (2), lines 4 and 5, page 7, to delete the words (“under the style of Commander-in-Chief.”) In doing so, I do not propose to refer to the discussion that we had yesterday. I accept absolutely the President’s statement on the constitutional position. It is quite clear to me that if we have, as we have, power under the Treaty to raise an Army, we must have power to control and command it, and that no amount of special pleading can alter that fact. I propose solely to address myself to the question of whether it is desirable that the offices of Minister for Defence and Commander-in-Chief should be combined in the same person, and I shall address myself to that mainly in considering how such an arrangement has worked in other countries and on the verdict of history, because I think it has been generally held that the functions of Commander-in-Chief and the functions of Minister for Defence are essentially separate. In England the Commander-in-Chief functions under the Secretary of State for War. He existed long before the Secretary of State for War, and it is a peculiar fact that when the Commander-in-Chief in England was not a Royal personage he was invariably an Irishman. It was found after the Secretary of State for War was established that his functions and the functions of the Commander-in-Chief clashed. How was that difficulty met? It was not met by uniting these functions in the same person; it was met by passing the War Office Act of 1870, which definitely subordinated the Commander-in-Chief to the Secretary of State for War. I know that the Attorney-General would like to know my authority. It is Erskine May’s Constitutional History of England in this case. He mentioned yesterday that Lord Kitchener held the two posts, but overlooked two facts. The first was that this was an experiment. It produced enormous confusion, and had Lord Kitchener lived he would have been removed from his post, and although he was a soldier and Minister for War, he did not have the sole Command-in-Chief as is proposed in this section. In France the Minister for War is almost invariably a soldier, but he was never called Commander-in-Chief, and none of the four Commanders-in-Chief the French had during the Great War—Marshal Joffre, General Nivelle, Marshal Foch and General Petain—were Ministers for War. There was always an entirely separate Minister for War, carrying on separate functions.

In the United States, the President is nominally the Commander-in-Chief, but in war they found it in practice desirable to have a Commander-in-Chief, such as Generals Scott, McClelland, and Grant. Both McClelland and Grant had executive functions in the War Office, which were entirely distinct executive functions from that of the Commander-in-Chief. In Canada, according to Constitutional precedent, there is no Commander-in-Chief, but there is a Chief of General Staff, General MacBrien, who is an Irishman. Everywhere we go outside this country I do not think there is a single precedent for combining the functions of Commander-in-Chief and Parliamentary Minister in charge of the Department of War in the same person. As far as I know, there is not, and except for one reason which I shall state later, there is no reason why they should be combined, and there is one very strong reason against it, because, generally speaking, the same kind of man cannot fill the two posts. If the term Commander-in-Chief means anything, it means that the man who will command in time of war will have as high and heavy responsibility as could be placed on the shoulders of any soldier. The qualities necessary in the command of an army are instant decision, readiness to take responsibility, and fearlessness of criticism; and these are not necessarily those that qualify a man to come to the Dáil, answer questions, defend his department, and submit to the give and take of Parliamentary debate. Looking at history, how many famous soldiers could have combined these functions? Julius Caesar could have possibly. He was a party leader, almost a Labour leader, until he was forty years of age, and then he took to soldiering as a second string. Napoleon would preside occasionally at Councils of State, which more or less corresponded to the Seanad, but he always made it clear that he was presiding, and he generally finished the sittings by calling the other members imbeciles. That, perhaps, is not a desirable precedent. The qualities of a great commanding soldier are not usually those of a Parliamentary tactician—

A DEPUTY—What about Wellington?

Major COOPER: Wellington was about the worst Prime Minister England ever had. He sat in the House of Lords and did not ordinarily have the give and take of Parliamentary debate. The qualities that fit a man for command in the field are not the qualities that fit a man for control in the House; there may be exceptions, and one argument is that there is an exception, and that the exceptional qualities of the present Minister are such. I have no intimate knowledge of his work as a soldier, but results speak for themselves. I have knowledge of his ability in the Dáil, but I think we would be making a mistake if on the exceptional qualities of the present Minister we make a rule which will bind us for ever in the future. When our army becomes smaller it may be necessary, and certainly will be desirable, to combine Ministries, and it may be necessary to combine the Ministry of Defence with some other Department. In Southern Rhodesia the same person, I believe, combines the offices of Minister for Defence and Attorney-General. It may be the Attorney-General would not be the most convincing Commander-in-Chief that the Army would require, at all events on mounted occasions, so I think it is a mistake. If my amendment is carried there is nothing to prevent the present Minister for Defence being given the title of Commander-in-Chief by the Executive Council, but I think, unless I hear reasons to the contrary, it would be a mistake to bind ourselves absolutely, that every Minister for Defence in future shall have the title of Commander-in-Chief. That would limit us too closely in selection for that office.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: While the Minister for Defence is recovering from his blushes, may I assume the office of Section Commander. I want to point out one or two facts in relation to the parenthesis in this section. In the first place, the Minister for Defence must be a member of the Dáil. If the Deputy will refer to our Electoral Act he will find that a member of the Dáil cannot be a soldier on active service or on full pay. Consequently, we have it that the Minister for Defence cannot be actually a soldier. If the Deputy refers to the Defence Forces Act, the temporary provisions of which will probably be retained, he will find that the Minister for Defence cannot hold any executive command. He will find that the Command-in-Chief is given under Section 5 of the Defence Forces Act, as follows:—"The Command-in-Chief of and all executive and administrative powers in relation to the forces . . . shall be vested in the Executive Council." The position is that the Command-in-Chief is vested in the Executive Council; but just as the Executive Council is not called collectively Minister for Finance, or is not called collectively Minister for Home Affairs—individuals wear these titles while the body bears a collective responsibility—so the Command-in-Chief is given a personality in the person of the Minister for Defence. His functions as Commander-in-Chief are practically confined, in that capacity, to acting as Chairman of the Defence Council. Consequently, the criticism, which arises from the analogy of actual soldiers holding the combined offices of

[Attorney-General.]

Secretary for War and Commander-in-Chief, really does not apply. Even should a state of war arise, I take it that the executive command in the field would be vested by the Executive Council in some outstanding officer on the active list of the army, who would be chosen for the purpose, as is the case in Switzerland. Therefore, I submit this is no more than rendering personally to an individual, in the same way as is rendered to other Ministers, functions which are vested in the Executive Council, as a whole. In so far, it is only a style, and his functions are limited to Presidency of the Defence Council.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think the statement of the Lawyer-in-Chief helps us to understand what was the intention of the Ministry in inserting this phrase in the Section. I believed, up to yesterday, it was very desirable that this should be deleted, and I was prepared to support in full the amendments put down for the deletion of this parenthesis ("under the style of Commander-in-Chief") but I am of opinion now that the Dáil should quite definitely, by the defeat of this amendment, assert its will in this matter. It should show that it has the right and authority to appoint any person to any office in the army under any title that it may wish to give. The question has been raised and, whether we like it or not, an answer has to be given to that question. It has been given by reference to the Defence Forces Act. But I believe that it is desirable that we should give the answer in a much more emphatic way by deliberately deciding to retain those words in the Sub-section. I hope that the matter will be pressed to a division so that the vote of the Dáil will be clear on it.

Professor O'SULLIVAN: I shall not follow Deputy Cooper in taking up the historical side of this matter. I appreciate the opening statement of Deputy Cooper, and I am sure we all appreciate the Deputy's speech. After what occurred yesterday, does he think it practically possible to dissociate what we do to-day with what occurred yesterday? On several occasions Deputy Cooper has put it up to the Government that they are too little inclined to consult public opinion. I would ask him now to consult the views of the ordinary person outside. I think those who were present at yesterday's debate will be convinced that a great deal of it was intended more for the people outside the Dáil than for the people inside. Consequently, I will ask Deputy Cooper to consult public opinion outside so far as not to press this amendment. I do not think it is possible to dissociate this amendment from yesterday's debate. The only other point that I should desire to make is that I think in Deputy Cooper's speech there is noticeable an attempt that I have noticed in other sections of this Bill in connection with Parliamentary Secretaries, to assume that the principal duty of the Secretary to a Minister is to be present at debates and to make clever answers. Personally I think that is only portion of the work of a Minister or Secretary. I will, therefore, ask Deputy Cooper not to press the amendment.

Major COOPER: I assure Deputy O'Sullivan that I put down this amendment three weeks ago, and I had no idea that any such arguments as were used yesterday would be made. I was thinking much more of the army than I was thinking of the Dáil. I thought it was a bad thing to say to a young officer who was beginning his career: "You shall work hard at your profession and attend courses and study the way of foreign armies, but you shall never, under any circumstances, become Commander-in-Chief. The most you can rise to is Chief of the General Staff. If you forsake your vocation, and come into the Dáil and speak here only when you are told to speak, then you may become Commander-in-Chief of the Army." I am personally, as regards this amendment, in the hands of the Dáil. I stand between Deputy O'Sullivan, who wishes me to withdraw, and Deputy Johnson, who asks me to press the amendment to a division. I am willing to take Deputy O'Sullivan's advice, and I will not press it to a division. I am not going to put the Dáil to the pain of registering a foregone conclusion. What I propose to do is to allow the question to be put. I personally would prefer to withdraw it, but if it is thought desirable that the Dáil should have an opportunity of definitely expressing its opinion, after what took place yesterday, I am prepared to afford that opportunity.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: My name is down for a similar amendment. I should like to say that when I put down that amendment I had no idea that an amendment of a similar type would provoke the acrimonious discussion that took place yesterday. I was not animated by the ideas that animated some of the Deputies who spoke yesterday. I was a little bit puzzled as to the intentions of the clause. I could not quite understand why the Minister for Defence could not preside at the Council of Defence as Minister for Defence, and I could not understand why he was asked to preside under the title of Commander-in-Chief.

Having heard the lucid explanations of the Attorney-General and the Minister for Defence, I am quite prepared to follow Deputy Cooper's lead, or any other lead which would have the effect of removing any ill-feeling which may result from the debate of yesterday.

Amendment put.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The amendment is lost by the unanimous vote of the Committee.

Major COOPER: Amendment 6, which is in my name, reads: "In Sub-Section (2), page 7, line 6, to delete the word 'four' and to substitute therefor 'three.'" Both that and the following amendment are really bound together. They were put down because at the time I had not seen the Attorney-General's amendment, and I thought it very undesirable to stereotype a Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for Defence as part of our Constitutional system. The time may come when the Army will be only ten or twelve thousand strong. The Attorney-General has an amendment later on which meets the case. If he gives me some explanation which will allow me to withdraw my amendment, I shall be very glad to do so.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: My amendment is intended to provide that there shall be a civil member of the Defence Council and if circumstances require—but not of necessity—he may be Parliamentary Secretary. It may be that at the moment it would be, as the President has said, an economy to have a paid Parliamentary Secretary as a civil member of that Council, charged with looking after the very large amount of money which is handled by the Army Department. It may be that in a year or so that responsibility will have so far contracted that a member of the Dáil will be happy to attend to the matter without a stipend. The effect of my amendment is to provide that a member of the Dáil shall be added to the Council, and that he may be Parliamentary Secretary.

Major COOPER: That, I think, meets my case, and I am agreeable to withdrawing the amendment. I should like to point out that the arrangements for dealing with correspondence in the Ministry of Defence very urgently need the attention of somebody. I would be prepared to agree to the appointment of a Parliamentary Secretary for a year or three years, but I do not want him as a stereotyped part of our constitutional machinery.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment: "In Sub-Section (2), page 7, lines 8 to 13, to delete the words 'that is to say, a civil member being the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for Defence who shall be responsible to the Ministry of Defence for the finance of the Military Defence Forces and for so much of the other business of the Council of Defence as may be from time to time allotted to him by the Minister for Defence, and'" (Deputy Cooper), not moved.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move the following amendment, which has the effect that I have just stated:—

In Sub-Section (2), page 7, line 9, to delete the words "the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for Defence" and insert in lieu thereof "a member of Dáil Eireann," and in line 10 to delete the words "Ministry of " and to substitute therefor the words " Minister for " and in line 13, after the word " Defence " to insert the words " and who shall act as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for Defence."

[Attorney-General.]

Amendment put and agreed to.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: I move:

After sub-section (2) to insert a new sub-section as follows:—

The military members of the Council of Defence shall not by virtue of their office as members of the Council of Defence receive any special remuneration in addition to the salaries attached to their rank."

My object in putting down this amendment was for the purpose of gaining information. I notice there is no specific reference to remuneration for members of the Council of Defence. I would like to hear from the Minister or the Attorney-General if there will be any special remuneration in addition to the ordinary pay which will go with the rank of the officers constituting the Council.

General MULCAHY: Their pay will be the pay which goes with their offices as Administrative Officials such as Chief of Staff, Adjutant-General and Quartermaster-General. They do not receive any additional remuneration because of the fact that they will be persons who will act on the Defence Council.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: In view of that explanation, I withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment: " to delete sub-section (3) " (Liam O'Daighim) not moved.

Mr. JOHNSON: I move: " In sub-section (5), lines 29 and 30, to delete the words " military " and " respectively."

This raises the question of at whose pleasure will the non-military members of this Council hold office. The sub-section reads: " The military members of the Council of Defence shall respectively hold that office at the pleasure of the Minister for Defence." We are asked to say that the members shall respectively hold that office at the pleasure of the Minister. Does that mean that the holders of this office may be dismissed from being members of the Council for Defence? If so, then we are arriving at a position in which the Minister shall be responsible for appointing members of the Council, irrespective of the offices that they hold.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: If I may be allowed to interrupt, I would direct attention to the next amendment, which I would urge the Minister to accept. If it were accepted, the sub-section would then read: " The military members of the Council for Defence shall respectively hold that office at the pleasure of the Executive Council, acting upon the recommendation of the Minister for Defence."

Mr. JOHNSON: That would meet my point.

Mr. ALTON: The term " respectively " seems to have no meaning there, and to be superfluous.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: If the deletion of it makes better English, in that respect, I humbly defer to the University Deputies.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I feel that we will have to treat amendments 11 and 12 as not moved, and allow somebody to delete sub-section (5) and insert a new sub-section.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move that sub-section 5 be deleted and a new sub-section be inserted as follows:

" Each of the Members of the Council of Defence shall hold that office at the pleasure of the Executive Council acting upon the recommendation of the Minister."

Question put and agreed to.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That disposes of Amendment 13 as well.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: It practically does, except my amendment does not contain the words " on the recommendation of the Minister." I do not think, however, it makes any vital difference, so I shall not move it.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Amendment 13 not moved.

Mr. NAGLE: My amendment No. 14, is to delete Sub-section (6); but Amendment No. 12 has made a change, and this and the promise of the Minister for Defence, made, I think, yesterday, to insert after the word "responsible" in line 33, the words "collectively responsible to the Minister for Defence for all matters entrusted to it," meets my point, and I shall not, therefore, move the amendment.

Amendment No. 14 not moved.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I move in Sub-section (6), line 33, after the word "responsible" to insert the words "to the Minister for Defence."

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Sub-section would then read: "The Council for Defence shall meet and act as a collective body and shall be collectively responsible to the Minister for Defence for all matters entrusted to it in its collective capacity whether by an Act of the Oireachtas or otherwise."

Amendment agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: I move that the Section, as amended, be added to the Bill. In making that motion I have to take into consideration the suggestion made by Deputy Johnson that we might defer the Section to a later date, but I have also to take into consideration the fact that the Section was the subject of an amendment which would delete the whole of it. That amendment was defeated, and, generally speaking, I might say, there has been substantial agreement in the House with regard to the acceptance, not alone of the spirit, but of the letter, of the Section. I do not think that if it were postponed we would receive further amendments with regard to it, or that any amendment proposed would materially alter the substance or matter of the Section, and perhaps the Deputy would reconsider his attitude and allow it to pass now.

Mr. JOHNSON: I do not press the matter at all. It occurred to me, when I made the suggestion, that there may be a grievance because of the understanding late last night, and while I take note of that, and it ought to be taken note of, I recognise again that we are now in the Committee Stage and that the whole work of the Committee will have to be reported to the Dáil and can be dealt with on that occasion.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I think the Deputy who moved to delete the Section could not now speak on the question "that the Section as amended stand part of the Bill" without repeating himself; and the amendments passed, I think, if I recollect the discussion aright, go towards satisfying some of the difficulties the Deputy found to the Section itself, so I do not think there is any injustice. I will take the motion "that the Section as amended stand part of the Bill."

Question put and agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: I move to report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Agreed.

DAIL RESUMES.

Progress reported, Committee to sit again on 16th January, 1924.

PRIVATE BUSINESS. TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS BILL.—SECOND STAGE (RESUMED).

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The debate on the question "that this Bill be now read a Second time," which was continued yesterday, was further adjourned to to-day, on the motion of Deputy Gorey.

Mr. GOREY: My contribution to the debate will be as short as I can make it. I understand the Government are anxious that this matter should be got through this evening, so I shall endeavour to facilitate them as much as I can. During the debate I heard it said, and it was news to me, that we have 170 Directors attempting to administer the railways in the Saorstát. That appears to me an extraordinary state of affairs amounting almost to a scandal. A line was instanced in Scotland with the same amount of capital that is ruled by 7 or 11 Directors—it does not matter which. Speaking as a member of the public I think it would be a good thing if we had some means, whether by unification or grouping or some other system, which would do away with these 170 Directors and reduce them down to something reasonable. I say that as a member of the public, and I will go further, and say as a small shareholder, that in the interests of the shareholders it is about time to remove a considerable amount of these parasites off the backs of the ordinary stockholders.

Deputy Davin last evening, in dealing with this question of railway nationalisation, gave me, and the Party to which I belong, as much space in his speech as he did the subject matter of the Bill. He gave us a history of the elections down in Leix and Offaly, but that history was as remarkable for what it omitted as for what it contained. He told us we had three candidates and that we only polled 5,400, but he never mentioned the fact that there were two other farmers' candidates in the field, and that we were fighting amongst ourselves. Neither did he mention the previous election at which he polled something like 15,000 votes, while at the last election he only polled 6,000. I think when giving us the history of the elections, in Leix and Offaly, he had a right to give us all the history. His statement yesterday evening was so exaggerated and so inaccurate, with regard to things that I happen to know, that it left me in considerable doubt. I doubt very much, judging from what I know, and hearing his statement with regard to the things I know, the accuracy of his statements in regard to the things I do not know anything at all about. He said something about taking ships at the port here of Dublin for three months and then handing them back to English companies.

I do not know why we have so much mention of English companies, and of English this, that and the other thing. These boats were always the property of the company that owned them, and after we had used them they still remained the property of the company that owned them. We never owned the boats at all, and if they went back to an English company, they went back to the people who owned them. This matter of introducing mention of English companies appears to me to be done in much the same spirit as the mention, last evening, of the English King. It is done to mislead, and in an effort to throw mud. When I was listening to the Deputy last evening, the impression left on my mind was that I was listening to a platform politician and not to a statement of facts. When a man refers to either English or Irish, I would prefer if his references had relation to efficiency, integrity and honesty, and that the references were not made merely for the purpose of calling attention to where a man or a company came from. When I hear a man going about and saying, this is an Irish company, or this is an Irish firm, or an Irish invention, when I hear him prefacing his remarks in that way, I begin to think that I am dealing with a rogue who is trading on nationality as against merit. That sort of talk is not argument at all, and I think we ought to have done with beating that old drum. In fact, I thought it was beaten to death long ago.

Deputy Davin last evening referred to a speech of mine made in reply to the Governor-General's Address. He appeared to express a pious horror at my view point, which was, that it was the duty of the people themselves, or the duty of the Government of the country, to see that industrial disputes between two parties were not allowed to exercise a stranglehold on the whole life and trade of the country. That, of course, may be a matter of absolute indifference to Deputy Davin and his people, but it is not a matter of absolute indifference to the rest of the community. Why, I ask, because of these disputes, should they be left hungry, or their produce be allowed to rot on the land? As I say, that may not be a concern of Deputy Davin, but it is a matter of vital concern to the community as a whole. It may be a matter of very little concern to the community generally what the merits of these disputes are; what concerns the people is to be able to live, to avoid loss as much as possible, and to preserve the life of the nation. I do not think it was the duty of the people to sit quietly for months and see their produce rotting, to see their children hungry or to be obliged to suffer all the inconvenience, hardship and loss caused by strikes here in Dublin, where the point at issue was whether a man should be paid 15/- a day or 16/-. I think if Deputy Davin took into account the human element involved in these disputes, that he need not be surprised at the determination of the people of this country to find an outlet for themselves, independent altogether of the parties to these disputes. Unless the people were imbeciles or sots they certainly should take steps to provide for themselves.

If the Government of the country is going to govern in the interests of the people of the country, they

5 o'clock. will set up an organisation to secure that no section of the people shall be victimised while some parties are engaged settling their disputes on a question, perhaps, as to whether a docker in Dublin is to be paid 15/- a day or 16/- a day.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Is the Deputy aware of the matter under discussion?

Mr. GOREY: I am aware of the matter under discussion, but I am also aware, with all respect, of the speech which the Deputy delivered here last evening, and I have that in mind now.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I had not the pleasure of hearing Deputy Davin yesterday evening, but I desire to remind Deputy Gorey that he has not touched upon this Bill yet.

Mr. DAVIN: On a point of explanation, I wish to say that when speaking last evening I quoted the exact words, which Deputy Gorey used, from the Official Report, and I do not think the Deputy can take exception to that.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I am not going to go into that. The question now is, whether this Bill should be read a second time.

Mr. GOREY: It was because of references the Deputy made in his speech last evening that I alluded to these matters. Deputy Johnson, when introducing this Bill, said: "This, I may tell the Dáil, is not a Bill which fulfils all the equities, as I would conceive them.

It is very generous in its interpretation of the rights of stockholders. It is such a Bill as might, without any stretch of imagination, have been introduced by Deputy Hewat combined with Deputy Gorey. It is not, as I say, a Bill which fulfils all the equities as I conceive them, but it is a Bill designed to secure general support. Certainly such a Bill as I would like to see enacted would require a considerable period of education of the public, and the circumstances of the day do not justify, perhaps, experiments of a kind which might be risky." [Official Reports 23rd November, 1923, p. 1198.]

I would like to know really what Deputy Johnson would have in his Bill if his idea of equities had full play. I think he had a right to take us into his confidence and give us a rough outline of what he would do if the thin end of the wedge, which this Bill represents, gets any kind of an effective foothold. The Bill, he said, did not fulfil the equities as he conceived them. It is a pity he did not tell us how much further he would have gone. One of the reasons, I take it, why this Bill has been introduced is that the State would be a preferable master to a Company. From our experience of public bodies we have learned this, that they have always been more liberal employers than private Companies. Public bodies, such as County Councils, have always been very liberal in their terms of employment. That is not to be wondered at, especially in recent years, when a good many of these employers, in their capacity as representatives on public boards, are absolutely irresponsible. They contribute nothing whatever to the rates. Therefore they can easily be liberal in their terms of employment. Some of the County Councils, and other public bodies throughout the country, have reached the stage now that they are almost semi-State controlled, and they are anything but a credit or a tribute to efficiency or economy.

I would like to tell the Dáil my conception of the real reason. The real reason is that the present enormous freights and passenger charges must be radically reduced, not by ten or twenty per cent., but by a different percentage altogether. To meet this inevitable reduction, money must be found somewhere, if the present overhead charges are to continue. The real reason is that the revenue of the railway companies in future will not be sufficient to carry the present overhead charges, and that the money of the State is needed to subsidise the earnings of the companies. The help of the Central Fund is needed in order to continue to pay the present rate of wages, to keep the eight-hour day in force, and to keep the present staffs employed. We have been told about efficiency, better service, and all the rest. It would shorten this debate considerably had we been told the real reason at first.

With regard to the terms offered, a comparison has been made with the recent Land Act, and that comparison was very much enlarged upon by Deputy Johnson. Deputy Cooper also alluded to this basis of purchase, and Deputy Davin, I think, further emphasised it. It strikes me that these Deputies, whatever they may know about railways, do not know very much about the land question. I am not surprised at Deputies Davin and Johnson, but I am surprised at Deputy Cooper. Let us take the position of the railways. The companies bought the lands and constructed the railways. Therefore, they have a proper and just right to their property. What comparison is there with land or homesteads? I will not go into the question of whether the landlords bought the sites of our Irish homesteads or not. That is rather too old a question now. When we did not consider that matter before passing the last Land Act, it is a bit late now to talk about how the landlords came into possession of the land. We will, however, talk about who erected the homesteads and the other property on the land. Did the landlords erect the homesteads or the fences? Did they carry out the drainage and provide access to the holdings? Did they sustain the fertility of the soil? In ninety-nine per cent. of cases the landlords did nothing. I am wrong in saying that the landlords did nothing. They did. They levelled the homesteads over considerable tracts of country. I apologise to the landlords for making that mistake.

I will not now discuss the Land Act terms, or whether the price given to the landlords was fair or not. I hope, however, that the Minister for Agriculture will remember who levelled the homes on the untenanted land of the country, and see that the cost of the erection of the new ones is charged to those who levelled the old ones. There is no comparison whatsoever between land purchase and State purchase of railways. The landlords' interest is more than fairly met in the terms of the Land Act. What is the price of the tenants' interest in Irish land? That interest has been going on and has been growing for years. The railway companies own both interests. Do the terms of this Bill, based on the price of the landlords' interest, meet the tenants' interest and the landlords' interest? There is no sensible or fair comparison, even according to the equities that Deputy Johnson referred to. This Bill, Deputy Johnson tells us, does not give us the expression of his mind. I would like to get the real expression of his mind, his line of thought, and what he would do if he had a free hand. This is a child of compromise—a child of opportunity! Deputy Davin tells us that to meet dividends, recently, the companies had to draw on Government subsidies.

Mr. DAVIN: Tax-payers' money.

Mr. GOREY: I do not know anything about the honesty or dishonesty of the companies' balance sheets. That is a question Deputy Davin could have raised in another way. If he had chosen to charge the companies with issuing dishonest balance sheets, or with dishonest administration, there were other occasions to do it. We should not imagine, when we are dealing with this Bill, that we have the real article. This is only a pussy cat, but it might grow into a lion cub and become very dangerous to the community. This Bill is the beginning of nationalisation and of socialisation. Before we take a step in that direction we ought to be very careful where the road leads to. I listened very attentively to Deputy Davin, and his remarks in reference to matters that I am acquainted with were so exaggerated that they were almost inaccurate. However, I believe a good deal of what he has stated. I believe that if we cannot subscribe to nationalisation—which I certainly do not—that it is time for the Government to map out a bold policy in connection with the railways, in order to remove the present scandal and the inefficiency that exists. I believe if it were a question of benefit to a company or shareholders as against loss of a directorship, that most of the directors would choose the loss to the shareholders and retain the directorship.

Mr. P. J. EGAN: I have read with a great deal of care, with a great deal of interest, and, I must admit, with a considerable amount of sympathy, the Bill which Deputy Johnson has placed before the Dáil, in reference to the nationalisation of the railways, and dealing with the transport problem of the country in general. I think that we owe a debt of gratitude to Deputy Johnson for the introduction of this Bill which, with all its faults and demerits, and they are many, will, at any rate, have the advantage of focussing public opinion upon what I consider to be one of the most vital problems in connection with the general agricultural and commercial prosperity of the country. Deputy Johnson, in introducing the Bill, said: "I want to say that it is not put forward in deference to any pre-conception regarding nationalisation or State ownership, or collectivism or anything of the kind."

took the Chair at this stage.

Mr. EGAN: I felt at a loss to understand why such an enthusiastic advocate of railway nationalisation as Deputy Johnson is, should find it necessary to dissemble his love for his Bill, because whatever preconceptions he might have had when he approached it first, in the course of the preparation of his Bill he certainly did succeed in educating himself into a very considerable enthusiasm for his subject. With regard to the question of railway nationalisation in general, I may say that at one time it was a question to which I gave a considerable amount of study, and I must admit frankly it is a subject to which I am very considerably attracted. I go further and say that I believe it is quite probable that eventually some form of State nationalisation will be found necessary. I wish to emphasise the word "eventually," because nationalisation of railways is, I think, a matter that should be approached by slow degrees and by steps. I think Deputy Johnson himself, in the course of his remarks, when introducing the Bill, did use the word "eventually."

No one who has really studied the railway system of this country can for a moment hold that it is a perfect system, that it is a system which fits in with the needs of either the agricultural or commercial community, or that it has for its object any serious intention of trying to develop the natural resources of the country. In criticising the railway system of the country I would like to lay stress on the fact that I do not criticise the personnel of the railways, the directors or the management. I do criticise the system. It is the system is wrong. There are various characteristics of the railway situation which might be referred to, and Deputies on the other side of the Dáil have dwelt considerably on some of them. To my mind one of the outstanding features of the railway situation is the fact that the railways of the country are undoubtedly over-capitalised; that there is a good deal of watered capital. One has to go back a considerable time to find a cause for that. Probably the greatest cause of the over-capitalisation of the railways of the country was the tremendous sums of money which were paid originally for acquiring the land upon which they were built, and the tremendous sums of money which the Bills themselves cost when promoted in Parliament, as well as various other extravagances and abuses which cropped up in the forties and fifties when a lot of the railways were built.

Reference has been made to the number of directors, and unquestionably nobody can logically maintain that 170 directors could conceivably be necessary for running the railways in such a small country as Ireland. I am aware that amongst these directors are men identified with some of the biggest commercial interests in the country, and that they are men who have made their mark in very many commercial ventures of their own. The system by which the railways of the country are run primarily in order to earn dividends for shareholders, rather than for the purpose of developing the resources of the country as a whole, is wrong. Although a certain number of these directors have undoubted commercial experience, I am afraid it must be admitted, with very great respect to them, that very few of them have any actual railway experience whatever. Accordingly, many of them hold the position by virtue of having made their mark in other spheres of the commercial world. One of the greatest grievances that I personally have against the railways is that concerning the preferential rate. That is a matter I feel very strongly about indeed, and it is one that affects nearly every trader and nearly every farmer in this country. By the preferential rate I mean one by which people send goods from the other side into Ireland and are able to send their goods at a far cheaper rate than people can send goods from one part of Ireland to another. I am not going to worry the Dáil with figures. Deputy Davin, in the course of the very able speeches he made on this matter, gave a good many but it would be very easy to multiply them ad infinitum.

I think, on the whole, that Deputy Johnson and the Labour Deputies have, to give them their due, established a fair prima facie case for some sort of eventual railway nationalisation. There are, of course, a good many faults in the Bill.

It has to be remembered that various Commissions have inquired into the railway situation in Ireland and that at least two of them, to my knowledge, have pronounced in favour of State nationalisation. I do not want to refer at great length to the success of State railways in other countries, but it is undoubtedly a fact that in nearly every other country there is some form of State railway or State control. There are two notable exceptions—and I admit they are notable—England and America. So far as I am concerned, I am satisfied that there is, as I have said, a good prima facie case for some form of eventual nationalisation.

I wish to refer to the terms of purchase of the railways, and in that connection it is a very curious thing that, although we have heard a good many speeches from the promoters of the Bill in reference to railway nationalisation, and although sundry red-covered books have been quoted with which I am familiar, it has not been mentioned that all these books refer to the fact that there is at present on the Statute Book of the English Parliament an Act brought in by Sir Robert Peel's Parliament enabling the Government to take over the railways on the basis of twenty-five years' purchase of three years' average profits prior to the time of being taken over. It was a very remarkable fact, though perhaps it was not so very remarkable, that no reference was made to Sir Robert Peel's Railway Act enabling the State to buy over the railways. I suppose the explanation was that the provision regarding twenty-five years was a little difficult to stomach. Contrasting Peel's terms of purchase with those of Deputy Johnson, I am afraid the unfortunate shareholder has not any particular reason to congratulate himself upon the generosity of the terms offered by Deputy Johnson. A great deal has been made of the analogy of the Land Act, but I do not believe that there is any analogy at all. It must be remembered when the original shareholders put up capital to build the railways they did so under the protection of an Act of Parliament, and it is not right to take from the successors of those original shareholders part of the money subscribed under the protection of the State. I do not think that that is a procedure which would stand in common fairness. Deputy Johnson in this Bill says that Section II. constitutes a railway tribunal to consist of three persons who will determine the terms of purchase. The tribunal would be appointed by the Executive Council. The Chairman must have held high judicial office, and the other two Commissioners would be qualified accountants, one of whom would be appointed after consultation with the railway companies. In other words, the unfortunate railway shareholders would find themselves in a distinct minority and would have very little voice as to the terms upon which their property is to be taken over. What is the particular object of appointing a railway tribunal to deal with the terms of purchase when you immediately tie their hands and tell them that they are to buy at fifteen years' purchase? I think any fair-minded person will admit that there is a vast difference between fifteen and twenty-five years' purchase.

Deputy Johnson, in his address in introducing the Bill, also referred to the particular class of certificate which the various kind of stockholders will be given. He says: "It is intended that railway stock will be issued by the State in exchange for present holdings, the stock being either in the form of redeemable stock certificates carrying $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. or terminable annuity certificates carrying $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for the first five years and $4\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. for sixty-seven years."

Now, with regard to that, and looking upon it from the shareholder's point of view, it is utterly immaterial what particular class of certificate he gets in exchange for his property once you have determined that he is to be bought out under a definite number of years purchase. Fifteen years purchase are the terms he is getting, and the particular class of stock certificate which he is going to get makes no difference to him as he is getting fifteen years purchase and no more. All this talk about different kinds of certificates really amounts to a certain amount of exuberant verbosity. It means nothing so far as the pockets of the unfortunate shareholder are concerned. Now, although this Bill deals mainly with railway nationalisation, there is one Section, the very last one, which gives me a considerable amount of food for thought. I refer to Section 48 which "enables the Executive Council to transfer to the Minister the powers of any Department of State in reference to transport and communication, and requires him to consider the present position of such services, the facilities provided thereby, and the possibilities of their further development, extension and co-ordination in conjunction with the railways and postal services, as part of the national system of transport and communication services and shall submit to the Oireachtas a report thereon." I am sorry that Deputy Johnson and the speakers who followed him did not explain that Section more fully. All the rest of the Bill practically deals with railways, but this particular Section opens up an extraordinary vista of possibilities. It seems to be like legislation on a somewhat wholesale scale—road, motor, aerial and other transport and communication services—in fact Deputy Johnson wants to nationalise the atmosphere. Although I am in considerable sympathy with the general principle of nationalisation, I think it is a case in which we should hasten slowly and it is because I would like to see railway nationalisation started on a decent footing, and with a reasonable chance of success and with everything in its favour, I cannot see my way, in spite of my strong predilections towards nationalisation of railways, to vote for this Bill.

Furthermore, it must be admitted that there has been an enormous amount of legislation put through this Dáil. The legislative pace has been rather hot, and unless we are careful, the country will suffer from legislative indigestion. I think that measures of this kind, which affect the material interests of the country to such a vital extent, should be thought out very carefully, and I believe the first step in the preparation of the country for an ultimate scheme of nationalisation should be some form of unification or co-ordination of all the existing railways. There are undoubtedly too many railways, and there should be one definite co-ordinated policy. I sincerely hope in the near future the Government will tackle the railway situation in some fashion or another, and prepare the ground for eventual nationalisation, but I shall vote against this Bill.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Deputy Egan is to be congratulated on the fact that he is one of the very few speakers against this measure who has kept in mind the motion before the Dáil. Most of the others were inclined to get off the rails a bit. We are engaged in the Second

[Mr. O'Connell.]

Stage of the Transport and Communications Bill. It is a fact, according to our Standing Orders, that the debate must be confined to the general principles involved in the measure before the Dáil. Before Deputies make up their minds as to how they should vote, therefore, they should address themselves to finding out the general principle involved in the measure on which they are to vote. It seems to me quite clear that the general principle involved in this measure which we are now discussing is whether or not it is a good thing that all the available means of transport should be acquired by the State and owned and controlled and directed by the State. That is the principle involved, and the ways and means by which that is to be brought about seem to me to be details. Deputy O'Mahony spoke of this measure being something equivalent to confiscation. The question of confiscation does not arise. The principle of State purchase, and the rights of property stockholders are a portion of this measure.

Mr. O'MAHONY: State purchase on certain stated terms.

Mr. O'CONNELL: That is the point I wish to draw attention to.

Mr. O'MAHONY: One is the complement of the other.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Those responsible for introducing the Bill have given the Dáil an idea of what they think reasonable terms considering all the circumstances. It is not they who have the decision of those terms. It is for the Dáil to decide whether a maximum of 15 years' purchase is a proper and fair maximum, whether another maximum should be fixed, or whether there should be any maximum. The principle involved is State Purchase. The terms are matters of detail and are not involved in this stage of the Bill. What is involved is the extension of a principle which has already been admitted and is already in practice. Deputy Gorey spoke of getting in the thin end of the wedge or giving the wedge a foot-hold. Apart from the fact that wedges have not feet, the thin end of the wedge is in already. Some forms of transport are protected by the State. Some are controlled by municipal authorities, and some are the property of private individuals, concerns and companies. If those who are opposing this principle of nationalisation were to be consistent, they would argue that the Post Office should revert to private enterprise or to private trading concerns, or that the roads of the country should be handed over to private companies who would run them and charge people who travelled on the roads a toll for the benefit that would accrue by travelling on them. That appears to me to be the consistent attitude of those opposing the principle of nationalisation to take up. The opposition to nationalisation arises principally from preconceived notions. We have in this country the knack of fixing on shibboleths and setting them up as gods to be worshipped or demons to be dreaded. We have the god of private enterprise, for instance. There are some people who seem to think of it in terms no less than if it were deserving of worship. We had an instance on the other side the other day. I think it was the Minister for Agriculture, in speaking of some proposal in connection with a meat factory, who said "Socialism." That clinched the argument. We all felt our flesh creep when that term was used. It is the same with Deputy O'Mahony in connection with nationalisation and Bolshevism.

Mr. O'MAHONY: Deputy Johnson used the expression "Bolshevism."

Mr. O'CONNELL: We conjured up in our minds the leader of the Labour Party, stalking through the land with a dagger in his teeth and a pistol in each hand, thirsting for the blood of Deputy O'Mahony. We are more afraid of an abstract idea than the reality. It is enough for some people to mention the word "nationalisation" to set them against it.

Private enterprise, socialism and nationalism are either good or bad according to whether they make for the good of the community or are detrimental to it. There are forms of private enterprise that not only should not be encouraged, but should not be tolerated, as the Minister for Home Affairs would, no doubt, tell us. The very progress of civilisation is a getting away from private enterprise of one kind or another. I suppose primitive man was the greatest exponent of private enterprise, and then we have also had the family and the tribe. Progress and civilisation mark the subordination of self, of individualism, to the good of the community as a whole. We hear a good deal from time to time—and such talk is fashionable—of the inefficiency of State-managed enterprises. It is fashionable to believe that the State as a body can do nothing efficiently, and it is equally fashionable to believe that if a body of businessmen had to do the work of the State they would do it very much more efficiently than those engaged on it could. As I say, that is only really a fashion, just as it is a fashion for us to think that our political opponents, on all occasions, are the last word in scoundrelism of every shade. What are the facts? The State does its business—and perhaps this is the cause—under the fierce rays of the searchlight of public opinion and criticism. I have often wondered if the same searchlight were turned on some of our private concerns and enterprising companies would it not reveal inefficiency to a much greater extent even than in the case of State enterprises. One dare not say the things about the ordinary private concern that one can say against the State; we would be all up for libel. To my mind there are no essential reasons why a State-managed business should not be carried on as successfully and as efficiently as the business carried on by private enterprise.

It seems to me, too, that if we take this question of transport and communication what we should keep in mind is, what is the object to be served and whether the first object of the existence and maintenance of railways is to make a profit for the shareholders or serve the interest of the public as a whole. And if we can agree that the first and the main object should be the good of the community as a whole, then I think there can be no question whatsoever as to whether the railways should be owned and controlled by the State or left in the possession and subject to the control of private individuals or companies, because there is no doubt that the body most likely to work the railways for the benefit of the community is the State. Under private control the object is to secure a maximum of profit with a minimum of efficiency and with the least possible concern for the interests of the public. I think in the other case the position would be reversed, that while the object would be to make the railways a self-supporting concern, at least the main object would be to serve the interests of the community as a whole.

We heard a good deal about preferential rates. We heard that goods could be sent more cheaply from districts in Ireland to districts in England than they could be sent from point to point in Ireland. I think it is most important for this country that the point we should keep most in mind is its internal development, and facilities for sending goods from point to point in Ireland and within Ireland, and not so much for sending them from parts of Ireland to England or getting them from districts in England to Ireland. Certainly the prime consideration should be the development of internal communications. We all know that in the past this was not the prime consideration, and it received indeed very little consideration at all from the companies.

There is another point in this connection. We must consider the whole community as an entity. If we did not, then the interests of those most favourably situated would be the interests which would receive most favourable consideration. Take the Post Office, for instance. If the Post Office was run purely as a business enterprise it would never think of delivering letters down in Connemara, or in the Dingle Peninsula, because the cost of delivery would be prohibitive compared with Dublin or Cork. But people who live in these out-of-the-way districts have rights, too, and their rights must be looked after. I suppose if education were run on a purely commercial basis you would never think of establishing a school in Inishoffin, Arranmore, Tory Island, and these places. Similarly, if railways were to be run purely for the purpose of making a profit many of the railways at present in existence would be closed down because they are non-paying concerns.

The objections which have been put up seem to be pre-conceived, objections to the terms, or perhaps it is the conservative objection to a change of any kind that we have in Ireland. This may be exemplified by the statement made by, I think, Deputy O'Mahony, that the devil he knows is preferable to the devil he does not know. If it would not be unparliamentary I might ask him how the devil does he know. We do not know. But in any case none of us are satisfied, as Deputy Egan says, with the devil we do know. The other devil might be quite a beneficent chap and I doubt if he could be a much worse devil.

We heard, too, of the injury to the stockholders, but as I pointed out, that is a matter of detail. In any case, I think that the stockholder would be making a good bargain if he exchanged for a certainty something that is now extremely uncertain and perhaps in some cases does not exist at all. As against that we have all the advantages which arise from unified control, and I think nearly everyone who spoke referred to the advantages which would come from the unification of the railways. We would have more economical working; we would get rid of all these overhead charges referred to by Deputy Davin, and this overlapping and waste of effort—for there is waste of effort undoubtedly—and we would have all the advantages that arise from competition without the disadvantages due to waste of effort and overlapping.

Deputy Hewat made one statement which, coming from him, seemed to me to be rather surprising in this connection. He was not satisfied with the railways any more than anyone else, and his suggestion was that if the railways were not giving satisfaction the traders of the locality concerned should set up a means of transport for themselves. I think that the traders of Loughrea, or Roscommon, or Claremorris, would put up with a good deal of inconvenience from the railways before they would set about establishing a fleet of motor cars to transport their goods.

Mr. HOGAN: So they do.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Well, if they do they should not be asked to do it. Traders should not be put to that trouble or expense owing to the unreasonable action of the railway company. We have had various comparisons between State-owned railways and privately-owned and managed railways. I do not think it is really possible to make any comparison worth taking into account, because the circumstances of each individual railway are different. It may be the case that in some countries where you have the two kinds of railways, and I believe it is the case, that the State took over the least satisfactory railways, or those that were in outlying districts, and worked them for the benefit of the people and not as a paying concern as a whole. In any case we have the fact that, I think, up to 50 per cent. of the railways on the Continent have been nationalised, and we have no case, or at least I have not heard of one, put forward in which the railways having been taken over and nationalised reverted to private management. There may have been, but if so I have not heard of a railway taken over by the State that the service of the railway deteriorated as a result. One of the main objections of Deputy Cooper was to the position in which the public would find the railway servants. He seemed to give the impression that the railway servants at present have no political rights, and that the railway companies prevented their servants from having or exercising any political rights. Of course, as we all know, railway servants have full political rights, and we have a railway worker a member of the Dáil. I would like to ask Deputy Cooper, or those who think with him, seeing that this is the case, whether these rights have been abused by railway servants. Has Deputy Cooper on any occasion on which he went into a railway station to buy a ticket been canvassed? A railway servant has the right to do so, as he has full political rights. Has he been followed about for the sake of getting his support for one measure or another, and has every station under present circumstances, as Deputy Cooper told us would happen under the proposed change, been turned into a committee room? There is no evidence whatever that the railway servants have abused their political rights. If that is the case we can reasonably conclude they would not be abused under the new conditions. I cannot conceive why Deputy Cooper would deny the right to a railway servant that he himself possesses. There is nothing to prevent Deputy Cooper, or any other member of the public, from going into a railway station and pestering a railway servant to give his vote in a certain direction. I have been

6 o'clock. always opposed to this idea, another preconceived idea, that because a man happens to work in a certain position he therefore should not have the full right to exercise his civil and political rights. Civil and State servants are tax-payers and ratepayers, and they have and should have as much interest in seeing that the State is properly managed, and that the proper people are chosen to manage the affairs of the country, as any other body of men and women. If Deputy Cooper's ideas were to hold good, all shop assistants, too, would be deprived of their political and civil rights, for Deputy Cooper, when he goes into some shop, is just as likely to be pestered to give his vote in a particular way as when he goes into a railway station or post office. We know in reality these things Deputy Cooper fears do not happen, and will not, under the proposed new conditions.

We are not asked, as I say, to decide on the details of the measure at this stage. The Dáil is not asked to agree, by voting for this measure, to everything contained in the Bill. What is now before the Dáil is the main principle, whether or not transport and the means of transport are to be acquired, owned, and controlled, by the State in the interest of the community as a whole, or whether they are to continue to be run for the private profit of individuals.

I think any Deputy who looks at the question at issue from that point of view can only come to one conclusion. This question of nationalisation of railways is like many of the others we heard of in the past, such as old age pensions and the enfranchisement of women, that for years and years were matters for debate, though everyone knew who gave the matter serious thought, that it was only a question of time until these things would come into operation. This is only a question of time too, and I think most of those who spoke against giving the Bill a Second Reading used that argument. You could see while they were in favour of nationalisation, and felt it was bound to come, they thought it better to keep it away as long as they could. That is after all, I think, a mistaken policy.

The nationalisation of railways is bound to come, and it is only a question of whether it should be now or later on.

Mr. P. DOYLE: I do not wish to take up the time of the Dáil, having regard to the length of the debate that has already taken place on this great problem. But I think it will be generally recognised that there is a great demand by the general public, by traders, and even by the railway companies themselves, that a definite answer or a definite decision should be arrived at on this very important national problem. The people of the country demand improved transit facilities, and a reduction of high rates. That has already been dealt with by practically every Deputy who stood up, either in support of or against the Bill. It is not necessary, therefore, to go any further into that part of the question, except to point out that inland industries are at a great disadvantage owing to the long journeys goods have to be brought for the purpose of exporting them. There, undoubtedly, must be something radically wrong when manufacturers find it much cheaper, instead of using railways for the transport of their goods, to ship them through Glasgow or Liverpool from one Irish port to another Irish port. That is an illustration of the necessity for a reduction of Irish railway rates. It is a very urgent problem. I am convinced, and I think most of the Deputies, even those who stand strongly for this Bill, believe that it is a problem that needs very careful and wise consideration before taking it up on the lines set out in the Bill. As to the principle of nationalisation or amalgamation, I will say that I, at any rate, have been an exponent of nationalisation for a number of years. With the principle I agree, but I fear, at the moment, having regard to the abnormal condition of affairs in the country, that it is rather a huge problem to undertake. I think my feelings on the matter are better expressed by the comment made by Deputy Hewat, when he said that Deputy Johnson had taken some of the chestnuts out of the Government fire. In my opinion he has taken too many chestnuts out of the fire, judging by the scope of the Bill in which he includes the control of road, canal, transit, and postal communication. The reason I think so is that all these problems, all very important in their own way, and all adding to a very great extent to the progress, prosperity and industrial development of the country, each and all are institutions in themselves. If they were worked, there would be some good grounds for amalgamating them. Until they are I think it would be too great a task to undertake what is outlined in the Bill.

I have listened very attentively to the criticism, particularly of those who have opposed the Bill, that it takes a good deal away from the profits that are to arise from such business concerns. That is the point that I find in Deputy Johnson's Bill. It gives the argument to those who are opposed, and who always will be opposed to the change of any great concern, that it does not pay them personally. It is always put forward as an excuse for not changing and making a concern work as it ought. Some of those people, particularly Deputy Gorey's party, feel that they have a right, because they have some pecuniary interest in it, to carry on a concern without any regard to anybody else affected. Our principle ought to be, the greater good of the greater number. As railways are, in fact, the great arteries of the nation there ought to be some control, so that great concerns like these should not be used for the benefit of any one particular section. In my opinion that is what has been done with the Irish railway systems since they were formed.

I think, now that we have got our own Government, with possibilities for the development of our own country in our own hands, it is about time we started to put these institutions under proper control. The management of Irish railways is, undoubtedly, for a layman, a very delicate question to touch on. There are many irregularities, if I may use the word, that one can refer to. Yet, one feels that one may not be able to put forward one's point in a way that it might convince people that there are such irregularities going on to such an extent as to prevent proper administration being carried out. I certainly say that there is a great need for a change in the administration or management of railways. It is up to the Government of the country to make some effort to change the system that has been in operation and that has been left to us, perhaps, as a legacy from the Government that we have just got rid of. There are in the whole of Ireland too many directors on the railways. I forget what the figure exactly is.

Mr. O'MAHONY: There are 117 directors.

Mr. DOYLE: The point is whether there are too many directors or not.

Mr. O'MAHONY: There are too many directors.

Mr. DOYLE: I am glad you admit it. The question of appointing an official staff for working on the railways is the chief business concern of the combined systems. It is not possible for a clerk, or for some person who has certain qualifications or interests, from a commercial point of view, to have a full knowledge of railway working. At present, the system in vogue is that managers are transferred from one railway to another. Changes are so often made—particularly in the workshops—that the output is not as great as it ought to be in the interests of the works and the shareholders. In most cases the managers are not Irish, and consequently they have not that interest in the working of the railways that Irishmen would have, especially Irishmen brought up in railway work, and who have a good knowledge of it.

An Irishman is turned down in his own country and he has to go abroad to earn a living. In connection with specifications and contracts on the railways, there is a system in operation that prevents Irish manufacturers tendering. The bulk of railway requirements is imported from abroad. I could cite a number of articles that have been applied for, but were turned down because the companies would not change their contractors, although it was obvious the articles could be got in Ireland for half the cost. I venture to suggest that if these changes were possible in railway management, they would add considerably to the dividends of the shareholders.

As regards the manufacture of rolling stock, which was referred to by Deputy O'Mahony, the difference between home-made and foreign rolling stock would amount to £300, touching, for the moment, on coaches. The home-made article would cost £300 more than the article imported from England. I would like to go more fully into that matter, but I hold that this is not the place to do it. A few months ago a mistake, I believe, was made in regard to certain railway work. That work is now being carried out at Inchicore. There are a number of items arising out of rolling stock manufacture that I could refer to, and I will just quote one at a pre-war figure.

Mr. GOREY: Is it necessary, in connection with a question of this sort, that we should hear about every linchpin and every nail that is driven into rolling stock?

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: It might be as well if the Deputy did not go so fully into details.

Mr. HENNESSY: I think, with all respect, that we should have every point brought out in order to discuss the matter fully.

Mr. A. BYRNE: I think there is really ground for protest against interruptions. When a new Deputy stands up to speak for the first time, he ought to be allowed to continue his speech without interruption.

Mr. WALSH: Interruptions should not be tolerated.

The PRESIDENT: Perhaps I may be allowed to intervene? It may be necessary to sit beyond 8.30 to-night. I have no desire to interrupt the Deputy, particularly when he is making his maiden speech; on such an occasion I agree he should not be interrupted. I move now that the Dáil do sit beyond 8.30 to-night. There is a general feeling that we should deal with this matter now under discussion and get it finished. In order that there would be no accident, I move as stated.

Mr. HOGAN: I beg to second.

Motion put and agreed to.

Mr. DOYLE: The question of rolling stock is a very sore one, because, in a sense, it pricks some of the consciences of those who cannot see their way to support Irish products, either in their own domestic life or when they are using other people's money. In pre-war times waggons were imported by the Midland Great Western Railway Company from England at a cost of about £150. At that time waggons were made in the Great Southern and Western Railway's Works for £80. Quite recently there was an instance of where an article was manufactured here at £150, and abroad it would cost £190. At the moment, Irish railways are sending huge sums of money out of the country for rolling stock. I presume that is in the interest of the shareholders. I will confine myself now to saying that if the Government cannot accept the Bill presented by the Labour Party, I sincerely trust they will accept it as a basis for some decision in regard to the future control of Irish railways. I was going to refer to an incident which occurred some years ago in connection with propaganda for the nationalisation of railways. I will just touch upon it because I believe the influences then at work against nationalisation are working to-day to obstruct, if possible, any effort on our part to control our own railway systems.

At that time I was closely in touch with some members of the Irish Parliamentary Party who were interested in nationalisation and undoubtedly had done good work. I approached them, I may say confidentially at the time, on the question as to the possibilities of nationalisation being realised in this country within any short time. The answer I got was that it took ten years to convince the Irish Party of the importance of it, and they believed it would take twenty years more to convince the British Government. Now that is an accurate statement of what I got at that particular time which might be ten years ago, but I sincerely trust that we ought to take a different view now from that opinion, and as I have said before, it is up to the Government now to endeavour as far as the circumstances permit to solve this great national problem. I do not think anyone on these Benches needs any convincing that the railway system in Ireland, if properly worked and properly controlled, means a full development of the industrial life of the country as regards new industry in particular, and almost all property in the country in general.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE :

(Mr. Hogan) : I do not propose to speak very long on this matter. Deputy Egan has said very much of what I wished to say. I also congratulate the Labour Party—it is becoming quite the fashion—upon their Bill, but I propose to vote against it. This much at least can be said for it. It is the first concrete proposal which we have got towards the solution of an extremely difficult, an extremely intricate and extremely complex question. There was another proposal made by Deputy Hewat, speaking as a business man, but you can hardly call it a concrete proposal, and it was hardly a proposal towards the solution of any problem. His position was—and I was surprised to hear it—that there was no problem to solve. That is a laissez faire with a vengeance. He said that this question, this perennial railway question was a mere stalking horse, and he personally could not see why we should treat a commercial undertaking like the railways in any different way from any other commercial undertaking. That was his position frankly. That is a surprising position for a business man to take up. We all complain at the present moment of high freights, of inefficient service, and we all know the reason well enough. We all know the reason and we can all agree on some of the reasons at any rate. I am sure that Deputy Hewat would agree that the fact that the railway system of this very small country consists of over 30 separate companies built up haphazard, not according to any plan, cannot but lead towards inefficiency.

Mr. HEWAT: Whose fault is it?

Mr. HOGAN: That is not the question; but there it is and we are dealing with existing circumstances. We all agree that that fact is one of the big causes of high freights and inefficiency. Does the Deputy seriously take up the position that it is not only not the duty of the Government, but that the Government have no right to intervene to lower freights by insisting on something like efficient organisation? I am not speaking for the Government. I am speaking as a Deputy; but I would be very much surprised if that was the Government's position, and I am very much surprised to find that that is the contribution of a business man towards the solution of this problem. I am not in favour of nationalisation at this stage and in existing circumstances. I should like to say a word or two in this connection. There are no principles involved in a business matter of this sort, there are only questions of expediency, and nationalisation is really a matter of expediency. It is a matter of expediency, a business matter, in considering which you take into account the expediency of the case and give justice to all parties concerned. That is all that is to it. I am not in favour of nationalisation at this stage. I do not hide from myself the fact that in a country like this which is predominantly an agricultural country, and which is likely to continue to be predominantly an agricultural country for a very long time, it may be the duty of the State to take special and particular measures to put the railways in at least as good a position as they are in a highly industrialised country where there is a big population and very large traffic both in passengers and goods, and where, consequently, very satisfactory and favourable freights can be given. Railways present a different problem in a country like ours to what they do in a country like England. In a country like England you have big businesses, an immense population, huge loads, so that the railways can be run efficiently, and at the same time freights can be favourable. I do think that as far as the Government can go it would be their duty in an agricultural country where the conditions cannot be so favourable from that point of view, no matter how efficient agriculture is, to intervene to see that freights give fair play to the citizens and to the main industry of the country.

Is this the time to consider the question of nationalisation? Deputy Davin made a very long speech yesterday and he pointed out what tremendously high freights we had. We all know that. He pointed out that the present system is inefficient. We all know that, too, and we all agree with it. Like Deputy Egan, I would say that the blame can hardly be laid upon the management. It is the system that is wrong, but whatever the reason may be we can all agree with Deputy Davin that the present system is costly and inefficient. We need not labour these points or make very long speeches about them. They are common cause. The question is how to remedy all this—how to remedy it in view of the fact that the boundary has not yet been determined, in view of the fact that the Irish railways carry an immense traffic to England and carry an immense traffic back; that a system of through rates has grown up, that very complicated relations exist as between the English railway system and the Irish railway system; relations which were bound to develop considering that the Irish railways carry to the Irish ports, and through the Irish ports send across to England, over one hundred million tons of export every year and bring back almost the same amount.

These are the factors which make the problem at this moment extremely complicated. We could go a long way to solve all our difficulties if we could do what Deputy Johnson felt himself entitled to do in the Bill, and that is to write off ten million pounds worth of capital. We do not feel entitled to do that, even though Deputy O'Connell may object to me referring to that on a Second Reading debate, but he will have to allow me to refer to it because it has a very direct and important bearing on the whole principle of the Bill. If we could afford to write off about 30 per cent. of the capital, and about 40 per cent. of the interest, we could go a long way towards solving the problem. That appears to me to be the biggest flaw in the Bill, and it is the only difficulty in the way. But is this, I ask, the right time to do that? Remember the history of the Irish railways for the last 10 years. They were controlled during the war. In his speech yesterday, Deputy Davin went to great length to show that the control was inefficient, and that we could hardly judge nationalisation on the experiences of the Irish railways under control during the war period. I agree with him on that, that the control of the Irish railways and the result obtained during the period of the war, when they were controlled, is not a fair test of nationalisation. They were controlled, and controlled not exactly with a view to economy.

They emerged from that control and passed through, I think, two years of revolution; they emerged from that revolution and passed through more than a year's rebellion, when the energies of a very large number of people in the country were concentrated on smashing them up. To take the railways at that point, after going through these experiences and to say "We are going to nationalise you, we are going to take you over on certain terms and we are going to give you these terms because the results you show as a business commercial concern do not deserve any better terms" is not, I suggest, fair play.

Mr. JOHNSON: Is the Minister not aware that we are dealing with pre-war earnings?

Mr. HOGAN: I am quite well aware of that, but Deputy Johnson knows perfectly well that if, at the present moment, the railway companies were showing a profit instead of a loss that that would change somewhat the terms of his Bill. At least I hope and think so. Though I have not been taken into the councils of the Labour Party, I think that the Bill has been drafted with a view to the exact position as it exists at the moment. I see Deputy Davin smiling, and I am sure he is smiling because he knows that to be true. Is it fair in the circumstances, I ask, to take over any concern after such experiences and say "We will nationalise you at 15 years' purchase"? I say it is not fair.

Mr. O'CONNELL: What about the landlords?

Mr. HOGAN: I will come to the landlords in a moment. It is not the simple problem that Deputy O'Connell said it was. His point was that the railways should be run for the benefit of the nation, or for the benefit of the shareholders. There is no use in attempting to settle the problem in such simple terms, and anyway that is not the question here. I will accept the principle stated by Deputy O'Connell. He said that his position was that the main object of the railways was to utilise them for the national good. We all accept that, but there is no use in confusing the issue by trying to persuade people that the problem can be stated simply—the national good, or the shareholders' profits—and saying to them: "If you are in favour of the nation, if you want to see the railway system of the country serving the nation exclusively rather than serving the shareholders exclusively, then agree to nationalisation." That is not a fair way to state the case. That is not even the position taken up by the Labour Party themselves as expressed in their Bill. They realise that the shareholders have certain rights or otherwise they would not recognise, as they do, these rights in the Bill.

I have no doubt myself that unification must come, and that it must come quickly. I have no doubt that it is the duty of the Government to see that unification comes and that it comes as quickly as possible, and to see that the system, as we have it, with over 30 separate companies in charge of the railways of the country, is scrapped, and that a unified and efficient system is put in its place. But that can be done without nationalisation. All the advantages which Deputy Davin claimed for his policy of nationalisation really are attributable, as he made it clear in his speech, to unification. I do not admit, and I think few will admit, that with the unified system and with efficient direction and management, that the State would not get better service and better results than with the unified system and nationalisation. I do not admit that at this stage. Experience may show that it is so, and I am quite willing to keep an open mind on the matter. Experience may show the necessity for nationalisation, but my position in the matter is that we must give unification and private enterprise, properly controlled by the Government, a chance first. I will say that Deputy Johnson was quite consistent in his attitude towards the Land Bill, just as he has been quite consistent in his attitude in this matter, and he was perfectly right when he asked the Farmers' Party this simple question: "You are in favour of taking over property in land on much worse terms than 15 years' purchase, and hence you cannot call this confiscation." That was a perfectly fair point.

I cannot resist the temptation of reminding the Farmers' Party in this matter that when we were debating the Land Bill I pointed out, and I hope I am consistent in this matter, that once you begin playing around with property it may lead in directions that you do not dream of. I believe that property has rights actually, but I believe, and I do not distinguish between persons, that landlords have the same rights as railway shareholders, and that one man is as good as another before the law, and that is the only principle worth fighting for. The landlord who got land from his father has the same right to it as the man who got a thousand pounds worth of railway shares from his father. If we were to enter into an inquiry as to how their respective fathers got the land or the money represented by the railway shares we would, I am afraid, be going down the steep and narrow way. That is to say, we would be going nowhere, and getting nowhere.

There is absolutely no parallel. I pointed out that the present proposal was to take over the railways at a time when they had emerged from five or six years of inefficient control and three or four years of destruction. On the other hand, with regard to the land question, we were simply finishing a bigger problem. One hundred and thirty millions had been spent on land purchase. We were merely spending £30,000,000 more. The lines had been laid down for us, fair rent courts had been set up, and we knew exactly what we were buying. Every element of the case was before us to enable us to come to a correct conclusion which would do justice to all sides. Though we may disagree as to whether it did justice or not, all the elements of the case were before us. The exact opposite is the position with regard to the railways. I think the railway shareholders are entitled to a chance. The Government, on the one side, must see that the lines are unified and that the management is efficient. After that the railway shareholders are entitled to show what the railways can earn, and at the same time that the freights they charge are such as are fair to agriculture and industry in the country.

Deputy Wilson, Deputy McKenna and other members of the Farmers' Party, and also Deputy Davin, have on various occasions asked me what I am going to do about the freights on cattle from one station to another, quoting the stations, and about the freight on pigs and freight on agricultural produce. Now the fact is that at the present moment, even with the present freights, as everyone knows, the railway companies are not earning enough to pay dividends on their existing stocks. That is the fact. You cannot solve that problem by going to the railway companies and saying, "Cut down freights on such and such an article between any two given stations." Deputies can pick out a specific case that shows a gross anomaly, where some article is carried between two given stations at a rate that absorbs practically all the profits, and then come to me and say, "What are you going to do about it?" To reduce the present freights by 1d. you must either have more efficient management and a more efficient system or you must cut down interest on the stocks.

Mr. DAVIN: May I ask the Minister if it would not be necessary to have some form of Rates Tribunal in order to bring about the state of affairs he is now dealing with?

Mr. HOGAN: What I said was that to reduce the present freights you must either have more efficient management, a more efficient system, or reduce the interest. Supposing we had a Rates Tribunal and supposing we brought before it the case that Deputy Davin put before me a fortnight ago and said, "Look at what freight I paid for this article from one station to another." If the Rates Tribunal were to reduce the freight they would have to face the alternatives that I have stated. That is the position. There is no use in regarding this railway problem as a simple problem, and, on receiving a letter from a constituent, getting up and asking me, "What are you going to do about such an article?" In his speech Deputy Baxter warned me some time ago that the agricultural position at present was extremely serious. I know it is extremely serious. The Deputy warned me, further, that it was quite impossible to deal with it efficiently without the co-operation of the Farmer's Party and every other Party. I know that. This is a very big question, an important question, a complicated and a difficult one, and it affects farmers more than anyone else. We are entitled to have some constructive help from the Farmers' Party. I am entitled to have it, and I am speaking for myself as Minister for Agriculture. I have not got it.

Mr. GOREY: You have not asked it. You want people to go round with propositions in their pockets.

Mr. HOGAN: When I say that, I expect that we would have here in the Dáil some constructive suggestion to meet this extremely difficult problem which affects agriculture so intimately. We have not got it. If the Farmers' Party do not like to face this question as it should be faced, they should not ask me afterwards, "Why is the freight on pigs so high between Ballyhaunis and some place else?" I want to warn all whom it may concern that freights cannot be reduced without reorganisation.

Mr. McKENNA: You will do without revenue if you do not.

Mr. HOGAN: We will do without revenue if we do not! I said we could reduce freights, and I put the alternatives. We can take over the railways. We can write off a certain amount of the capital and a certain amount of the interest. Which does the Farmers' Party stand for? They cannot have it both ways. I think they ought to state it, or at least not come to me afterwards and say, "This is a disgrace. I sent a waggon of cattle from Ballinasloe to the North Wall, and look at what I was charged." The reason I am saying this is that I want to impress upon the Dáil, and on the Farmer's Party in particular, that this railway question, which affects farming so much, and which has so much to do with the depression in agriculture, is an extremely difficult problem that cannot be solved without the good-will and co-operation of everyone, and without hard thinking and hard work. I am anxious to have constructive suggestions from them on this question.

Mr. WILSON: Do you want a Bill?

Mr. HOGAN: Someone suggested. I think it was Deputy Hewat, that we should solve this problem by giving free play to competition. Competition between whom? Whether we solve this problem by giving free play to competition, whether we solve it by unification, or whether we solve it by nationalisation—and I do not think that is likely at the moment—the problem must be solved as quickly as such an intricate problem can be solved. We are prepared to face a solution of this problem from one point of view, and from one point of view only, the control of Irish railways by Irishmen, giving the best service to the country that can possibly be given in all circumstances, whether that takes State intervention or not.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: Following on the excellent and lucid statement made by the Minister for Agriculture, I feel that it would be rather difficult for me to contribute anything enlightening on this matter, because I feel that he has in his usual logical and lucid way given a very clear exposition of the condition of affairs. There is a possibility, however, that there may be some trifling point which the Minister and other Deputies have overlooked and which I might bring to the notice of the Dáil. It seems to me that there is nothing inherently wrong with the idea of nationalisation. The only thing which is wrong with it is the human factor. It is a fact that the human factor, whether under socialisation or nationalisation, does not show its best results. Some peculiar kind of stagnation seems to affect the human being when he gets into a nationalised or socialised service. I think this is largely proved by facts which are well known. There are two conditions which would justify the nationalisation of Irish railways in my opinion: (1) that the nationalised railway service should be self-supporting; (2) that under the system of nationalisation you should get better service and lower freights. I think it was Deputy Johnson stated that one of the objects of this Bill was to see that the railways were administered in the interests of the general public and he either implied or stated that the railways in the past had been run in the interests of the shareholders. If I might say so, that is a very cheap form of propaganda which is very commonly used. Judging by the actual facts I do not think it can be honestly or truthfully said that the railways in the past have been run in the interests of the shareholders. It must be acknowledged that shareholders are entitled to a certain return for their capital. I do not know if the Labour Party will acknowledge that, but I think it is generally acknowledged by responsible people.

On making a calculation I find that the actual facts are that for the years 1904-1913 4 per cent. was the average dividend obtained by shareholders. Excluding the railways in Northern Ireland I find that the actual return received by shareholders was 2½ per cent. These shareholders could have obtained at least 4 per cent. or perhaps 5 per cent. in certain Government stocks. In face of those facts is it right or fair to suggest that railways in the past have been run in the interests of the shareholders? I do not hold any shares in a railway and I have no brief for shareholders. At the same time it is only right and fair that their point of view should be given when the matter is being discussed. The Bill is not introduced in the interests of the general public because, as far as I know, the general public do not approve of nationalisation. Certainly the shareholders do not approve of it. The only conclusion I can arrive at is that the object in introducing this Bill was that railways should be run in the interests of the railway employees.

Some remarks have been made with the object of proving the success of nationalisation in other countries. I do not know very much about some countries, but I know something by hearsay. I do not think that nationalisation has proved a great success. I understand that in Holland where the railways were nationalised and taken over by the Government, they have been again handed back or leased to private interests. Deputy Davin yesterday held up Belgium as an example of a country where nationalised railways had been a success. I believe that nationalisation has been a fair success in Belgium, but there are influences at work there which make the running of railways, whether nationalised or privately owned, a comparatively easy matter. The country is very level and the laying down of the railroads was a comparatively cheap process. The haulage of the traffic also is a comparatively cheap process. The result is that those very reasonable rates for tourist traffic were available. If the Belgian railways had been run as a private enterprise, there is no reason why they should not pay equally as well or why those reasonable facilities should not have been given.

We have had some experience in this country of what amounts to 7 o'clock. nationalisation, because after all the Post Office is a nationalised service. I would say that our experience of the Post Office is not of such a kind as to lead us to welcome nationalisation with open arms. We know that the Post Office service has not been run at a profit, and that during the past year it was run at a considerable loss. We know that the State has had to make up the deficiency. I do not know if the Post Office has ever been run by private enterprise, but if it were possible to run it as a private enterprise, it could hardly be run at a greater loss than it has been up to the present. Then there is the case of the telephone system, which at one time was in the hands of private individuals. I believe it was paying and gave a fairly efficient service—not a very efficient one. That system was taken over by the Government. I understand it is not paying, and it is generally acknowledged that it is giving an inefficient service.

I will acknowledge that State control, as we have experienced it in the past, is not the same thing as nationalisation as expounded in Deputy Johnson's Bill. I know that in England the great desire after the war was to get rid of State control. Even the farmers were very desirous to get clear of State control because it hampered their undertakings and because the dead-hand of State control prevented any enterprise from prospering. So much so that the farmers were anxious to run their business as a private enterprise with free open competition, rather than have State control with a State subsidy.

There is one country where nationalisation of railways has been tried to a very large extent, and I must say that the results do not appear to be satisfactory—that is Canada. The principal railroads in Canada are now in the hands of the Canadian Government—that is, they are nationalised. With the exception of the Canadian Pacific Railway all the railroads in Canada have been taken over and are run and controlled by the Government. The Government has control of the Canadian Northern Railway, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. JOHNSON: How long has the Government the control of the Grand Trunk Railway?

Mr. HEFFERNAN: Since 1920. I think the Government built the Canadian Government railway and it controls and has been running it for years. I think the Government has had control of the Canadian Northern Railway since 1918. I will give some figures which might be of interest to Labour Deputies. In 1922 the gross earnings of the Canadian Northern Railway were 60,679,033 dollars. The operating expenses were 63,625,763 dollars, giving an operating deficit of 2,946,729 dollars, or roughly £580,000. Those figures make no allowance for fixed charges, that is interest on capital. Allowing for interest on capital, which was 32,711,546 dollars, the gross deficit for the year was 34,310,572 dollars, or roughly £6,800,000. I might mention incidentally that the operating deficit added to the interest on capital will not amount to that sum, because there is some other item to be taken into account for non-operating expenditure which I do not understand. That will make the case still worse. Therefore, the total deficit since the year 1918 on the Canadian Northern Railway was 120,346,777 dollars, or £24,000,000. This amount has apparently to be made good by the State. The Dominion Government advanced 350,032,748 dollars, or £70,000,000 to the Canadian Northern Railway. I do not think I will bore the Dáil by giving the figures for the Grand Trunk Railway.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think it is desirable that we should have them, if they are to illustrate your argument.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: I will give them to the Deputy privately. The State has been obliged to make good this loss out of State funds.

Mr. JOHNSON: Who ran these railways?

Mr. HEFFERNAN: They were run by private companies, but now they are State railways.

Mr. JOHNSON: Why had the State to take them over?

Mr. HEFFERNAN: Because owing to the unusual conditions prevailing since the war they were not worked at a profit. The Canadian Government Railway was built by the Canadian Government and was controlled and run by it, and it has been run at a loss. When it was in competition with the private railways it was said that its services were not as good as those of the other railways and that the civility and so forth of its servants was not as satisfactory as that of those employed by private companies. The Minister for Agriculture mentioned in his usual logical fashion that two things were necessary if rates were to be reduced—that interest and also management expenses must be reduced. He left out of account the possibility of reducing freights by reducing wages. I hear “Oh” from the Labour benches. I have no particular desire to see wages reduced but I would like to see them kept up as high as conditions would allow. I understand that wages are higher in this country than in similar services in England.

Mr. JOHNSON: No.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: I say that subject to correction, but if that is so I think it would be reasonable to reduce wages to the level of those obtaining in similar services in England in order to reduce rates here. Taking the figures given before the Railway Commission, the wage of an unskilled labourer in 1914 was from 13s. 10d. to 17s. 5d. per week, but now I understand he gets 48/-, an increase of, at least, 300 per cent. I do not know if any particular class of labour is entitled to such an increase in comparison with other classes. The wages of an agricultural labourer have not increased, I understand, beyond about 80 per cent. Would it not be reasonable that the wages of railway workers should be reduced to a certain extent in order to help to reduce rates? I know you have in the country an agricultural labourer working at a comparatively low wage and living side by side with a railway worker who gets probably twice as much for less work. That strikes the agricultural labourer as being very unjust, and it may be one of the foundations of the causes of agricultural trouble in this country, regardless of the fact that it is impossible for agriculture at present to pay wages on a level with those paid on the railways. I have taken out some of the figures given before the Railway Commission last year regarding the increase in freights. For potatoes (omitting the Great Northern Company) the rate has increased from 151 per cent. to 317 per cent.; for butter, 101 to 177; for eggs, 123 to 161; and for bacon, 148 to 256. These are the prevailing rates at present. The increase in the selling price of farm produce, according to my calculation, which does not agree with that of the Minister for Agriculture, is in the case of cattle about 20 per cent. while there is no increase in the price of oats and wheat compared with the price in 1914. The increase in the price of pigs is 20 per cent. and milk 10 per cent. A 4lb. loaf that used to be 5d. now costs 10d. Freights have gone up 300 per cent. and agriculture is tremendously hampered by such excessive rates. I consider that it will be almost impossible for agriculture to maintain itself and continue as a living industry if it has to pay the present excessive rates. The Minister for Agriculture stated recently that a reduction in the cost of living of five points would be of more advantage to the farmers than the wiping out of their rents. I cannot agree with that. I think that if there was a reduction of five points in the cost of living and if all wages came down—

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

The Deputy is not in order in discussing the wages question except in reference to the Railway Bill.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: I accept your correction. The Minister for Agriculture suggested that he would like to hear some constructive suggestion. I am not without some suggestions in a constructive direction and they are somewhat similar to those, apparently, in the mind of the Minister. I suggest that the grouping of railways is a most useful thing, as nationalisation will not be recognised as suitable.

Mr. JOHNSON: Unification or grouping?

Mr. HEFFERNAN: I would suggest grouping as the most useful, because I think it will not eliminate all competition. In all businesses it is necessary to retain a certain amount of competition and although the railways will not be in direct competition with one another it is an incentive for one railway to compete with one group and to see that their freights are not higher than those of the other railways.

There are other matters which might be taken into account by the Government when bringing forward their Bill. I believe that a wages tribunal should be set up. That wages tribunal should re-arrange the freights, if possible, in the direction of lowering them. Either that tribunal or another should be responsible for the fixing of wages. There should be adequate representation of labour and capital upon it with a neutral Chairman, and when proper and final arrangements have been made both sides should bind themselves to accept the decision of this tribunal. In connection with grouping, there would follow a reduction in directors. I suggest no more than six directors for each group, or about ten in the case of the unification of all the Irish railways. I do not believe, as Deputy Doyle stated, that there is a director for every mile of railway, but there are too many railway directors, and the consequent expense is altogether more than is justified by the circumstances of the country. Finally, I would like to refer to the comparison between the financing of the nationalisation of railroads as expounded in Deputy Johnson's Bill and the financing of land purchase. I do not think it is fair to put them on the same basis. I do not intend to refer to any extent to the past history of the holding of land, but I think some consideration must be given to the fact that a great part of the land of Ireland was held by confiscation rights. That happened a long time ago, and it is hardly worth taking it into account. We must not overlook, however, that land owners in Ireland have had for years an excellent opportunity for selling their land, or their landlord's interest in the land, for a price that would secure for them a capital sum which, if invested in reasonable industrial securities, would purchase for them an income, at least as good as that which they had from their land. That being the case, it was open to all landlords to get rid of their land.

Mr. MORRISSEY: Are we discussing the Land Bill or the Railway Bill?

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: I think the Deputy is in order, because he is making a comparison of the price. The comparison has been quoted by other Deputies.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: Taking all those circumstances into account, I do not think it is reasonable to make this comparison. The stockholders invested their money in the railroads within the past seventy or eighty years. I think time must be taken into account in such matters. I do not think it is reasonable to pass a measure which would have the effect of confiscating the property of shareholders who risked their money in these undertakings.

Mr. D'ALTON: After the very lengthy speeches which have been made on this Bill, I do not intend to intervene at any length. We have practically been deluged with figures, and I am afraid those figures remind me of a statement of a very able lawyer who, when acting as a junior counsel, had to meet the case of a very able counsel on the other side. He said these figures reminded him of his boyhood days when returning from school with other boys he watched an Indian juggler in the street. I believe it was George's Street in Limerick. The juggler produced volumes of paper from his mouth, but when they looked at this paper there was nothing on it. A great many of those figures we have listened to have not gone to prove any case, either for State ownership of railways or for the shareholders.

I am, on the whole, open-minded on the question of State ownership of railways, but I am opposed to it for one solid reason. My life's experience of companies run by committees, where any body of men acquired any industry, has been that nine out of ten of those industries have been failures. What is everyman's business is no man's business. I have not heard a case made out to prove that railways under the State are to be run for the benefit of the public or that they are to be run under better management if the State controls them. I have not heard that there is to be for the workers a higher rate of wages paid than that paid under existing circumstances. No concern that is not paying can pay a wage. The present system of railways is faulty in its management. That the State should have more control over railways is to my mind an absolute necessity. You have many directors receiving salaries for so-called management of railways which they do not earn. The public are paying those salaries by excessive rates on all the produce of this country that is sent to the various markets. Unification, to my mind, in Ireland is going to be of advantage to the public. But if the Government brings forward a scheme for unification, or the scheme that I believe is already being considered, I would suggest that they should retain in their hands a certain power of control over the railways. At present we are aware of the fact that though there has been a reduction in wages and though shareholders have been getting smaller dividends, the increased rates are still in existence and the farmer is simply paying exorbitant rates for his cattle, oats and barley. On all the Irish railways the rates compare unfavourably with those in any country like Ireland with the same population and the same railway mileage. That has to be met. I do not believe it will be met by State ownership. I believe it will be met by the Government having some power over the railways, to see that the people who pay the rates, the people who send their purchases to the various markets, will not be used as a medium for creating wealth, sometimes for shareholders who perhaps got their shares, as the landlords got their property, not as men that earned them—in some cases possibly their fathers did not earn them—but the main fact is that they are shareholders. In the past they have been paid dividends at the expense of the public. I believe that there will be a unification scheme, that it will be necessary for the Government to see that the public are protected. I think that the Minister for Agriculture should take steps to see that stock is handled in a proper way. The farmers are charged exorbitant rates, and their cattle are placed on the market in a greatly depreciated state owing to the mismanagement of the railway companies in transhipment from the wagons to the boats. The present system of handling cattle means an absolute dead loss to the farmers. The time their transhipment takes and the abuse and beatings they get mean a depreciation which the farmer has eventually to pay for, amounting to ten, fifteen and twenty per cent. in some cases, owing to railway mismanagement. I do not believe that State ownership will remedy this.

I am quite well aware of the fact that companies under private ownership, in almost every case, are far more successful than an undertaking governed by a committee who have not the real interests of the work at heart, because it is not a question for them to see that there is no mismanagement and that every penny expended brings its proper return. The Government must have more control over the railways in the interests of the public, and that must be seen to in any scheme brought forward. I certainly have heard no argument in support of nationalisation that appeals to me, nor have I seen any successful undertaking in this country except under private ownership.

Mr. R. CORISH: I desire, in a very few words, to support this Bill. I want to say that, so far as I can see, a good case has been made for it, not alone by members of this Party, but by practically every Deputy who has spoken. Almost all of them have condemned the railway companies in all their moods and tenses, and justly so. The very mention of nationalisation seems to be a bogie to a number of people here. They condemn it without going to the trouble of finding out whether it would be advantageous to the country or not. The tenor of most of their statements seems to be that the Labour Party has put forward this Bill merely for the purpose of trying to increase the railway workers' wages. That is not a fact. The Labour Party are alive to the fact, the absolute fact, that the Irish railway companies are not using their lines in the interests of the country. The Minister for Agriculture congratulated Deputy Johnson on the fact that this was a good Bill, and that it was the first tangible proposition placed before the Government to deal with this very difficult problem. I think he said also that that was the opinion of the Government. If that be so, and if that is how it is looked on from the Government Benches, I do not see why this Bill should not get a Second Reading, and if the Government have any amendments to submit, that they should do so on the Committee Stage and make an earnest effort to tackle this very intricate problem.

Most of the Deputies who are supposed to have spoken against the Bill have really spoken in its favour. They have condemned the railway companies, and some of them have said that the time is not opportune for railway nationalisation, owing to the state of the country. While I am prepared to admit that one of the reasons the country is in such a bad condition, economically, to-day, is the chaos and the internal warfare of the last twelve months, I hold that in no small way the railway system has contributed to it. Ask any Irish manufacturer who has to send his goods through the country, and he will tell you that the railway facilities are responsible for the bad trade. The facilities offered by the companies in the Free State are anything but desirable. Most of the Deputies have told us that the Government should control the railways, that is to say: "Yes; we want nationalisation, but do not pretend to anybody that it is nationalisation." That is what it really means. Everybody is agreed that the time has come for Government intervention in this important matter, and I believe that before very long every Deputy, and everybody who wants to see this country develop as it should in the interests of the State, will realise that nationalisation is the only hope for the development of industries. They say the time is not opportune. I say this is absolutely the right time to approach this question. Industries require to be developed, and under the present system of railway working this country will never be developed, and the sooner we realise that the better. I hope that Deputies will support the Second Reading of the Bill. The Labour Party has put it forward with an earnest idea of solving this very difficult problem. It is not a question of interest from our point of view; it is not a selfish point of view that we take, but it is in the interests of the country as a whole.

Mr. P. McKENNA: Like other Deputies, I wish to congratulate Deputy Johnson on bringing forward this measure. If it served no other purpose than to give the Government an opportunity of putting forward their proposals with regard to the future of the railways, it will have served a very useful purpose.

As has been stated by many Deputies, the time has arrived when something must be done, and the general feeling throughout the country is that something should have been done sooner. We all understand the very difficult time the Government have had, and the troubles they had to contend with, and for that reason we forgive them a good deal. However, the question has to be now faced, and, as the Minister for Agriculture asked, what is going to be done? Deputy Johnson has put forward, as he stated, a concrete proposal. He has introduced this Bill, and we have a good deal of evidence already before us. This question was considered and reported on by a Commission which sat for four years in this country, from 1906 to 1910, namely, the Scotter Commission, which included some very able Irishmen—Lord Pirrie, one of our greatest financial experts, Mr. Thomas Sexton; and I think Col. Sir Hutcheson Poë. After getting a good deal of information from other countries, as well as Ireland, regarding the working of railways, they made their report in favour of nationalisation. We also have the report, after four months' sittings, of the Commission appointed by the Dáil, and of which Deputy Johnson was a member. On looking at the findings of the Commission, I notice that Deputy Johnson has altered his opinion from what it was when he signed the majority report of the Commission.

That report is in favour of State ownership with an independent Railway Board. It states:—

“ We recommend that the Government should purchase the Irish railways, and that the management should not be directly under a State Minister, but should consist of persons representing the interests most vitally and directly affected by railway management. A national Railway Board should be constituted which would have absolute powers of management. That Board might be constituted as follows”—Then they gave eight of a Board.—

“ The Chairman should be a railway expert of wide managerial experience, his nomination to be with the Government. He should hold office for a period of five years, and he should have a salary commensurate with the importance of his position. He would be in effect the managing director of the entire system.” Then the second recommendation suggests representatives of the manufacturing industries of the country to be nominated by the manufacturers. And, thirdly, that a representative of trade and commerce be nominated by the Chambers of Commerce; two representatives of agriculture to be nominated by the Council of Agriculture or other vocational council attached to the Ministry of Agriculture, which may hereafter be set up in connection therewith.

If we look at the Bill we find, as I have stated, that Deputy Johnson has altered his opinion with regard to the question of an independent Railway Board, because he asks the Dáil to allow the Ministers to nominate the Board of Control. Clauses 22 and 23 state:—

“ The Director of Railways shall be a person experienced in railway business, and shall be appointed by the Executive Council upon the recommendation of the Minister and shall hold office at the pleasure of the Executive Council. The Railway Commissioners shall be appointed by the Minister. One Commissioner shall be appointed upon the nomination of the Minister for Finance. One Commissioner shall be appointed upon the nomination of the Minister for Industry and Commerce after consultation with such organisations as appeared to him to be most representative of manufacturing industries."

It leaves in the hands of Ministers the appointment of the Board suggested in the Bill. The Deputy may state that the same principle is involved, but it places in the power of the Minister the appointment or rejection of anyone suggested by the various trade organisations. I do not say that I am opposed so much to the Bill, and I do not think it a crazy measure, or that the Deputy is crazy for having introduced it.

The settlement of this question will be by nationalisation, but I agree with the Minister for Agriculture that the time is not yet ripe for that. What is the alternative? That is a question the Minister for Agriculture has asked us here on these benches, and he invited us to put up some suggestions or give a concrete case, something similar to what the leader of the Labour Party has put forward. Some people favour unification, and some grouping. Personally, I am in favour of grouping, and I will give you my reasons. I have had considerable experience in a branch of the farming industry, namely the live stock trade, since I left school. When I went to business in the west, in places where there was opposition between the Great Southern and Western, and the Midland, and Great Northern Railways, at every fair I went to I had canvassers on behalf of these railways pulling the coat tails off me for traffic, and it was the same with every man doing business at these fairs. This was before the Midland Railway got running powers into Limerick, and when they got these powers they became more active canvassing for traffic. Every fair you went to at Claremorris, Athlone, Clara, and other centres, there was opposition, and you had these canvassers. After a time, two of the Companies saw they were injuring one another, and they started a private pooling arrangement at the various centres. Then the only opposition was from the Great Northern. They tried to bring traffic via their system to the northern ports. Competition is the life of trade, and we welcome that opposition because it helps to develop an industry that affects the lives and fortunes of so many of our people. For that reason, I believe that grouping is better than unification, and I think very careful consideration should be given by the Government to this question before they decide. They are dealing with very astute men in railway directors, and they are dealing with a clever man in Deputy Johnson. It may be that Deputy Johnson's Bill is a sprat to catch a salmon, and that while he is aiming at nationalisation, he would be satisfied with unification, which would be the thin end of the wedge. I do not blame him for that. The feeling of the country is, as the Minister for Agriculture stated, that the time is not yet ripe for nationalisation. The Minister for Agriculture referred to excessive railway rates, and said there is not much hope unless there is a reduction.

We are crippled with excessive railway rates in this country. Everybody knows that. What is the remedy? We see we are losing our trade. There is a country similar to ours, Denmark, and we have to meet that country in competition in the industry that affects so many of our people—the pig industry. When the war was on, Denmark's stock of pigs was reduced to nearly 600,000. The Government of that country subsidised the pig-breeding industry, and did not allow the killing of sows. The result is, that to-day they have 1,800,000 pigs in Denmark and they kill from 60,000 to 70,000 a week. In some cases the number went as high as 90,000 in one week.

What is the position in regard to our pig industry? According to the statistics we had during the war, our pig population was 794,000. There has not been any increase; on the contrary, you will find, when the statistics appear, our pig population is decreasing. Largely because of the excessive railway rates, we are unable to compete with Continental countries, and unless those rates are reduced we cannot continue to compete with any hope of success. I have a good deal of sympathy with Deputy Johnson's Bill, and also with the railway men. There is another thing we must face, and Labour must face, and it is this: the people of the country are nervous about allowing the Government to nationalise industries until Labour has more commonsense than it displayed here during the last few years at the Port of Dublin. Its action at the Port was uncalled for, and it would not be allowed in any country.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Port of Dublin has nothing to do with railway nationalisation.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

The Deputy cannot discuss the Port of Dublin in the debate on the railway question.

Mr. McKENNA: I think I have the right to refer to the situation with regard to the stock conveyed on the railways through various channels to the markets. However, if you rule it is outside the question, I bow to that ruling.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

It is outside the scope of the Railway Bill to refer to the recent position at the Port of Dublin.

Mr. McKENNA: The situation at the present time is that the agricultural population, forming as it does the bulk of the community, has to bear the greatest cost of taxation. For that reason I would like to call attention to the fact that according to the summaries of exports from this country in 1920, there went through the Port of Belfast £93,000,000 worth of material. Of that £15,507,000 represented agriculture and £77,888,000 represented industrial exports. Through all other Irish ports £89,000,000 worth was exported; £68,387,000 representing agriculture, and £21,265,000 representing industrial products. That will show you that the farmers are the wealth producers of the country. They are bearing the biggest part of the taxation. If the Government want revenue, as they do, and if they wish the State to succeed and prosper, they will have to pay a good deal of attention to the stricken, paralysed condition that exists amongst agriculturists.

We have passed over three bad years—three of the worst years known in this country since the famine. It is all fine enough to talk to the effect that wages will not come down. There is a lot of talk about land. The Bank safes of this country contain more that affects the land of the country than the people generally are aware of. The farmers for the last three years, owing to the depreciation in the price of live stock and other things, have had such a hard time that unless they get some consideration, particularly in the matter of reduced railway rates, they will not be able to carry on. When we have the Government proposals before us, we will have a further opportunity of discussing this matter.

I would like to mention that from my experience of railway systems in this country, we are not improving. The present system of management has passed under two juries, and those two juries have condemned it. It is time something was done. It is most confusing to have 28 Boards of Directors in a country with, roughly, 3,000 miles of railways. At the time of the Scotter Railway Commission, the manager of the London North Western Railway said he would manage all the railways in Ireland on two days a week and have the rest of the week for fishing. It is ridiculous to have 28 Boards of Directors managing 28 companies. I favour the setting up of a Board such as is recommended in the report of the O'Connor Commission. With the present railway companies, we have had no opportunity in recent years of putting forward any grievances we had. We had not even a Rates Tribunal such as they have in England.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE at this stage resumed the Chair.

Mr. McKENNA: In England if one had a difficulty about railway rates one could go before the Railway Rates Tribunal, but in Ireland one would merely get the usual red tape reply: "The matter will receive immediate attention." That might mean it would not be attended to until Tibb's Eve. Unless one kept knocking at the front door one would be waiting months for a reply, and even then might receive no satisfaction. There is an obsolete Act which I hope the Dáil will remedy. It is known as the Railway, Canals and Traffic Act of 1864, in which there is the Owners' Risk rate. Anyone who signs under the Owners' Risk rate is bound down by regulations and has no ease if he puts forward a complaint. If you sign for a waggon of cattle, sheep or pigs, and suffer loss, you will be allowed £2 for a pig or sheep, and £15 for cattle. Suppose goods are stolen in transit, you cannot recover any damage. You are given the usual sympathy, but it ends there. In England they have a remedy for those grievances, and we want a similar remedy here.

There are other complaints with regard to the transit of live stock. The other day I saw it stated that in the opinion of some of the most experienced men in the live stock trade, we are losing £3,000,000 a year owing to the cruelty inflicted on cattle in transit. A big man in the live stock trade said to me the other day: "If you want to see the damage done, go to Birkenhead and see one of your cattle stripped and see the bruised mass of flesh; look also at the bacon in the shops and you will see the stroke of the stick quite clearly." In many places, particularly in the West of Ireland, they have short railway banks, and the loading of pigs is rendered very difficult in consequence. The railway companies do not move with the times. The country men have to lift pigs of 2 or 3 cwt. on their shoulders into the waggons, after being out, perhaps, all night and morning. You can well imagine the cruelty, not alone to the animal but to the human being. The railway companies could remedy this by building a few hundred yards of a bank where a special train could be run in. That is the position. At present in Northern Ireland they have this question under consideration, and they also have it under consideration in England. At an early date the matter is coming before the British House of Commons. Here is a statement on the subject:—

"Serious complaint has since reached us through Birkenhead and Glasgow as to the terribly bruised condition of cattle arriving from Ireland. A trader has pointed out that in a bunch of twelve beasts from Ireland every carcass was found to be a mass of bruises and torn flesh. At present he asserted it was the exception to see an Irish bullock free from blemish, whereas Canadian animals, after travelling 3,000 miles, did not show a trace of ill-usage. A report just received from Northern Ireland states that in a shipment from Belfast, in one case 56 cattle were dead, 33 died during the voyage, and 23 were in such a condition that they had to be slaughtered on board. It is altogether too horrible, and steps should be taken to deal severely with those parties responsible."

That is a matter that requires a lot of consideration. How are we going to compete with Denmark and other countries unless our Government here can do something in these matters? I am glad we have a Government now in the people's own hands. It is the duty of the people to nurse this infant State and to make it strong and powerful, and to develop the industries of the country, particularly the live stock industry, which is one of our principal industries and one of the principal things on which we depend. These things will be protected only by improved transit facilities. It is appalling to see what is going on at all the ports. The shipping companies and the railway companies are not pulling together. I have seen cases at the North Wall where the minute a special came in, the engine-driver walked off and the live stock were left there under the canopy of heaven for hours, and poor unfortunate men left there exposed for hours because they would not allow them into the yards. Men have been kept there day and night to protect the cattle. The result is that a lot of the cattle trade has been diverted to the North of Ireland for shipping through their ports as a result of the situation existing in Dublin. That is the reason why something should be done. We are all anxious to support Dublin. Dublin is the premier port and Dublin is the capital of Ireland, and we want to see Dublin the main artery so far as the live stock industry of this country is concerned. Without the support of the Government that cannot be done. I consider the speeches made by the Labour Deputies have been very reasonable. I hope the Government will give consideration to the views put forward by them. So far as the Party with which I am associated is concerned, we will do all we can to co-operate and to make a success of whatever scheme is put forward.

Mr. WILSON: I will be very brief because this matter has been debated at considerable length. I just want to refer to the strictures of our friend, the Minister for Agriculture. He has stated he has never got a constructive idea from the Farmers' Party. I take it our duty is to point out to him where our industry is affected. It is his duty to remedy those conditions. If it came about that we had behind us 50 or 60 supporters, and had the finances of this State at our backs, it would not be long until we would find a remedy for the situation that confronts us at the moment. The question that we are all so concerned about is—how are we to obtain cheaper freights? If we can obtain cheaper freights by any other means rather than by nationalisation, then it is our duty to try those means first. I believe that as good results will be obtained by means of unification as you will obtain by the proposal set forward from the Labour Bench. Every argument which we have heard from Labour in favour of nationalisation would equally apply to unification. The savings which would be effected by a unified management would be such as to enable us to get those reduced rates. The grouping of railways put forward by Deputy McKenna would not give us those savings, because the returned empty waggons from one group to another would have to be hauled back and thereby expense would be incurred. So that by the grouping of railways we would not get the same saving we would get from unification.

I quite agree that when we have a series of groups we will have competition at various points. But in the conditions that exist in this country, and with the railways as they are built, unless you have all the railways under one jurisdiction and administration we cannot have any results in the way of savings, except at a few points. We can count on that saving if we bring in a Unification Bill and we can set up a Rates Tribunal.

The question raised by Deputy Davin of having three separate staffs working a town of 300 people could be remedied by unification. To my mind every argument used by the Labour Party in favour of nationalisation would be equally an argument in favour of unification. The savings which we could obtain by their scheme we could obtain by unification. We should not, until we have tried unification, interfere with private enterprise, and we should not pledge the credit of the State on behalf of any system which would mean taking money from the Central Fund to pay expenses. The whole trouble in the matter is this—that we have not enough traffic to go around to pay for the upkeep of all the railways. As the Minister for Agriculture has put it, we cannot obliterate 46 million pounds worth of capital. By unified management and by a unification system we might be able to carry on and to get these reduced rates. Failing that the only hope we have is to revert to the Labour Party.

Mr. O'CONNELL: There is hope for you yet.

Mr. LYONS: I am more than pleased to learn from the speeches of the Deputies on the farmers' benches that they seem to be entirely in favour of the Bill put forward by the Labour Party. There is one thing to be thankful for at least, and that is that we are unanimous on one thing, even if we are not unanimous on the question of wages. To my mind the Bill put forward by the Labour Party is a most interesting and economical one, and above all things it is one that I believe would solve the most pressing problem that we have to deal with at the present moment. That problem is to break the link in the chain of unemployment.

We have heard from directors of the railways that owing to the rates of wages paid to their employees they cannot possibly reduce the freights. If this Bill gets proper consideration from the members of the Dáil I am sure it will be found that nationalisation will do as much good as amalgamation. This Government, when it started to function, adopted the policy of amalgamating the different poor law institutions in the Saorstát for the purpose of economy. By their amalgamation they held out the plea that the different counties would save some £6,000 to £9,000 per annum. If through the amalgamation of workhouses in the 26 counties we effected a large saving and a great benefit to the people, I think the same would be found to apply if we amalgamated all the railways of Ireland into one body. I ask the Deputies to vote for this Bill when it comes to a division, and I am not appealing on behalf of the labourers or the farmers, but on behalf of the people as a whole. I may be merely a bird of passage, but that is the appeal I make. We are being told that owing to the wages and to the demands of the labour movement the railway directors cannot possibly reduce the fares or freights.

If a man living 50 miles away from Dublin has a beast to send to Dublin Market he has to pay £2 5s. or £2 17s. for the carriage of the animal. That is a very exorbitant figure. Then we have a Canal system, but that is worked by the railway. Why not adopt the proposals laid down in the Bill of the Labour Party? I think the Labour Party have done one thing in bringing in this Bill. It has shown the Directors of the Railway Companies that there is one body in Ireland at least anxious to apply the principles of economy in the country and also has shown how that principle could be applied. I know we have some members of the Dáil who say "What about the shareholders?" But if these shareholders would really look to the proper use of the money they have invested in the railways of Ireland they could see that it would be better employed in giving proper facilities to industry and commerce than in paying large sums to Directors. These Railway Companies frequently spend £20,000 or £30,000 in getting an engine built abroad which could be built much cheaper at home. Two years ago they had an engine in Dublin that cost £24,000, but that engine was never yet started. That was done for the purpose of showing by the way that owing to the demands of labour they could not run the railways without reducing the wages of the workers. By supporting this Bill Deputies would show that they were genuine Irishmen and good citizens of the Saorstát. If they voted for the Bill and for nationalisation they would be voting in favour of keeping the workers of Ireland in employment and at the same time reducing rates and fares to the public.

The PRESIDENT: I think it is due to the draftsman of the Bill that he should know we are in agreement as to the lucidity and also as to the brevity of its provisions. It is certainly a very remarkable contribution to constructive legislation and I hope we will have many more such examples but that the speeches relating to them will be shorter and perhaps fewer. I think Deputy Johnson deserves all that has been said about him in dealing with this matter, and I think he ought to be very well satisfied with the reception the Bill has got. I am certain from what I have known of this particular problem, and I have been consulted about it now for a very considerable period, that it would not be possible to have brought in this Bill without the very closest study and very great knowledge of the railways generally in Ireland and of the whole subject. This matter of the railways in Ireland is a very intricate and complicated one. We have, I believe, 38 different railway companies in the Saorstát; and they are of various orders from the great big companies down to such railways as the Dublin, Blessington and Poulaphouca, and the Dublin and Lucan Tramway Company. I do not think in any Bill we will introduce that either of these companies will be included. There is also, I believe, a remarkable contribution to railway road construction in the South.

A DEPUTY: The Lartigue.

The PRESIDENT: With rolling stock of a very unique kind.

Mr. JOHNSON: Very much rolling.

The PRESIDENT: These 38 separate undertakings have, for the most part, separate management, staffs, rolling stock, repair establishments and other incidents of railway systems. They differ materially and radically from each other in methods, policy, service rendered, revenue earned, equipment. From the opinion given to me on the subject, I believe, that to regard them as one system the imagination has to make an effort which the facts do not support. The system, as it is, is not self-contained. In the North of Ireland it consists of undertakings which go in and out many times over the Boundary, and we must remember that that Boundary is not yet permanently fixed. Apart from that consideration and regarding the system as an internal one in the Saorstát, there are problems arising from the fact that a large proportion of the Irish trade is carried on with places outside the Saorstát, in Great Britain and in the Six Counties, and that the Saorstát railways for much of the traffic they carry are part only, and often the smallest part of the through-routes on which the system of trade has grown up to great dimensions carried at through rates. These railways form a link with Cross Channel trade and are owned, some of them, by Railway Companies, and some by Shipping Companies. The third link is formed by the great English Corporations that deliver Irish produce over Great Britain and that collect produce in Great Britain for transit to Ireland.

In any scheme for reorganisation these factors must be taken into account. The nature of Irish rail-borne traffic must be considered, the services rendered by the Irish ports and by the shipping that uses them, must be understood, and the interests which all the parties to this great system of communication have, not only in the portion under their direct control, but in the directions from which they receive traffic, must be properly appreciated. When the problems confronting the Government for solution during the past year are considered, and when the complexity of this railway problem is appreciated, I think the Dáil will not be surprised that the Government has not within that time been able to present them with a detailed reorganisation scheme. The Bill promoted by Deputy Johnson, however the complexities of the system may have been known to the draughtsman, throws very little light on their detailed solution, but the essential principle of this Bill, as I think Deputy O'Connell said, is nationalisation, and it is, of course, on that principle, coupled with the financial provisions, that I would prefer to discuss it. The Government, I think, has come to the conclusion, not without some reason, that the Saorstát is a country that is pretty considerably governed, and to add to it the responsibilities of a very complex railway organisation, such as this is, in its very early stages, is certainly adding a burden which, I think, the State is scarcely sufficiently strong to bear just at present.

It has been compared, in so far as the proposals for the acquisition of the railways are concerned, somewhat to the Land Purchase Act, which has been passed, and which was really a sort of step-brother to a previous Act that was passed in the year 1903. Before that Land Bill was introduced in 1903, a certain agreement was reached between the two parties to the transaction, and the State came in with its credit. In this particular instance we go in with more than our credit, and we go in, not to make an arrangement between two parties, but rather to take over the assets and the liabilities of the one, and to pay to the other what would be considered a fair price. That was not exactly the situation which confronted the people concerned with finding accommodation between the landlords in 1903 and the tenants of that period. In this particular case it is proposed to take a certain income, the average, I think, for five years, and to multiply it by fifteen, and to let that be the nominal value of the transfer. In turn, that would produce what would be a 4½ per cent. stock. Whatever the agreement as regards the capital sum, it would bear 4½ per cent. interest. It would be rather difficult, and I am sure the draughtsman of the Bill would admit this, to get anything like a normal year without going back to the year 1913. One could not accept, I think, any of the figures which deal with the intervening years.

Taking that particular year as the standard, my information is that something over one million pounds was paid in dividends to the shareholders, and in considering the question of shareholders Deputies ought to remember that shareholders in concerns such as railways are not exclusively the well-to-do. Many of their stocks, being regarded as trustee stocks, one should be very careful about tampering with a security of that sort, because you may be faced with another problem, not, perhaps, as serious, but in the long run it may have greater disadvantages even than some of the problems we have at the moment to consider. Taking the figure of one million pounds as the sum which it would be fair to purchase at—

Mr. JOHNSON: I suppose the President is referring to the figure of one million as an example, because in reality it is much more than a million.

The PRESIDENT: The figure would probably be one million two hundred thousand pounds. Taking that as the figure at which it would be fair to purchase at and multiplying it by fifteen you get a total of about 16½ millions. The amount of capital on which interest or dividends was payable was twenty-seven and a half millions, so that someone has got to lose a very considerable sum of money, and if we took the figure at sixteen and a half millions the dividend payable on that would amount to about £742,000. There would be in that case a very considerable loss, falling not altogether on those who probably buy luxuries for whatever dividends they get from the railways, but perhaps on orphans, widows, and people of that sort, as well as on charitable institutions. If you deprive any of these people, or these institutions, of revenue they will certainly look to you to supplement it in some other way. It may be reasonably stated on behalf of these people that in the case of well managed companies at that time, from the point of view of dividend paying and of consolidating their interests and of having reserves and so on, there was a sum earned over and above that which they would be entitled to claim as having some sort of interest in. It is customary, when one sees the reports of company meetings in the papers, to find that after a certain sum has been devoted to the payment of dividends, that so much is carried forward and so much is put to the reserve fund.

We must also remember that for the last two and, possibly, three years or more, these railways have been subjected to very considerable interference. I recollect hearing last year that the revenue of one of these railway companies was something like 50 per cent. short by reason of the interference with its business. It would, therefore, seem, from the point of view of nationalisation, that at this time when we come to consider taking over those concerns they are at their very worst, and that they are going to be sold for something like scrap. I would say to the Dáil with regard to that, that just now, in our very earliest years, we ought to approach the consideration of a subject like this very carefully, so as to maintain the position that we have acquired. That is, that our credit is fairly good and that there is generally prevalent throughout the country a feeling of confidence that there is not likely to be, either now or in the future, any schemes put forward here for consideration of a confiscatory nature. I would say that Deputy Johnson and the Labour Party have met us quite fairly with regard to that; that they do say that the real issue in this business is nationalisation, and that the details are matters upon which they are prepared to be convinced, granted that a case is put up accordingly. Since 1914, I think, it would also be right to say that with all the faults of the railway management, or all the complaints that one may make against railway directors, they have scarcely had a free hand in the management of their respective concerns.

The Government idea is that there ought to be a period of trial. Possibly that period of trial may be a period in which a great many errors may crop up. But I do not think it is at all likely, having regard to the general condition of affairs, that railway directors will be utterly unmindful of the real needs of the country, of the general feeling that there is that more consideration should be given to traders and business interests, and that the railways should realise that their sole object is not to have comfortable directorships and not to be paying big dividends, but that the public generally have some right to benefits which those systems should provide for them. I should say that it would be for the railway companies and their employees, when reorganisation was carried through, to apply their best energies to the successful working of the reorganised system. The prospects of stockholders, directors, officials and employees alike, in respect of dividends, salaries and wages, must ultimately depend upon the efficiency of the railway system.

I think that it has come to this, not alone with regard to the railways but in regard to every other interest in the Saorstát, that both employers and employees alike must cut their cloth according to the measure, according to the needs of the country and the various other services. Because I do not think that it is put forward that any service in this country, either agriculture, railways, or any of the other industrial concerns, can be really independent of one another. There is a link between them, and any failure on the part of one, or failure of one, will ultimately have its reactions upon the others.

I think that it is unnecessary to assure the Dáil that neither thought nor trouble has been spared by the Government during the past 12 months in working on this question. Deputies may smile at that, but I think that most Deputies of all parties in the Dáil will realise that when there are questions, divisions, disputes or other things of that sort, it does take months to find accommodation on them. There are occasions on which accommodation is not found, and we have got to come here and put up proposals, which in some cases do not appeal to either of the parties to the dispute. Still it is the duty of the Government to see as far as possible how accommodation may be found. We have had evidence of that quite recently. We had it some months ago in connection with the Farmers' Party, and I suppose that the turn of the Business Party or the Independents is coming, and that we will also have the same story to tell.

In addition to the great lines there are the smaller lines, some of those which I am sure the Farmers' Party know quite well—the Baronial Guaranteed Lines. There are burdens there which these Deputies understand quite well and which they find it rather difficult to bear just at present. Reorganisation as far as they are concerned is absolutely essential. The real question is, if we cannot have nationalisation, what is the next alternative? I think that the problem to be solved is how far management can be centralised. There are, of course, limitations in connection with this matter of central management which must be admitted. The Northern Boundary has not yet been determined, and no final settlement of the railway problem is possible before a final settlement of the Boundary question. I think that fact is admitted, even in the Bill, so that I am sure Deputy Johnson will have nothing to quarrel with me about that. Nothing would be gained, and many disadvantages would follow, from the application now of any drastic scheme of organisation of the several undertakings whose lines go in and out over the present boundary, and it would not be common-sense to propose to sever them. There are other considerations which require examination by any Government anxious to devise a policy best suited to the free and harmonious interchange of traffic in future between the Irish railways and the shipping lines and railways in other countries working in conjunction with them. It is well known that the English Railway Corporations, particularly the railways on the West coast of Great Britain, are interested in Irish traffic. They have incurred large expenditure on railway and harbour works in this country, and have performed many great services to the Irish trading public in the provision of shipping and railway facilities. I think it will be admitted that much Irish trade is dependent upon these facilities.

The Irish public, whether it sends or receives goods by rail, or whether it consumes the goods after they have been delivered by the railways, is under an obligation to the successive managements of English railways for the services rendered to them. I expect that we may rather rely on the maintenance and development of these facilities according to the changed needs of the time. The Government will, certainly, do whatever it reasonably can to continue to promote close working relations with these companies, with the shipping companies engaged in the Cross Channel traffic, and with the railways beyond our Northern boundary should it prove that the boundary is fixed anywhere south of the north coast.

I mention these considerations to show that the Bill now before the Dáil is perhaps a little too plain and simple and that this question is a very intricate and delicate matter of business. I am not in a position at the present moment to give a detailed indication of the Government's views on railway re-organisation. The Government has not completed its examination of all the factors involved in the problem, but it would be neglecting its duty if it put forward a scheme in which the bearing of any particular important point was obscure. I hope to present the Government measure to the Dáil before long. It is not intended to do so until we are satisfied that it is the measure best calculated to promote the interests of the Saorstát. Other than unemployment I do not know that there is any other subject which has absorbed more of our time and attention. Though we have not yet found a solution that we would be satisfied to present to the Dáil, nothing has been lost by reason of the time that has passed since the matter was first raised here. I think I have nothing further to say except that I appreciate, like every other member of the Dáil, this great effort of Deputy Johnson and the people supporting him, and the considerate manner in which they have dealt with this big subject. They have put it forward and they have been met generously on all sides. Those who differed most with them certainly had to admit that there was great genius shown and great attention paid to the drafting of this Bill by them and that it was treated in a masterly manner. However, I think I would be failing in my duty if I did not ask the Dáil to reject this measure after what I have said on the subject.

Mr. JOHNSON: If the object of the Bill had been to extract from the Government some idea of what is running in their minds we have certainly not succeeded very far. The President has skimmed very lightly over the problem. He has re-stated the problem to some extent and told us what no one will dissent from, that the problem is a complex one and that some plan of centralisation is required. That, of course, may mean centralisation within a very small radius or a very large radius. But we are told the Government has not yet completed its consideration of the problem. Therefore we must wait—or rather, shall I say, the traders, the farmers, and the railway stockholders must wait.

I want to disabuse the minds of certain Deputies who cannot think that it is possible for a political party to have views on any public question which are not intended to feather the nests of the people combined in that political party. This Bill has been thought over and introduced with an eye to the public interest solely. It will not advantage the railway servants if it is passed. So far as railway servants are concerned, I honestly believe they are quite able to fight their own corner with the railway companies. If the Dáil prefers that they should remain as they are, or prefers to follow Deputy Hewat's view of the way this problem should be treated, well, the men employed on the railways can go along without very much concern at the loss of this Bill.

But we have been taunted occasionally with having a facility for expressing general ideas. We have also been challenged to bring forward definite proposals to see how far it is possible to suggest concrete plans to embody the general ideas expressed from these benches.

We have endeavoured to do so in presenting this Bill. But, as I said earlier, we have endeavoured to do so with an eye to the welfare of this country, not merely in the immediate future, but for years to come. We are not blind to the developments that are taking place throughout the world. We know that a revolution is proceeding to-day in the methods of transit and transport. We are perhaps very nearly in a fairly parallel period with the early years of the 19th century, the 'Thirties, the 'Forties and 'Fifties, when railway transport was in its infancy. A revolutionary idea was introduced with the steam locomotive. A revolutionary idea has been introduced with the rise and development of the internal combustion engine. We are looking forward so that we shall in this country be in a position to take advantage of all the new ideas in industry, in commerce, and in transit. While it has seemed that all the discussion has centred round the question of the nationalisation of railways, that is not the only, and possibly not the main idea embodied in this Bill; necessarily it occupies the greater portion of it. We have suggested that there should be set up a Ministry of Transport and Communications and that by a gradual process that Ministry should become responsible for the co-ordination of the services of transport and communications of the country—services to the community, services to the nation, services essential to national development. It has been found necessary in other countries in times of stress to have some body co-ordinating this work of transport, to ensure that these services shall be devoted to the national well-being.

We contend that that cannot be done efficiently. It cannot be done effectively if you have the various methods of transport and communication under various, differing and perhaps antagonistic authorities. We see if there were a co-ordinated system that there would be much economy, that there would be opportunities for fitting in the one service with the other service, taking the fullest advantage of the one system according to the class of traffic or communication that had to be made, to utilise railways and telegraphs, railways and posts, railways and roads, railways and canals, and perhaps eventually railways and the air service, when it would be developed. That is a very important portion of this Bill, and I hope, notwithstanding what may be the fate of it at this stage, that the Government in its consideration of the railway problem will give due consideration to the wider and perhaps more important problem of who is to control the means of communication within this country, who is to control and co-ordinate the services of transport in this country for the common well-being. It is acknowledged by everyone who has any right to speak on such a subject that with modern development, mechanical and otherwise, inter-communication between places within the State or between the State and other States, in the most effective manner by the cheapest means, will play a great part in the development of the State. It is for those who oppose this idea of co-ordination under a single authority to prove that competitive services, rival services, antagonistic services, each conducted with a different purpose for a different end, are going to bring about the best results for the nation. I know Deputy Hewat will contend—he did contend in his speech—that it is by a conflict of interests that the residuum of best and most efficient service is obtained. "Every man for himself or every interest for itself, and the devil take the hindmost. Free competition and the survival of the fittest." Though it may be that Deputy Hewat speaks for the interest of commerce in Ireland, and that the interests of commerce are bound up with the application of that philosophy. I would submit that it is thousands of years out of date, and that although it has been revived in commerce and in industry within the last century or two, we have arrived at the conclusion that while it may produce the end desired, the cost of production of that end is altogether too great.

The waste of life and energy is too great, and we ought, as a society, as a nation, to do what the individual does, take advantage of the foresight that has been granted and used, that foresight to avoid the waste, and the contentions and the rivalries which this system of competition—the survival of the fittest—inevitably brings in its trail. While I hope that the Government, in considering their solution of this problem, will take seriously into account the desirability of setting up this co-ordinating authority, whether railways are nationalised or not, I will be obliged to devote the greater part of what I have to say to the criticism of the proposal (which is contained in the Bill) to nationalise railways.

The critics have ranged themselves in two camps, those who would, like Deputy Hewat, prefer not to interfere but to allow matters to take their own course, to allow the various interests to fight those matters out amongst themselves. Deputy Hewat, for instance, would only have the minimum amount of interference with railway companies. If there are complaints about the rates charged on traffic, say from Dublin to Cork, he would prefer that the traders should charter steamers, and send their goods round by sea, or utilise the roads for motor traffic. That might fit in with the general trend of Deputy Hewat's conception of social life, but I cannot see yet, notwithstanding the development in mechanical science, the steamboat that is going to deliver goods or land passengers in Cork from Dublin within anything like the time that the railways will do it. If it is suggested that the only alternative to paying excessive rates or fares to the railway companies is to send goods or passengers round by sea, then I think the trading community or the travelling community will not thank Deputy Hewat for his solution. But there is the alternative of road transport. Deputy Hewat is violently against any thought of nationalisation. He speaks for the mercantile community, and he suggests, as an alternative to using the railways, that traders should use the nationalised roads. "You must not touch the railways in the way of nationalisation, but to fight the railways you are to use the collectivised roads." I wonder whether there would be really any advantage to the trading community in long distance traffic by motor if the owners of motor wagons had to pay what is really due to the community for the use of those roads. The community—as I think in some of his moments even Deputy Hewat would agree—has provided those roads, and provides for the upkeep of them out of common funds. The trading community, for whom Deputy Hewat speaks, wants to take advantage of those roads, provided out of common funds, to fight the railway companies.

Then we have the criticism of Deputy Hewat, which is repeated by one or two other speakers, respecting the alleged impossibility of successfully managing a unified, nationalised railway system by a Board. Some of the critics—especially Deputy Hewat—prefer to maintain twenty-eight or forty-six separate, distinct Boards. I submit, as against that proposition, that no alternative proposal has yet been made which does not suggest the institution of a Board either to manage, or to assist in managing, the railways. Nobody has suggested—or, shall I say, nobody has had the audacity to suggest—that someone yet unnamed would nominate a person, irresponsible and without assistance, to undertake the management and control of the roads, absolutely. I venture to say that the proposal in the Bill is the nearest proposal that has yet been made to the management of the railway system by a dictator. The proposal is that an expert in railway management should be made a director, and that he should be assisted by—not controlled by—a Board, nominated in the way outlined by the various persons, or groups of persons, whose interests are chiefly affected. I would point out to Deputy McKenna that there is an almost perfect adaptation in the Bill of the proposals of the O'Connor Commission.

The only difference in the Bill from the recommendation of the Commission, in that respect, is that the persons to be appointed to assist the Director are appointed after consultation with the bodies concerned, and not by nomination. The reason for that was that we were drafting a Bill, not making a general recommendation. We recognised, in drafting the Bill, that the interests concerned are not represented by permanent bodies, but by temporary bodies, and, perhaps, by bodies who would not be admitted to be generally representative of the parties concerned. That by the way.

Deputy Hewat, in speaking for the mercantile community and criticising this proposal regarding a Board, might have looked up other proposals of a similar kind. He might, for instance, have referred to the Board recommended by the Scotter Commission, which, I think, suggested that it should be constituted of over twenty persons, the great majority of whom were to be appointed by elected authorities—County Councils or Committees of County Councils. The majority of the Scotter Commission, as somebody has pointed out, were not feather-headed labour men, but comprised Sir John Scotter, Lord Pirrie, Sir Hutcheson Poë and another member, whose name I cannot recall at the moment. Their proposal was for a very much larger committee of twenty Directors, twelve to represent ratepayers and to be elected by the County Councils. Perhaps it would be interesting to Deputy Hewat, and to those who think with him, if I quoted him the proposal of that body which Deputy O'Mahony got his brief from—the Stockholders' Protection Association. They proposed a Board which might number twenty, of whom ten might be appointed members. The Executive of this Irish Stockholders' Protection Association contained quite a number of very eminent business men. Then we are charged with suggesting methods which are in fact confiscatory. Deputy O'Mahony and others on the Government benches, Deputy Hewat and one or two others, I think, hinted at confiscation, and Deputy Egan reminded us of the Railways Act of 1854, which gave the Government of the day rights and authority to take over railways at 25 years' purchase on the previous three years' average earnings, I think. Now, confiscation evidently does not enter into it when a Government has already the right to take over railways. The only question is the price, and the moral slur which is suggested when one uses the word "confiscation" fails, and it is only a question of whether the price shall be 25 years or 15 years or 10 years or 50 years. If they are to be taken over compulsorily there is just as much confiscation in the one case as in the other. But Deputy Egan rather pressed the suggestion of 25 years. I wonder whether he really would propose seriously to the Dáil that 25 years' purchase of the five best years in railway history should be the basis of any transfer of the railways from private owners to the State. This is the proposal of the railway stockholders—25 years of the best of the 3 years ended the 31st December, 1913, plus an allowance for capital expended which is not fructifying, and interest on the sum required for the cost of winding up, including the payment of necessary compensation. It is very generous of the Stockholders' Protection Association, and for Deputy Egan, who is backing up their claims—

Mr. EGAN: On a point of personal explanation, I did not say that I advocated 25 years' purchase. I simply commented on the difference between Sir Robert Peel's proposal and Deputy Johnson's.

Mr. JOHNSON: Well, Sir Robert Peel lived a long time ago, and many things have happened since his time. Irish land has been bought, and if Deputy Egan dissociates himself from the suggestion that as high as 25 years' purchase should be given when taking over the railways, I take it that somewhere between 15 years' and 25 years' is in his mind as reasonable. I wonder how far from 15 or how much less than 25 is in his mind? Has he thought about it at all? Has he made any calculations on the matter? Has he considered what is going to be the effect of the purchase at either of these prices upon the trading public, upon the State, or upon the railway stockholders? I submit that critics of our proposals should at least have given some consideration to the problem in its effects upon each of these various interests. If the 25 years' proposal of the railway stockholders, which is not now Deputy Egan's proposal, were accepted, we would be not only giving the railway stockholders what Deputy O'Mahony would like them to get, but we would be guaranteeing them an income on the best year in railway history, guaranteed by the State. Does anybody openly avow that that is his wish, in view of the circumstances of the time? It is even acknowledged by railway managers that in the pre-war period railwaymen were underpaid, and it was argued at that time by traders, farmers and manufacturers, that railway rates were then too high. If railway rates were too high they have to be reduced, and if railway wages were too low they have to be raised if justice were to be done to either party. Consequently if a fair average, a fair basis of calculation, is to be taken, it would be much less than the highest year of railway income, but the generous Stockholders' Protection Association, not backed up by Deputy Egan, would ask the State to guarantee the very best year of income, when the two elements which contributed most to making that high income, were justly complaining of the conditions which led to the earning of that income.

Then we have taken that five years' period as a basis of our calculation and have suggested a maximum of 15 years of that best period. It is true that it is not for us to say: "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther" if the Dáil desires. We submit that it is very generous to the railway stockholders, at least as generous as the Minister for Agriculture and the Dáil were to the landholders. Bear in mind—and I hope the President will take a note of this—that there is a difference between the chance—shall I say the limited security—of a railway company, even to trustee stockholders, and the security of the State, and if I may suggest a fairly definite opinion, having examined this problem from all sides as well as I can, the railway shareholders will probably be getting out of their holdings very well if they take our proposal.

The Government plan, or Deputy Hewat's, may be the best for the State as an organised institution. I do not think it will be best for the State as a social organism or a trading community. I think it may be best for the State and worse for the stockholder as compared with this Bill. I think we are giving away something to the stockholders in the interests of harmony and because we believe it might be the cheapest way to buy good-will and national development.

There are one or two points of misunderstanding that rather impede any due consideration of this problem that I would like to clear away, and they are these. Irish railwaymen are not paid as high as English railwaymen. I will simply make the assertion without trying to prove it, and I say it confidently and without any hesitation.

We have records here, not our own compilation, which would prove it, but I do not want to delay the Dáil. Irish railwaymen are not paid as high a rate as those in England or Scotland. Railway wages have come down to the extent on the aggregate, of about £1,500,000 in the last two years, working out at about £1 per week per man on the average. The argument has been made by several Deputies in the hope, I have no doubt, of influencing the Government, and I think no side has gone very deeply into the question, but in general one could see that the trend of thought in the matter is in favour of unification. Farmers are not quite agreed as to whether there should be a mere grouping, retaining a certain amount of competition, or whether there should be unification, but I will assume that the general agreement of critics on our proposal is that there should be something in the way of unification, but without nationalisation. This fear of nationalisation, because it has been introduced by the Labour Party, is very amusing. If it had been introduced by Deputy O'Higgins, for instance, or the President, no doubt it would have been considered quite safe, and not at all likely to raise the bogey of Socialism or Bolshevism, and Deputy Gorey might in such circumstances sleep the sleep of calmness and innocence.

Mr. HEWAT: I assure Deputy Johnson it would be less acceptable from the Government Benches.

Mr. JOHNSON: Deputy Hewat would prefer that it came from the Labour rather than the Government Benches, presumably because he thinks that, coming from the Labour Benches, it has not quite the same chance of being embodied into law, but let us wait and see. I imagine that the reason for this delay and hesitation on the part of the President to divulge his plans is that they do not like to introduce a plan of nationalisation. They would flee from it if they could, but facts are forcing them, and they are trying to delay making the plunge as long as possible. Every Deputy who advocated unification said at the same time that there must be State control. That sounds too much like nationalisation, but that there must be control, some kind of intervention, something to prevent the unified companies doing what they like with their own, and that there must be something to prevent them charging too much to the traders, manufacturing interests, and the travelling public. I read an extract from a statement by Mr. Ackworth, who was one of the Scotter Commission, a well-known railway authority, and he frankly said that the railway authorities could put their fingers in the eyes of any Railway Rates Commission at any time, and they had done it. You may set up your control, and hope to take a little off here, but, the Minister for Agriculture said, "if you take a little off here you have to put a little on there," if you are to guarantee your stockholders a reasonable rate of interest, and pay your railway servants a reasonable rate of pay your Rates Commission may alter a little here and a little there, but you will not get much out of that kind of control.

What else are you doing? You speak of railway control under Government authority, and then when you complain of mismanagement and bad services the railway companies will simply say: "What can we do? Take these people out of the way and we will show you what we can do; remove this incubus of Government control; remove this Rates Commission, and we will have our own way, and then we can show you how we will run things." We have been referring to the Land Act which was passed as a logical conclusion to the introduction of dual ownership of the land. If you introduce dual control into the railway services, with directorships on one hand and general managers and a Government authority, called Rates Commission, on the other, you are introducing dual control, by a roundabout method, the ultimate end of which will be either complete private ownership without any control, or complete private ownership without any shareholders. So that your alternative proposal of unification will, I submit, inevitably lead to public ownership, or something very much worse, which no one in the debate has publicly faced: unified ownership of the railways, unified control with private ownership of the stocks on the public sharemarket, rival railway companies in England, each scheming for an extra share of the Irish traffic; a desire to serve the interests of their companies possibly, I will not say deliberately, but possibly and probably at the expense of Irish public benefit. It is much more profitable to encourage the store cattle trade between Ireland and England than an internal trade in Irish manufacture. But your privately-owned unified railways, or your privately-owned grouped railways, will be gobbled up by these interests, which are British railway combine interests, and not Irish interests at all. Are you prepared to see these combinations in England get real financial control of the Irish railway system, and having financial control of the Irish railway systems, and a very big say in the course of Irish commercial, industrial and manufacturing development? That is one of the risks you are running. I will look forward with interest to the proposals of the Government when either a public Bill or a Railway Companies Bill is brought to the Dáil to allow a unification of Irish railways, to find out what kind of preservative clauses are going to be inserted to ensure that these railways will be devoted to the interests of Ireland, not to the interests of English or Scottish railway companies.

Deputy O'Mahony picked out a phrase from my statement when introducing this Bill. He stated that I frankly admitted that this nationalisation scheme was not going to be a success, because I suggested, that in my opinion an efficient railway service in Ireland would probably require something in the nature of a State subsidy. I stated at the same time that this Bill did not contemplate a State subsidy. But I say this, that an efficient railway service in Ireland, serving Ireland, whether privately owned or publicly owned, will, in my opinion, call for a State subsidy, if it is to be efficient. I think the facts of life around us, the facts relating to railways, to industries, to agriculture, to the population of Ireland, and to all the circumstances, show me at any rate that a railway service in Ireland, if it is a railway service running independently of any other transport organisation, to be comparable in efficiency with the service in other countries, supplying a big market across the water, will require something in the nature of a subsidy. I put it to the Dáil as worthy of consideration at least, and as the suggestion of many acute minds and thinkers in economic matters—I do not subscribe to it wholly myself—that the best and safest alternative to protective tariffs will be a subsidy to railways for the purpose of encouraging Irish trade. Deputy O'Mahony, notwithstanding his denunciation of the principles of the Bill, his suggestion that it was confiscatory and his general and unsatisfactory attempt to state the case of the Irish Railway Stockholders' Association, summed up by saying that the present Bill was premature. It was bad, evil in its conception, false in its premises and in its conclusion, but it was premature. I am rather inclined to suggest to Deputies—Deputy Egan frankly stated it—that they all felt that it is merely a question of time, it is merely a question of a few years until the State shall take over the railway services. Well, if that is so, do you think it good business to allow all the present stockholders, and to allow the present railway interests to dig themselves in, to strengthen their vested interests, and to make it more and more difficult to buy them out at the end of a few years' time?

I suggest if you are looking forward to a period merely of a few years, you are unwise in postponing the action, and you should do it at once and not attempt to play with this business when you are quite convinced that any intervening period will merely serve to prepare the way for State acquisition of the Irish railways. I want Deputies to bear in mind that if you want to get back, as the railway companies do, to something approximating a pre-war state of affairs, you are asking us to consent to a proposition that out of every £1 paid in railway freights, and in passenger fares, 13/- to 13/6 is used to provide the service, and the remainder is used to pay shareholders and stockholders. It may be inevitable, and I frankly confess, that for a period of 67 or 72 years even under this Bill that same consideration will have to be given; but it is very well worthy of note that when any Deputy goes to the booking office of a railway company and pays £1 for a ticket, by that act he is handing over 6/6 or 7/- to railway shareholders.

Deputy Heffernan contributed to this debate, and he, too, is against nationalisation. I think he is in favour of the retention of the railways in private hands, with some hope that by doing so, either by that means or by a grouping system which he preferred, you would be able to reduce freights and pay a reasonable dividend to stockholders. In his condemnation of nationalisation he produced an example of Canadian railways. He rather hesitated to continue his quotations when I asked him to go on with the figures of other companies. If there is any example required to be quoted against his case, it is the very example that he gave the Dáil. The Grand Trunk Railway, for instance, had to be taken over by the State in response to the demand of the populace. It was bankrupt. A private railway concern had gone to the dogs completely, and, in deference to popular demand, had to be taken over by the State. Notwithstanding an appeal to the Privy Council, the ordinary shareholders got nothing. They had no right.

Mr. HEWAT: May I remark that the ordinary shareholders had not got anything before.

Mr. JOHNSON: True; they got nothing under private management.

[Mr. Johnson.]

But Deputy Hewat suggests they ought to have got something under State management, it being so much better. Really it is a pity for the case against nationalisation that Deputy Heffernan should have adduced the reference to the Canadian railways. I do not want to alarm Irish stockholders, but perhaps the introduction of this Bill, in this form by the Labour Party, might be the best security they have. It may be that their concerns also will prove bankrupt; Deputy Woulfe described them as insolvent concerns. It may be that they may be pleading to the State to nationalise them, backed up, as I expect they very soon will be, by the merchant community and the agricultural community. Perhaps the fact that we have introduced this Bill suggesting these terms will be quoted in support of their claims for reasonable compensation. I give notice here and now that it is without prejudice that this Bill has been introduced and that the financial clauses have been inserted in the manner in which they have been.

I was interested and pleased with the contribution of the Minister for Agriculture, and I do not want to go far in dealing with his arguments. He said all the advantages claimed for nationalisation could be got by unification. All the advantages of administration, I agree, but possibly, and probably, the disadvantages that national benefit may not be—I put it as low as that—the primary purpose of unified non-nationalised railways. If we take the alternative, advantages of unification can be got by nationalisation, plus the advantage of a clear intention to serve the common interest of the State; then I say the case for nationalisation as against unification is very much strengthened. As to the Minister for Agriculture, though speaking as Deputy Hogan, I must say there was a certain timidity which is not usually to be found in his contributions to discussions in the Dáil. We must give private enterprise a trial, if private enterprise is properly controlled by the Government. That is Deputy Hogan's proposition: that private enterprise must have a trial. Let us try them a little longer, if you please, and let us give them proper control by the Government. Then, he suggests that our proposal to take the railways at this stage—and I think that notion was running through the President's mind in his statement—our proposal to take the railways over is in the nature of punishment; but really it is not so at all. We are, as Deputy Hewat said, and we are proud of it, endeavouring to take the chestnuts out of the fire, to take the chestnuts for the public interest out of the fire of the privately owned railways. We have no shame in that at all, and if the Government cannot see its way to do this work for fear of burning its fingers we are prepared to make that little sacrifice in the common interest.

I have talked very much too long. I want to say that the Bill is being presented to the Dáil as a carefully considered proposal, worked out with some detail to meet the needs, not of railway employees, but to meet the needs of the State, to meet the needs of the trading community, having due regard to the legitimate interests of the stockholders.

No alternative proposal has been made, and I ask the Dáil to vote for the Bill with the double intention that the railways shall be nationalised and that there shall be set up a central authority co-ordinating the various transport services, those dealing with communications for the purpose of linking them up and serving the common good. It is a Second Reading, and not a final Reading, that we ask for. We ask the Dáil to agree to a Second Reading, and to indicate to the Government, having given the Second Reading to this Bill, that it is then their duty to take it over and to introduce amendments and to make the best of it according to their views as to how it can be improved. We ask the Dáil to agree that the time has passed for a longer delay in this matter, that the companies, the public, and all concerned, have had long notice, and that at least the principle embodied in this Bill should be granted a Second Reading.

Question put: "That the Bill be now read a second time."

The Dáil divided: TÁ, 16; NÍL, 56.

ADJOURNMENT.

PRESIDENT: I move the adjournment of the Dáil till 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The Dáil adjourned at 10 p.m.

DÁIL ÉIREANN.

CEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS.
ORAL ANSWERS.

APPEALS AGAINST SHAW COM-MISSION AWARDS.

Mr. CONNOR HOGAN asked the President whether, arising out of the reference by the Minister for Finance to the independence of the Shaw Commission, the Government has any power on appeal by an aggrieved citizen of the Saorstát to call for reconsideration of a claim.

The PRESIDENT: The Compensation (Ireland) Commission was set up by agreement between the British Government and the Irish Government "to determine what compensation ought in reason and fairness to be paid." The Commission consists of representatives of both Governments and its impartiality cannot be impugned. The only cases in which representations could conceivably be made in respect of awards by the Commission are cases where material additional evidence has become available subsequent to the making of the award.

ATHLONE MERCHANT'S CLAIM AGAINST "BLACK AND TANS."

SEAN O LAIDHIN asked the Minister for Finance if a claim had been received from Mr. J. Grenham, Connaught Street, Athlone, in respect of motor cars damaged by "Black and Tans," bacon destroyed, and personal injuries to the amount of £1,032; to ask how soon the claim is likely to be paid.

MINISTER for FINANCE (Mr. E. Blythe): No claims for damage to property on behalf of the person named have been lodged with the Compensation Branch of the Ministry, but it is understood that several such claims are at present the subject of investigation by the Compensation (Ireland) Commission.

A claim for personal injuries sustained by Mr. John Grenham is recorded in the Ministry, and will be dealt with in due course under arrangements which are at present being considered.

MILITARY OCCUPATION OF TULLAMORE PREMISES.

Mr. P. J. EGAN asked the Minister for Finance when the rates in the cases of two houses taken over by the Military in Tullamore, amounting to £49 7s. 6d., and £5 5s., respectively, which accrued during their occupation, will be paid to the Tullamore Urban District Council.

Mr. BLYTHE: In arriving at the compensation payable in the case of premises commandeered by the Military the principle adopted is that such compensation shall be inclusive of rates. The Tullamore District Council should accordingly present their claim to the occupiers of the premises in question.

WHITEGATE (CO. CLARE) CLAIM AGAINST BRITISH.

PADRAIG O hOGAIN (An Clár) asked the Minister for Finance if he received an application from Ralph Lucas, Whitegate, Co. Clare, in respect of destruction done to his property by British Forces in June, 1921, and if he can state how soon compensation may be paid him in its respect.

Mr. BLYTHE: No claim on behalf of the person referred to by the Deputy has been received in the Compensation Branch of the Ministry, but as a result of enquiries which have been made at the Offices of the Compensation (Ireland) Commission, it has been ascertained that a claim for two motors taken and damaged in June, 1921, is at present under investigation.

INJURIES TO RETURNED AMERICAN.

PADRAIG O HOGAIN (An Clár) asked the Minister for Finance if he has received an application from Edmund Burke, Molesky, Mullagh, Co. Clare, for compensation in respect of injuries sustained by him on August 17th, 1922, at a place called Knocknagoshill, Co. Kerry, when on his way home to Clare from the United States.

Mr. BLYTHE: A claim for compensation has been received in this case by the Compensation Personal Injuries Committee. Investigations are at present proceeding in regard to the case, and when these are completed the Committee will be in a position to make a recommendation to me.

WARRANTS FOR ARRESTS.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS asked the Minister for Home Affairs if he will make arrangements for all detectives and other persons conducting any search or arrest with official authority to show a signed authority to that effect, and if he will cause a facsimile of the form of such authority to be published.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. K. O'Higgins): Every member of the detective branch and plain clothes men has a card of authority bearing the arms and the signature of the Chief Commissioner. It would be inadvisable to publish facsimiles as they might be imitated and used for illegal purposes.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Would the Minister give an assurance that he will insist that any parties conducting a search should produce such an authority at the very outset, thereby showing their right to be there, and so as to give them a standing from the very beginning?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Yes, I will give that assurance.

REMOVAL OF SAND FROM KILLINEY FORESHORE.

Major BRYAN COOPER asked the Minister for Industry and Commerce whether he is aware that prosecutions are pending, at the instance of the Dublin and South-Eastern Railway Company, against a number of labourers for removing sand from the foreshore at Killiney, Co. Dublin, under railway bye-laws dealing with sand below high-water mark, and whether he will use his good offices to obtain a settlement of the matter which will not deprive these men of their means of livelihood.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. Hogan, replying for Minister for Industry and Commerce): The Minister for Industry and Commerce is not aware that any prosecutions are pending, but understands that some persons were recently fined in proceedings at the instance of the Dublin South Eastern Railway Company for removing sand from the foreshore at Killiney. The removal of sand from this foreshore constitutes a danger to the port of Dublin, to the railway, and to public interests generally, and is for that reason prohibited by law. It is essential that the law should be complied with in this matter, and the Minister for Industry and Commerce has no power and would not be prepared to intervene in the matter.

Mr. JOHNSON: Has there been a new regulation made with regard to this subject? Is the Minister aware that this practice has been going on with some authority for many years, and that some new offence seems to have been created by the action of the Company or the Department?

Mr. HOGAN: I am not aware of the fact. I do not know whether this has been going on for years, but I do know that the law is as stated in this answer.

UNEMPLOYED BENEFIT FOR DEMOBILISED N.A. SOLDIERS (SIX COUNTY AREA).

Captain REDMOND asked the Minister for Industry and Commerce whether he is aware that residents in the Six County Area, who joined the National Army and have since been demobilised, are debarred from the benefits of the Unemployment Act; whether he is aware they have been informed by the Northern Government that they are not entitled to such benefit until the Free State Government make good the necessary contributions under the Unemployment Act for the period of service with the National Army, and what steps, if any, he intends to take in the matter.

[Captain Redmond.]

Mr. HOGAN (for Minister for Industry and Commerce): The facts are substantially as stated in the question. The Government of Northern Ireland is wrong in informing ex-members of the National Army that they are not entitled to benefit unless contributions are paid into the Northern Unemployment Fund by the Saorstát. Such men's rights to benefit are in no way affected by service in the National Army. The Northern Government in demanding the payment of contributions in respect of their Army service as a condition for the payment of benefit, which the men would receive if they had never served in the Army, is in effect making their Army service a disqualification for benefit. The contributions demanded could not be paid without legislation, which, in view of the rights already possessed by the men concerned, the Minister for Industry and Commerce could not recommend.

Mr. CORISH: Is the Minister satisfied in this particular case whether these men were in an insured occupation prior to enlistment or not? If they were, and if the cards were not stamped for that particular period they would be disqualified from benefit—did the Minister satisfy himself on that?

Mr. HOGAN: That is not the point in this question. On the facts they are entitled to uncovenanted benefit, which they are not receiving from the Northern Government, who refused it on the grounds that they made no contribution. That ground would only be justifiable if they were applying for covenanted benefit.

Major BRYAN COOPER: Will the Government assist these men to take legal action in order to assert their rights?

Mr. HOGAN: I would like notice of that question.

Mr. CORISH: Is it not a fact that that is the regulation, that a person who is in an insured occupation prior to enlistment ought to have his card stamped while in the Army?

Mr. HOGAN: What has that got to do with it?

Mr. CORISH: It has got a lot to do with it, surely.

ACQUISITION OF "DIAMOND BOG," CO. KILKENNY.

EAMON O DUBHGHAILL asked the Minister for Agriculture whether the Land Commission proposed to acquire the "Diamond Bog," Cooleullen, Kilkenny, for division under the provisions of the Land Act, 1923, and, if so, when.

Mr. HOGAN: The bog referred to appears to comprise part of the holding of M. Dimond, which is the subject of a purchase agreement in connection with the sale of the Estate of Viscount Frankfort to the tenants under the Irish Land Acts, 1903-9.

The question of the turbary on this holding is at present under the consideration of the Land Commission.

PAYMENT OF RENTS AND ANNUITIES.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: There was a question put by Deputy Egan, postponed from yesterday. I understand the Minister will answer it now.

Mr. EGAN: The question was:—To ask the Minister for Agriculture if, owing to the present depressed state of agriculture, he will consider the possibility of giving an extension of time in the case of tenants who are called on to pay more than one year's rent or annuity.

Mr. HOGAN: With regard to annuities, the Land Commission are under a statutory obligation to collect Land Purchase Annuities as they fall due, and, if not paid, to institute legal proceedings for their recovery. The annuities must be collected to enable payments to be made of the interest and sinking fund of the stock created for providing the money advanced to the tenants to purchase their holdings. If the annuities are in default the deficiency has to be provided by deductions from the Grants-in-aid of local Taxation. In other words the deficiencies have to be made good by the local rates. If the annuitant fails to pay his annuity he is simply asking the local ratepayers to pay it for him. It must be remembered that purchasers of their holdings under the Land Purchase Act obtained considerable reductions. For example, the average percentage of the reductions under the 1903 Act was as follows:—21.3 per cent. on the second term judicial rents, and 29.8 per cent. to first term judicial rents. There seems to be some kind of an attempt at the present moment on the part of tenant purchasers to withhold their annuities and to create a hanging gale. That cannot be allowed.

Mr. GOREY: Is it also a statutory obligation on the Government to pay interest in lieu of rent to those who were entitled to receive it and to collect arrears or interest in lieu of rent?

Mr. HOGAN: Of course it is a statutory obligation on the Government to pay interest in lieu of rent. Interest in lieu of rent only accrues due after the estate in question has been actually taken over by the Land Commission. With regard to arrears, the tenants are asked to pay now one year's compounded arrears of rent. These are the tenants who have paid nothing for at least one year, and in some cases for two years. They are asked to pay now a sum which is considerably smaller than their neighbours who have purchased under previous Land Purchase Acts. They are asked to make that payment, and they are complaining about making that payment notwithstanding that they are in a considerably better position than the tenants who had purchased under previous Land Purchase Acts. For instance, previous Tenant Purchasers paid last year and every year. The people who are complaining now did not pay for two years and they are asked this year to make exactly the same payment for this year as their neighbours, who have been paying every year.

Mr. GOREY: The point of my question is this: if the interest in lieu of rent is not forthcoming what will make it good—the public rates or the Central Fund?

Mr. HOGAN: It will be on the rate-payers.

ARMY ACCOUNTS.—CLARE CLAIM

PADRAIC O HOGAIN (An Clár) asked the Minister for Defence if he is aware that a large account is still due by the Military to Mr. John O'Donohue, Seariff, Co. Clare, and that a large amount of that account is due since May, 1920, and if he will expedite payment.

MINISTER for DEFENCE (General Mulcahy): The account in question relates to a period prior to the Treaty. The position at that time was that responsibility for discharging any liabilities incurred rested on local Volunteer Authorities. Claims of the period cannot be paid out of funds voted by the Dáil for the maintenance of the present army. The general question as to what extent and from what funds any of those claims may be settled has yet to get attention. Pending a decision Mr. O'Donohue's account cannot be given consideration.

Mr. HALL: Will the Minister say if, in the past—say about 12 months ago—the Government has not made payment under the heading of accounts or bills brought up through orders received from responsible officers of the old Volunteers prior to the Truce?

General MULCAHY: I hardly think that is so. At any rate, they cannot have been on all fours with the accounts referred to in the question.

Mr. HOGAN (Clare): If the accounts are vouched for by an officer considered competent to vouch for them, will they get consideration?

General MULCAHY: The whole matter will have to get consideration; but there are no funds available at present for paying claims of this particular type.

[General Mulcahy.]

Mr. HALL: Is the Minister aware that since the signing of the Treaty considerably over £100 were paid to a merchant named Kiernan of Hatchestown, Co. Meath? If he is not already aware of that I think it will assist him in coming to a decision on the matter.

General MULCAHY: If the Deputy will let me have particulars, I will have the matter attended to.

Mr. HALL: I do not think I could let the Minister have particulars. He would, I am sure, get that information in the records of the Quartermaster's Division.

General MULCAHY: I would ask the Deputy to communicate to me any information he has on the subject.

MILITARY OCCUPATION OF TRADE UNION'S OFFICES.

PADRAIG O'HOGAIN (An Clár) asked the Minister for Defence whether it is yet decided to evacuate the offices of the Irish Transport and General Workers' Union, Kilrush, and whether, considering the very severe injury the retention of the premises is doing to the Kilrush Branch of the Union, he will consider the desirability of expediting the handing over of the premises to the Branch Committee of the premises.

General MULCAHY: It is regretted that it has not yet been possible to evacuate the premises in question, nor am I in a position to indicate at present the probable date of evacuation.

Mr. HOGAN (Clare): Does the Minister know that there are vacant buildings suitable for the occupation of the military, and that the particular buildings in question could be handed back to the Transport Union?

General MULCAHY: I will have enquiries made into that matter.

DETENTION OF BALLINEEN MEN.

TADHG O MURCHADHA asked the Minister for Defence whether he is in a position to recommend the release of Cornelius Keane, Droumfeagh, Ballineen, at present detained in Newbridge, and David Crowley, Connagh, Ballineen, Co. Cork.

General MULCAHY: Arrangements are being made to release Messrs. Keane and Crowley.

SOUTHERN INTERNEES—QUESTIONS OF RELEASE.

TADHG O MURCHADHA asked the Minister for Defence whether he is in a position to recommend the release of Cornelius Kelly, Glau, Dunmanaway, Co. Cork, No. 3461, Hut 33, Newbridge Camp; John Murphy, Ardeahan, Dunmanaway, 1029, Harepark Camp; John Buttiner, No. 9206, Hut 14, Tintown No. 2 Camp; James Crowley, Connagh, Ballineen, Co. Cork, No. 3951, Hut 15, Tintown No. 2 Camp; Jeremiah Murphy, Eyeries, Co. Cork, 3666, No. 9 Hut, Tintown No. 3 Camp; and Charles O'Keeffe, Convent Hill, Bandon, Co. Cork, 2012, Hut 30, Newbridge Camp.

General MULCAHY: Arrangements are being made to release Cornelius Kelly, John Murphy, John Buttiner, Jeremiah Murphy, and Charles O'Keeffe. The release of James Crowley cannot be recommended.

DEPENDANT'S ALLOWANCE (CO. WICKLOW).

EAMON O DUBHGHAILL asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that repeated applications have been made, without result, for dependant's allowance for Mrs. Annie Nolan, mother of Private Patrick Nolan (No. 000774), Coolmoney Barracks, Co. Wicklow, who joined the National Army on the 11th April, 1922; whether, in view of the fact that this woman is an invalid, he will take steps to expedite payment of this allowance.

General MULCAHY: Two applications were received from Mrs. Nolan, who was duly informed that her claim had been disallowed. On investigation it was found that the extent of her dependence on her son prior to his enlistment was less than the minimum required by the regulations before an allowance may be issued.

WRITTEN ANSWERS.NENAGH CLAIM AGAINST MILITARY.

DOMHNALL O MUIRGHEASA asked the Minister for Defence if he will state when it is intended to pay the sum of £218 17s. 6d. due by the Military Authorities to the Nenagh Gas and Electricity Supply Company.

General MULCAHY: Portion of the account of the Nenagh Gas and Electricity Supply Company will be paid forthwith, and the balance will be settled as soon as some necessary investigations are completed.

ATHLONE ACCOUNT.

SEAN O LAIDHIN asked the Minister for Defence if an appeal has been received from Mr. J. Grenham, of Connaught Street, Athlone, in respect of the inadequacy of amount paid him for use of cars commandeered by the Military from July, 1922, to September, 1923; whether the amount claimed was £1,237 4s. 6d., and the amount paid £365; to ask how soon a decision may be expected in the matter.

General MULCAHY: Mr. Grenham's appeal has been carefully considered. It is regretted that it is not possible to alter decision already made.

CLAIM FOR DEPENDANT'S ALLOWANCE.

Major BRYAN COOPER asked the Minister for Defence whether a claim for dependants allowance has been received from No. 48992, Volunteer Michael Sherlock, Engineering Corps, and whether he can state what decision has been arrived at in this case.

General MULCAHY: There is no trace of the receipt of a claim from Volunteer Sherlock. One has, however, been prepared from the information contained in the question and is being investigated.

BUSINESS OF THE DAIL.

The PRESIDENT: I will have to move to take the time of the Dáil beyond two o'clock with regard to Government business. Before 2 o'clock I intend to move that we should sit late this evening in order to finish any business there is on the Order Paper. The first motion deals with Government business, and I would be anxious to deal with that before we take up other business. I am not, by reason of the first motion, going to shut out any business put down by private members. I therefore move, under Standing Order No. 74:

That the proceedings on the Public Safety (Powers of Arrest and Detention) Temporary Bill be not interrupted to-day at 2 p.m. if the Bill be under consideration at that hour."

Mr. JOHNSON: I wonder would the President take into account the desirability of having an adjournment for a convenient time—say three-quarters of an hour?

The PRESIDENT: I am quite willing to do that.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: In regard to the Orders of the Day, may I ask if item No. 2—Ministers and Secretaries Bill—will be taken to-day.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: No. And, in connection with the Private Business on the Order Paper, I consulted the Committee of Procedure and Privileges, and it was their view, and it is my own, that item No. 4 on the Order Paper, which is a vote of censure on the Government, should take precedence of item No. 3, if item No. 3 proves to be an opposed motion.

COURT OFFICERS (TEMPORARY APPOINTMENTS) BILL, 1923.FIRST STAGE.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. Kevin O'Higgins): I want to ask the indulgence of the Dáil to allow me to move to have printed and circulated a Bill entitled "The Court Officers (Temporary Appointments) Bill." It would greatly facilitate my Department and the administration of public business generally in the country if the first reading of this Bill could be taken before the recess. The purport and object of the Bill is to enable certain rather important vacancies to be filled, and yet to be filled in such a way as not to give to the newly appointed person all the personal right and vested interests of his predecessor in view of the fact that the whole machinery of the administration of justice will be undergoing a change within the coming year. Therefore, this Bill would give a certain elasticity and enable me to arrange for the carrying out of these duties without vesting in the officer newly appointed all the rights that attached to his predecessor in office. I think it would be important to have this Bill passed in January, and, with a view to securing that, I should like to get the First Reading now.

Question put and agreed to.

Second Stage ordered for 16th January, 1924.

PUBLIC SAFETY (POWERS OF ARREST AND DETENTION) TEMPORARY BILL, 1923.

SECOND STAGE.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: It falls to my lot once again to ask Deputies to agree that for the adequate protection of the quiet, decent people of the country, there should be vested in the Executive powers of arrest and detention on something short of legal proof of guilt. I think that all our experience goes to show that there are times when general principles, very sound, very healthy, and apparently fundamental, must yield to special cases, and it is on the ground of special cases and of a special set of circumstances that I ask the Dáil to waive that very sound and very fundamental general principle that persons ought not be arrested and ought not to be detained without full proof of guilt being put forward to the satisfaction of a court. We are all familiar, I dare say, with the oath taken by jurors, and with that portion of it which runs that the juror shall without fear, favour, affection or ill-will, proceed to do his duty as between the prisoner and the State. Unfortunately there are areas in the country where it is not humanly possible for jurors to do their duty without fear, and jurors are not supermen, demigods, invariably cast in the heroic mould. They are subject to fear, very much like other men, and the fact has been borne in on us, time and again, that in certain areas jurors are subject to so much intimidation and to so many terrorist influences that they do not and have not done their strict duty as between the accused and the State. There have been cases where jurors have acquitted prisoners in the teeth of very full and very substantial evidence of guilt. Now, theoretically, and taking the higher plane of civic duty, one may condemn that, but humanly, one can understand it, having regard to conditions which still prevail in certain areas of the country. That is one factor upon which I base the case for these extraordinary powers for the Executive.

But there is another factor, and that is the difficulty, or perhaps I should say, speaking for certain areas, the utter impossibility, of finding people of sufficient moral courage and sufficient physical courage, because physical courage is unfortunately necessary also, to come forward and give evidence against a person accused of a particular crime. There, again, taking the higher plane, one may condemn; but there again, on the human plane, one can understand. That is the second factor upon which I base this claim for special powers. Every Deputy—certainly every Deputy from the country—will know what I mean when I draw a distinction between legal proof and common knowledge. I think I know the country and country conditions, and every Deputy from the country will agree with me that there can be in a rural area a series of outrages, and every person who has come to the use of reason in that area knows the perpetrators of these outrages, and yet it would be utterly impossible to secure definite evidence which would stand fire in a court as to the guilt of those persons. It is that kind of situation that we have to deal with, and it is because of that kind of situation that I say that certain general principles, sound, no doubt, healthy, no doubt, in normal times fundamental, must be waived in favour of this special case which I contend exists.

The objection that will be urged mentally, if not verbally, against the Bill, is that it is not seasonable; that it is not seasonable to come before the Parliament of a nation with a Bill that might, in a flight of language, be called a Coercion Bill, just at this time. Unfortunately the criminal takes no Christmas holidays, and it so happens that the nights are longest and the days are shortest in and about the Christmas season, and that is my excuse for coming at this particular time with a Bill which enables the Executive which has the responsibility of giving protection to life and property in this country to deal with persons reasonably suspect of serious crimes.

It is not a Bill framed to deal with persons of any particular political section in the community. Crime has not been the monopoly of any particular political party, and I make a present of that to the man who pressed the button for anarchy, to the man who pressed the button for a crime wave unprecedented in this country, I make a present of that to the man who is now reading Einstein in Arbour Hill. People who live in cities, and people who live in the Capital, are near the seat of Government, and are near the headquarters of the police and military arms of the State. They have their well-lit streets and their patrols, but I ask Deputies to concentrate on the lot of the person who lives in an out of the way rural district, where conditions are less difficult for the prospective criminal.

In moving a similar Bill some months ago, I stressed the fact that Deputies, Senators and Ministers, and other important persons like that, had guards in their houses when the situation seemed to require it, but the plain, decent people of the country have no guard unless the law, and the sanctions of the law, are adequate for their protection. I contend that a situation still exists in this country, in parts of this country at any rate, which makes it necessary to vest in the Executive the power of arresting and detaining known blackguards against whom there is not definite evidence in connection with a specific offence. That is the thesis I put forward, and that is the ground on which we take our stand in presenting this Bill for the approval of the Oireachtas.

I have before me the confidential monthly report presented by the Commissioner of the Civic Guard. I do not intend to quote at any length, or in detail, from that report, but in the covering letter forwarding it there is this statement: "The conditions prevailing in the Counties Leitrim, Kerry, Cork East Riding, Cork West Riding, Tipperary, Galway, and certain parts of Kilkenny are unsatisfactory. In Clare, Leix and Monaghan the conditions are still unsatisfactory, but in a lesser degree. There has been a marked improvement in Donegal, Dublin, Kildare, Wicklow, Meath, Westmeath and Wexford." If throughout this country a state of conditions prevailed similar to the conditions which prevail in Meath, Kildare, perhaps even in Carlow and in Louth, and so on, we would not feel justified in asking the Dáil for a continuance of the special powers vested in the Executive which expire on the 1st February next. But that is not the situation. You have still a very patchy situation in the country, and certain very dangerous and very explosive material literally and figuratively lying around in certain of the counties, perhaps six or seven, and unfortunately these would be six or seven of the largest counties in the State.

We feel that we cannot give to the citizens the protection and security to which, as taxpayers, they are entitled, and to which as citizens they are entitled, unless Deputies agree with us in facing the realities of the situation, and in taking the view that there must be the power of detention on something short of that very full and very complete proof which would satisfy a Court.

This Bill deals only with internment. With regard to other portions of the Public Safety Bill, these will be covered in other Bills. I propose to introduce a permanent Firearms Bill in the coming session, and a Criminal Law Amendment Bill, but the Bill which I am asking Deputies to give favourable consideration to now confines itself to this question of arrest and detention without trial. It will be noted, in Section 2 of the Bill, that the grounds of detention are not identical with those in the previous Bill, the Public Safety Act, but are confined to this: Reasonable suspicion of being, or of having been, engaged or concerned in the commission of any of the offences mentioned in the Schedule to the Act. The Schedule sets out 15 specific offences, and the arrest and detention of any person must take place with advertence to, and with mention of, some one or more of these offences. Section 3 of the Bill deals with persons at present in military custody.

Deputies are aware that the policy of the Government is one of release as quickly as the consideration of public safety admits. Releases were held up and delayed for a period of a month by reason of the hunger strike and since that hunger strike they have proceeded at a rather rapid rate. No one wants to keep young men locked up, living parasitically on their countrymen, costing in or about £1 per man per week, if one could feel that these men, now at any rate, recognised and accepted the principle of order which lays it down that the policy to be pursued by the country, the line of action to be pursued by the community, must be that policy or that line which commends itself to the collective judgment of their fellow citizens. That is what is asked, and not any abandonment of a particular political creed or doctrine or principle, but a recognition that the country's policy must be decided by the mass wisdom, or unwisdom, of the people of the country.

Deputies know that people who profess to be unable to bring their proud souls under to the settlement or compromise at which we have arrived with the British were able in the past to bring their proud souls under to British occupation, to British administration of this country, and to bring not only their proud souls but their proud bodies under the bed when the British were "rampaging" through the country. That is aggravating. But there is recognition of the fact that there is a tendency in most men to run amok when they think that the sun is shining for the law breaker. When the spectacle was presented of a country without the ordinary executive forces which a normal established State can command, and of the Government of the country being vested in nine young men in the City Hall without a police force, without a system of justice, without an army, any more than that loose-slung territorial force with which we contended against the British, they thought that such an opportunity had come, and they were assisted in that thought by the message which told them that the country was theirs for the taking. And so we have had anarchy, crime, lawlessness, people out to pass their Private Bills with their strong hand and the little gun in it; people out to trample roughshod over the rights of their fellow-citizens. That situation gradually, and slowly no doubt, but as quickly as the circumstances permitted, was grappled with and choked under in the only way in which revolt and anarchy can be grappled with or choked under in any country.

Now has come a period of pause, a period of reflection, a period in which men may take stock again of the situation and decide what line they are going to pursue in the future. We will not be behind in facilitating people to take the line of decency, the line of ordinary normal constitutional action. We will not be behind in affording to these people an opportunity of preaching their policy as any other party in the State preaches its policy. But they will get the opportunity and the consideration that any other party in this State will get, neither more nor less. We will not have two Governments in this country, and we will not have two armies in this country. If people have a creed to preach, a message to expound, they can go before their fellow-citizens and preach and expound it. But let the appeal be to the mind, to reason, rather than to physical fear. They cannot have it both ways. They cannot have the platform and the bomb. Lately a gentleman named Rutledge, acting in the unavoidable absence of the gentleman who is reading Einstein in Arbour Hill, writes:—

"The Free State Executive are engaged in attempting to raise a loan in portions of this country. This loan is of the utmost importance to them because of the use they intend to make of its success. The Government has already issued a proclamation refusing to accept any responsibility for this or any other liability contracted by such a body. In view of the attempts being made to stamper the small investors, particularly, to participate in this loan, all members of Sinn Féin should endeavour to save such people from sinking their savings in such an unauthorised flotation and thereby incurring subsequent loss."

There is reason in everything, but it is not reasonable to expect this Executive to countenance, or authorise, a rival Government within its territory or jurisdiction, and no such rival Government will be countenanced. We are aware that there are people playing the picturesque traditional role of "Ned of the Hill" around the country at present, living parasitically on their neighbours, on the plea that the military are after them. These people know well, and their friends probably know well, that they could and should return to their plough, or to whatever other normal occupation they pursued, and before they developed or degenerated into "Neds of the Hill."

We will not be forced into the position of granting anything in the nature of an amnesty for serious crime of which proof can be produced. We do not propose to amnesty bank robbers, arsoners, murderers. But the ordinary poor "mug"—if Deputies will excuse the expression—who was stampeded into this thing, when crime was presented to him, wrapped around with the picturesque tricolour, when crime was presented in the wrappings of idealism, who was led astray in that way and who has not committed himself to the serious extent of murder, or arson, or bank robbery, or some heinous offence of that kind, but merely drifted around the country playing the ass for the last two years, can return to his home with a very reasonable security that no one is going after him if he decides to live in accordance with the law of this country in the future, and to respect the ordinary fundamental rights of his neighbour.

But we cannot simply cast our bread upon the waters by throwing open with a quixotic gesture the prison and camp gates, and saying to all these men who have been challenging not alone the fabric of the State, but the rights of their neighbours for the last two years: "Go in peace, your crimes are forgiven." We did cast a certain amount of bread, as I remarked some time ago, in the early months of last year. We

we were quixotic. We put lethal
1 o'clock. weapons into the hands of men who professed to be personally opposed to the settlement with Great Britain, in the hope and confidence that they were really of too fine a mould to turn those arms against their fellow-citizens, or use their power to prevent the majority will prevailing in the country. We were disappointed. We cannot now turn out from the gaols and camps dangerous, desperate men, who would proceed again to challenge the State which has not yet recovered from the onslaught of the last two years. We cannot, before we are quite sure that we have our foundations laid, and that those foundations are solid, and that our Executive forces and the machinery of our administration of the country will be able to deal with any situation that may arise, take that risk, and if we did take it, we would not be performing our duty to the people who have placed us in the positions that we now hold. Releases will proceed gradually, and judiciously. We do not desire to hold any of these men for one half hour longer than we think the public safety requires.

What is the public safety? I grant you that it is a vague term. I grant you that it is nebulous. Whatever it is, we are the body of men, commissioned by the people of the country, to decide where it lies; we of the Executive Council, in the first instance, and the Deputies in the Dáil in the second instance.

Coming before the Dáil with the knowledge at our disposal, with the reports that are in our offices, we say that in parts of the country, in certain rather large areas, conditions are still such that we cannot rely on the ordinary normal machinery by which an established State deals with crime.

[Mr. O'Higgins.]

We cannot be reasonably confident of procuring evidence in all cases, and, moreover, conditions are still such, in certain areas, that jurors are subject to intimidation, and subject to terrorist influences. What, after all, is our conception of a trial? Twelve citizens of the community, impartial, impersonal, with no influence of any kind affecting them, are to hear the facts, and, with the assistance of the presiding Judge, decide for or against the prisoner who stands charged by the State. That is the normal ideal position. Deputies know that jurors driving in ten or twelve miles to the city of Cork to try some man for armed robbery, arson, or some such offence, are not just in that position. Deputies know that these men, when the trial ends, when and if sentence is passed on the guilty man, have to turn round and drive back from Cork City to their homes, in perhaps isolated areas, where armed gangs still operate, and where the writ of the gunman runs. Now, this Bill is based on reality. It is based on a common-sense appreciation of the position in the country, in certain areas, of which Deputies must be aware. I put it to Deputies that their responsibilities to the people lie in facing the facts presented to them, and in passing this Bill, not with gusto, not with any particular zeal for passing a measure which admittedly offends against certain general principles which ought to obtain if we had a normal ideal situation in the country, but as a necessary measure for the discharge of their stewardship to the people to whom they are responsible. It is not a popular Bill, but it is a just Bill, an honest Bill, and some of us did not come into politics for popularity. I move that the Bill be read a second time.

Mr. HOGAN: I second.

Mr. JOHNSON: The speech the Minister has just made is very like a repetition of a speech he has made more than once to justify a very much more drastic coercion Bill than this one. One would imagine that it was necessary to harrow the feelings and play upon the hatreds of Deputies to induce them to support the Bill, by presenting a picture of the country as it was twelve months ago. I think it is a pity that the Minister should allow his personal feelings to lead him into making jibes about men under his control, within his power, and unable to retort. That, of course, is merely a matter of taste. I cannot support the Bill. I think no case has been made out for it. The Minister referred to epithets used in the past, when other Ministers in other Governments were in the habit, shall I say, of using when introducing Bills of this kind, and calling them Coercion Bills. A good part of his speech was taken up by referring to the intimidation of jurors, the difficulty of proving cases before a jury, because of the fear witnesses might have of intimidation and violence. I think if the Minister will look back upon these Coercion Bills that he refers to, he will find that examples have been put before him where jurors were dispensed with, and yet a prisoner charged with an offence could be brought to trial. The case that is made for this Bill would have been easier understood, and somewhat less objectionable, if it really had to do with those people whom the Minister for Home Affairs states are still in the hills, still waiting in the country for opportunities to commit crime, but against whom definite evidence of guilt may not be obtainable. If the Bill were intended to deal with such persons and rather to cover the possibility that crime may be prevalent in special circumstances, and by virtue of the new situation, the ordinary machinery of government and the ordinary sense of civic responsibility for the due operations of the law had not been very clearly established in the mind of the community—if the Bill was only referring to such people and with a view to assisting the Government in such circumstances one could understand better the proposition in the Bill. But, as I said earlier, the arguments that have been adduced in favour of this Bill are not intended for such a situation alone. I could have understood the plea for such a Bill if it had been said, "Well, we have brought peace to the country, we have used the powers that were given to the Executive in the Public Safety Act, and by virtue of the use of those powers a certain state of things has arisen, and now we propose to loose those powers, to resign those special powers that have been given to us, but we fear that there may be a short period of strife and unrest and a short period of crime which cannot be proved definitely in Court, and during that period we require to have these powers of detention." If such an argument had been used I could understand it, without perhaps agreeing with the conclusions, but that is not the proposition. The proposition is that as many persons as the Minister may think ought to have been detained and who are now detained, may continue to be detained for twelve months at the discretion of the Ministers without any attempt to produce any proof of guilt of any offences.

If this Bill had followed a release of all untried prisoners I could have understood better the force of the contention of the Minister, but that is not what is proposed. The Minister has disavowed any intention to release untried prisoners, except at such moment as he, or the Executive, may think desirable. I object, for one, to extend the powers of any Executive over the bodies of citizens in such circumstances. There have been, we are told, any number, from 10,000 to 15,000, prisoners arrested under the provisions of the Public Safety Act and 10,000 of them have been released, but there are still four or five thousand detained, some of them in close confinement. Now what is the argument? That positive proof justifying a jury cannot be brought into Court against some of these prisoners; therefore it is desirable to detain them because though we cannot produce proof of guilt of any offence, we are reasonably satisfied that they are guilty. Is it argued that proof of guilt could not have been obtained and produced to the satisfaction of a court or a magistrate of the guilt of any of the 10,000 men who have been released? Is it suggested for a moment that proof of guilt cannot be obtained and brought into court against those who are at present detained? There are men, as there were women, who were detained under the Public Safety Act, and who were arrested in the act of offending very, very seriously. If one treats them in the way the Minister has done as criminals, proof can be adduced to satisfy any court of the offences. In the absence of any attempt to bring such offenders to court one must conclude that in the mind of the Minister, and, I think, probably wisely, it is desirable to consider the offences of these men in a different category from that of ordinary crime. The absence of trial of men who are easily proved to have been guilty of offences for which they are detained, indicates clearly enough that the Ministers in their discretion, I think a wise discretion, have decided that they should not be charged with offences for which they could be proved guilty. There is a reason.

The Ministers recognise that whatever horrible results have followed the commission of those offences, it is not desirable to charge them with the crimes with which the Minister in his speech has charged them. I submit that the end of that line of thinking, recognising that special circumstances require special consideration of those prisoners, is that, inasmuch as they are not guilty of crime in the ordinary sense, the occasion for the commission of the offences for which they have been arrested and detained is past and should be followed by release. To ask the Oireachtas to give power to Ministers to continue to detain such prisoners for another twelve months at their discretion, notwithstanding that they refrain from bringing such persons to court, and charging them, is too much, and the discretion asked for should not be given.

The term, "Irregulars," has been generously applied to the majority of the prisoners, because I think I am right in saying the Irregular is usually a man who follows an army as an auxiliary to the army, but who is not on the regular establishment. However, for home consumption, the term has been applied to avoid using an epithet which perhaps might be taken to be an honourable one in this country, but which in other countries would be looked upon as dishonourable. To my mind the circumstances require that the powers that are asked for should not be given, especially the power asked for in Section 3 to detain men who are already in prison, some of them for many months, and against whom the Government is not willing to prefer a charge. Whatever reason there may be for declining to prefer a charge, that same reason, if it has any good in it at all, is sufficient for release at the present time. I think it would not be too much to say that the absence of a general organised armed activity for the last few months is a fair sign that there has been some organisation of those forces, so many of whom are now in custody. The fact that there has been this absence of armed activities on the part of those men would give one reasonable ground to assume that there is some discipline, and that the release of those who are still in custody would not be followed by any further armed activity. It may be said that the risk is too great, that the men still detained are those likely to be the organisers of a future revolt. It may be so, but if this is to be the argument on which the Minister will rely, can you fix twelve months as the limit of detention of those men? I submit there can be no limit to the detention if that argument is to prevail. It must be permanent unless you think that the character of Irishmen has changed utterly with the change in political institutions. The Minister assures the Dáil to-day, as he has done previously, that we do not desire to detain those men one hour longer than the public safety requires, and that they are the judges of what the public safety requires. One can quite understand the position of a Government which assumes that power and that authority.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: It is not assumed.

Mr. JOHNSON: Which claims that power and that authority. It is the position taken up by every autocracy, even every tyranny. The man holding power, be he Czar, Kaiser, or Caesar, is the judge of what the public safety requires, and if he says a citizen should be detained, then nobody should say him nay.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Surely the Deputy will agree that our position imposes upon us the duty of telling the representatives of the people what we consider the public safety requires.

Mr. JOHNSON: Certainly, but I am asking the representatives of the people not to give you that authority, but to insist that the Courts of Justice shall be the deciders of whether a man shall be detained or not. I say this Oireachtas would be abandoning its functions if it hands over this authority to any Executive who overrides and supersedes courts of justice when proof cannot be adduced of the guilt of an offence against any person. You have men in your charge whom you can prove to be guilty of offences. I challenge you to bring those men to court or to release them. You cannot say with respect to those men you have not proof of their guilt.

And even with the arguments brought forward under this Bill you have no right to detain men on the ground that they are merely suspect when you are perfectly conscious of the fact that you have proof in your possession of their guilt of certain offences. I believe that the time has come when we must demand trial or release. It is a logical difficulty that the Government is in, and it has not been pressed hitherto, but unless there is to be release I demand that the prisoners in your possession whom you can prove to be guilty of offences should be brought to trial, and risk the consequences. And while I say that, I say without question, in my opinion, that by far the best policy for the Government to adopt is to say: "We are satisfied; we have got control of the country; we are satisfied that the people are with us; we are satisfied that the State is established; we will now release prisoners who have been detained for their attempt to overthrow the State, and we will deal with new offences when they arise in the way they should be dealt with."

Professor MAGENNIS: Some years ago a junior barrister had made a long and impassioned speech in defence of a prisoner, and in leaving the court after the Judge had sentenced the prisoner he asked a friend what he thought of the speech. The friend said to young "Gasaway," Barrister-at-Law: "It excited a great deal of sympathy for your client." Deputy Johnson's speech excited in my soul—and I listened to it with the utmost attention—that feeling of sympathy for whomsoever chances to be the Leader of the Opposition. But one great principle to which Deputy Johnson was faithful, throughout his speech was the doctrine that it is the duty of an Opposition to oppose. Except for that as the animating principle it is very hard to understand the line of argument taken, the country of argument traversed, by the Deputy. In effect, it amounts to the cry that has become a parrot-cry, Sunday after Sunday, from certain hustings in the city—“Release the prisoners.” True, Deputy Johnson says we are to release the prisoners and disregard the consequences—

Mr. JOHNSON: I think the Deputy is misrepresenting, unintentionally, what I said. I said: “Bring them to trial and risk the consequences.”

Professor MAGENNIS: Yes, but it amounts to the same thing. As the Minister for Home Affairs has shown, to bring them to trial—a very fine phrase—is, in the actual circumstances of the time, merely to secure their release. There are two ways of releasing a prisoner. One way is to open the jail door and order him to depart hence; the other is to bring him to a trial which you know beforehand, under all the conditions of the trial, will be abortive, and that he will pass hence, so that in effect what Deputy Johnson proposes is that they be released. We had all these arguments before, and Deputy Johnson informs us that the circumstances of the country are so essentially different now that the arguments which justified the passage of the Bill on a previous occasion are no longer valid. That is true, as the Minister has pointed out to us, with regard to certain districts, but it is not true of the entire area of jurisdiction. So that what we are really confronted with is this, that a certain concerted movement, a conspiracy, in short, against the life of the Free State, has brought about such a demoralisation of the people that our civilisation in certain quarters is shattered, and we have the duty cast upon us of attempting to save the rest of the country from the consequences of returning to centres of disaffection men who would renew there the active operation of that conspiracy. At bottom the whole question as between Deputy Johnson and the Minister is a question of fact in that regard. Does Deputy Johnson assure us that he is in a position to know that if there is a general jail clearance at the present moment there would be no serious risk to the public safety? The Minister for Home Affairs, one of the important members of the Executive Council, who has access to sources of information, who is daily and hourly in receipt of official communications with regard to the state of the country, gives us an opposite assurance.

As between the two conflicting witnesses, if I may call them so, are we not entitled to accept the authority of the Minister? It is really a question of fact that is in issue here. Deputy Johnson, no doubt conscious of the weakness of his case, discusses the good, or the bad, taste of referring to the pastimes and entertainments of leaders on half-pay. He alleged that the Minister had taken advantage of the helpless position of his own Teachtaí, and instead of the gaoler shedding tears for his prisoners that he utters jibes. But we are not oblivious to the fact that prisoners before now have been regarded as the living centres of influence, as the inspiration of movements, and there are only two ways of destroying that influence, either by overcoming the follower or by lessening the authority on the other hand.

This Bill proposes in effect to suspend the ordinary rights which in normal times would be rights of the well-affected citizen, if arrested for an offence, to be indicted and tried. Who are the citizens who are entitled to enjoy the rights of citizens? Are they any of the population who, by their own acts, and their own declared attitude towards the State, voluntarily in effect deprived themselves of these rights? Deputy Johnson spoke as if the Minister had said that it is merely at his discretion to consider that the detained is guilty. Surely it is not necessary even for the Minister to entertain a belief that the prisoner is [Professor Magennis.] guilty. Is it not his duty to detain the man in question if he is reasonably satisfied from what is within his cognisance that it would not contribute to the peace of the community to restore him to that community? The responsibility to preserve peace and the amenities of citizenship for all who are well disposed is on the shoulders of the Executive. It is easy to talk sentimentality and bewail Christmas detention, but what about the people outside the prison who have never been arrested because there was no necessity to arrest them? Are we to neglect their interests and merely actuated by a spasm of sentimentality to endanger their enjoyment of the Christmas season?

Mr. JOHNSON: I did not refer to the Christmas season.

Professor MAGENNIS: The question of peace was introduced by the Minister, and he, in fact, made the whole case, in so far as there is a reasonable case to be made against the proposal, and he showed a spirit of conciliation in the matter, a willingness to consider all that might reasonably be put forward. Deputy Johnson maintained that no case had been made for the Bill, but I maintain that no case has been made against it by Deputy Johnson, except this appeal to sentimentality, and it is a period at which people are particularly alive to sentimental appeal. It was not necessary to mention the Christmas season.

The whole contention is that we are to behave in abnormal times as if the times were normal. It is one of the most frequent fallacies inflicted upon us in speeches from the opposite side that we are to ignore circumstances, always to consider the abstract view of things, and to refuse to recognise the circumstances of the actual. What is being dealt with at the present moment is an actual situation. We are not indulging in an academic discussion as to the principles in the abstract of good Government, or of the administration of justice, or how to deal with suspects; we are dealing with a highly complex, difficult and delicate problem. If it is properly handled much good may accrue to the State, whereas if we act merely from sentiment we may revive the smouldering embers and permit the conflagration being renewed. Deputy Johnson is not stronger than I should be against any encroachment of the liberties of the subject, or any effort to set up an autocracy, or to invest the Minister with autocratic powers. He spoke of Czars and Kaisers and Caesars. Who is Caesar? Caesar in this case is not the Minister, but the responsible Government of the Free State, and the Minister comes to the Dáil to be empowered with Parliamentary authority to do what he claims to do. These terms of Czar and Kaiser are introduced to confuse our thought, and to suggest by wrong imagery a view of the situation which is false. If the Minister claims that he in his personal character as Minister for Home Affairs is entitled to say: "I will and order that these men be detained," that would correspond with what Deputy Johnson terms autocratic, the act of an autocrat. But he comes here under a representative system and asks through our votes to be invested with power to do these things.

Mr. JOHNSON: Like Mussolini did.

Professor MAGENNIS: Mussolini, if I may correct the historical parallel set up, first invested himself with the power, and then asked his followers to assent to the investment. This is a very different proposition. The Minister comes to the Dáil, introduces a Bill, and asks for our votes to give the Executive or any member of the Executive, the power required.

True, he has not stated to us—how could he?—the totality of the evidence on which he and the Executive are convinced that these abnormal powers are requisite. But he has made a sufficient case which Deputy Johnson has not refuted to show that this is not the moment to put the power into abeyance which the temporary Act had conveyed to the Ministry. The onus is on those who say the time has come to cease the exercise of these powers, and Deputy Johnson has certainly not shown that the hour has struck. He has said that the time has come. I took him to refer in that to Christmas, but he repudiates these sentiments.

He means, therefore, that a situation has come about in which this is not necessary. Where is the evidence of that? Are the dumps as a policy abandoned, are there no speeches made, is there no propaganda of which we are aware which suggest a recrudescence in portions of the country of methods of violence? I suggest, again, that it is for those who claim that the Act previously passed should be brought to an end to show reasonable cause why it should so terminate. We have no evidence to that effect. We have the statement, which it is reasonable to accept, that the time is not opportune, and as between these two authorities I accept the one which is in the position to be the authority, as knowing the facts.

The PRESIDENT: I move under Standing Order No. 16: "That the Dáil sit later than 4 p.m. to-day."

Agreed.

Mr. GOREY: I ask leave to move under Standing Order 17: "That the Dáil do adjourn for one hour."

Agreed.

The Dáil adjourned accordingly at 1.45 p.m.

On resuming,

Mr. GOREY: In the opening speech of the Minister for Home Affairs, he mentioned certain counties as being in a worse state than others. In mentioning those he mentioned the county from which I come. Portions of it, he said, are unsatisfactory. I am unaware that it is unsatisfactory in what may be termed the political as apart from the agrarian aspect. But I do admit that in the agrarian aspect there are portions of it not as satisfactory as they should be. Although we are aware that these conditions exist, and although the people who are the cause of it are well known in the district, we are aware of the impossibility of making a case for a jury.

There may be what is called disorder, or the elements of disorder, in the political sense in other parts of the county, but I am not aware of it. In approaching this matter, I want to say that I do not want, if possible, to duplicate what I agree with in Deputy Magennis' speech or in the speech of the Minister for Home Affairs, or in the speech of Deputy Johnson. I do not think there is any use in duplicating arguments.

There are two or three big issues involved in the whole question. One big issue would be the liberty of the subject. That issue, to my mind, is very important. There is another issue, and that is the preservation of the State; in other words, the liberty of the ordinary man in the street. And there is just one other issue that has not been touched upon, and that is the preservation of the fabric of Justice. Our Courts of Justice are based on trial by jury. That is the great fundamental foundation of our code of Justice.

Now, in going back on trial by jury, we all know—at least it is borne in on some of us—that in Ireland the goddess of Justice cannot be said to wear a tighter crown or a crown fitting more closely around her head than in any other country. It is as loose as it is in any other country. Judge after judge, and lawyer after lawyer, and the ordinary man in the street, has listened, before ever trouble started in this country, to trial by jury, in which clear evidence was put up—and I speak now especially of the country parts—and great difficulty was met with in getting a verdict according to that evidence. I speak of evidence that would satisfy a jury. I have seen and heard in many cases evidence sufficient to satisfy. I knew a juror in one case with which I happened to be concerned to give as his excuse for disagreeing with the rest of the jury that he could not find the man guilty, but that he would recommend him to mercy. That is not an impossible type to meet with in the circuits on this question of trial by jury. Now, is it advisable that additional pressure, or what might be called intimidation, or the possibility of it, should be added to what jurors and witnesses have to put up with?

If an additional strain is put on their sense of citizenship and justice, and if that strain is so much
3 o'clock. as to bring the fabric of justice to breaking point, the position would be one of the most unfortunate that our country could find itself placed in. When speaking on this question I would like to make it clear that I am speaking not as the leader of a party. Some of my friends on these benches differ with me, and some agree with me. It is our duty to establish a condition of things that will enable juries to function honestly and fearlessly as citizens. They are not able to do that if we force trial by jury at a stage when juries as citizens could not or may not be able to do justice to the State. We would be taking a grave responsibility, and perhaps force a condition of things where trial by jury would end. That is a grave responsibility that every man who knows the country must face. There is no use in making this not alone a possibility, but a probability. All this must be present in our minds, especially in the country. Is that condition of things desirable? Should juries be forced to discharge their duties as citizens in an atmosphere and at a time in which it is not humanly possible that they could do it fearlessly?

I set more value on the life of the law and the continuance of justice, and the execution of that justice, than on the liberty of any citizen or any body of citizens. The law must live and the confidence of the citizen in its justice must be preserved. The law must remain, while citizens come and go, when they are born into the world and when they die. That is the position as I see it, and I want to face it honestly and squarely. I am not thinking of myself nor of any individual; I am trying to think in the interests of the country as it is and as it is going to be. I do not think it is advisable to force a position whereby the cord of justice would be stretched to such a point that it might break. We do not want to be coming from the country always to Dublin for trials. That is a condition of things that is most unhealthy.

Every circuit ought to be sufficient to deal with crime within that circuit. The condition of things that makes it impossible to have justice administered within the circuit, and to force the law to function in that circuit at a time when it is not humanly possible that it could function, honestly and fearlessly, is not acting in the interests of law or in the interests of order, or in the interests of the State. Now, if the civil law is to be put into operation at the moment, and no other law, the question that faces me is that the civil arm of the law to be effective at present should be armed. We know that there are arms in the country, any amount of them. I do not speak of arms in the hands of Irregulars alone. I think the arms in their hands, that is in the hands of what I might call responsible Irregulars, are the least dangerous. Arms in the hands of irresponsible Irregulars are much more dangerous. Arms in the hands of the man who is out for loot and robbery are very much more dangerous still, and arms in the hands of soldiers, mobilised or demobilised, without authority, are the most dangerous, perhaps, of any.

And such a position exists. Soldiers leaving the Army had the opportunity of getting and retaining arms. Some men, perhaps, even in the Service, are subject to some of the traits that human nature is subject to, and have, perhaps, an extra strain of the original Cain. That is not the monopoly of any class of citizens, but if the civil arm of the law alone is going to operate while all these arms are in the country held indiscriminately in the hands of men, the Civic Guard must be armed. Do we want the Civic Guard armed? (Deputies: "No, no.") Do we want such a condition as that? That is a question that any man with a sense of responsibility, without thinking of personalities, must face honestly and squarely, and I want to face it. As I see this matter, we must accept this Bill as a necessity. We dislike it. All of us with a sense of civic spirit and liberty must dislike it. I dislike it as much as anybody, but it is a question of evils. I have mentioned some of the evils as they appear to me. Other Deputies have mentioned others; I am not speaking on behalf of any party in this matter—I am speaking for myself alone, and in that capacity I will vote for the Second Reading of this Bill.

Mr. P. HOGAN (Clare): As one of the Deputies from one of the terrorised districts of which the Minister for Home Affairs spoke, where we will have to bolt our Christmas doors and muffle our Christmas windows to save ourselves from the terrorists who stalk the land, I think I have a right to say something on this Bill. I intend to oppose the measure, and I will give my reasons as briefly as possible. The Minister for Home Affairs told us he was waiving certain fundamental rights and principles under this Bill. He gave us new terms in law, such as "common knowledge," and such things, and he told us about common blackguards, and from that he proceeded to imprison those blackguards on common knowledge. He did not take the precaution to prove one elementary principle of blackguardism, or one elementary act of blackguardism against any of these parties. Deputy Gorey and the Minister for Home Affairs are more or less at one in this matter. They do not believe that jurors will discharge their duties, and they tell us the verdicts juries will give will be verdicts inspired by terror. But perhaps I am entitled to ask Deputy Gorey and the Minister for Home Affairs, how does it come about that they are entitled to say what is justice and what is a true verdict? How do they become super-men to decide against the decision of twelve men who are put forward to try a case? Now, there is another point in the matter, and it is rather serious. We abrogate the fundamental principle of freedom upon which every constitution is based, namely, that the citizen is entitled to trial, in order to build up this emergency structure. That is not denied; yet the Minister for Home Affairs told us that it was only in five or six different parts of Ireland that it was necessary this thing should operate. If I am to take the statement of the Minister for Finance that the war of destruction is over, how is it that the Minister for Home Affairs cannot concentrate on these five or six areas, instead of making the imposition of this measure apply to all Ireland? It surely should be in the power of the Minister to concentrate the forces at his command on these areas in bringing about the condition of affairs in these five or six areas which he says applies in the rest of Ireland. There were some references in the remarks of the Minister that one might have thought would certainly not appeal either to people in this Dáil or outside it. He told us that when the British were rampaging in this country some of the men—I am not sure whether he said all or some of these men—were under the bed. I would suggest to the Minister for Home Affairs that patriotism is not the monopoly of any party in this country, and that there are men incarcerated and on the hillsides to-day who did as much as any person in this Dáil or outside it to bring about the state of affairs that we have at present—that is the freedom that we now enjoy. But the particular point I want to make is this, that for the sake of handing over to a few people, who will be in the position of autocrats, the right to say what is or what is not a correct verdict, is sapping the very fundamental principle upon which common justice is based. If we say that a band of terrorists in any part of this country can force juries to bring in a false verdict, then, I say, this measure is not calculated to produce the bringing in of true verdicts, because we would put in the hands of people, who may or may not be prejudiced, power to say who is or who is not to be free in this country. That is a state of affairs we are told existed in far away Russia in the days when it was in the power of one man to sling other people into jail and hold them there as long as he liked. There is a provision in this Bill which says you can appeal to a court, but when the result of that appeal is notified to the responsible Minister he has the right to refer it back again, if there is further evidence to be adduced. I ask you as a body of sensible citizens, to say what is to prevent anyone who can bring in evidence piecemeal to keep men incarcerated indefinitely. And if that authority, vested in the body of citizens constituting the State, is to be relegated to one man or a set of men who will set themselves up as autocrats or super-men, then the freedom of the citizen is in very grave danger.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. Hogan): I do not think I ever listened to a less frank speech than the last speech. I could forgive it in any man except a man who comes from the County Clare. I know the County Clare, and so does the Deputy who has just spoken; we both come from the county, and know it fairly well, yet the Deputy gets up here before thirty, forty, or fifty men who know the country fairly well, perhaps not as well as either of us, and he asks us what reason have we to think that a jury in the County Clare would not fearlessly convict a man for seizing his neighbour's property, and he asks us is there anything inherent in the present situation which makes it less likely that a juror or a witness in Clare will not do his duty in a case like that.

Deputy Hogan knows as well as I do, that that is an absolutely unreal question in the circumstances of the case. He knows as well as I do that there are a hundred and one factors operating in the County Clare at the present moment which would make it even less real than it was formerly: that a jury would go out of its way to convict a man who had been knocking his neighbour's walls or grabbing his neighbour's land, or that a witness would go out of his way to walk, let us say, from West Clare into Ennis to give evidence against the co-operative society that was seizing land all over West Clare, and that he would go home in the dark of the evening without a revolver or protection of any kind.

Mr. HOGAN (Clare): I did not say "go out of his way." I said he would do it in the ordinary course of events as a citizen.

Mr. HOGAN: Do you really mean that? Was there ever such nonsense? This Bill may be an absolutely rotten Bill, but let us, for goodness sake, try to get next to the issues that are raised in the Bill and tackle them honestly. I say the Deputy's method is not tackling the issues honestly, and that to say that there are no reasons present at this moment which make the position of a jury or a witness different from what it was, let us say, in the year 1913, is not tackling the issue honestly, and any Labour Deputy, Farmer Deputy, or any member of the Cumann na nGaedheal Party who would take up that position must know it to be a most unreal position. Deputy Johnson made the case by the very facile and easy method of saying "Release the prisoners or try them." That, again, is simply a dark counsel.

I would like to ask Deputy Johnson or any other Deputy here this question: If it were possible and convenient to try all the prisoners whom we have taken, would it not be our duty to try them rather than to release them without trial? I would like to have an answer to that question now. If it were possible or convenient to do so, would it not be our duty to try these prisoners rather than to release them?

Mr. JOHNSON: The Minister for Home Affairs defends this Bill on the grounds that you have not got proof. I say if you have got proof it is your duty either to try the prisoners or to release them.

Mr. HOGAN: That was not quite the position that the Deputy took up. He said you have thousands of prisoners all captured in arms.

Mr. JOHNSON: I did not say anything of the kind.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: What the Deputy said, I think, was that there were some prisoners captured in the act.

Mr. HOGAN: Very well, I will take that, that there were some prisoners captured in the act. My interpretation of that may be far-fetched, that when the Deputy said that he was referring to the vast number of Irregular prisoners whom we took through the country actually on active service. That, I take it, was what the Deputy meant, and his suggestion was that the mere taking of them was evidence that we could prove a charge against them.

Mr. JOHNSON: Does the Minister suggest that the Government or the military authorities have no prisoner in their custody that they could not prove guilt against up to the hilt?

Mr. HOGAN: I did not make any such suggestion. What I did say was this, that Deputy Johnson took up the position that we had a very large number of prisoners in our possession caught in the act, and caught in the execution of certain operations, and that we could try them and prove a case against them, that we had evidence against them in our own hands, and then he went on to draw his own deductions from that, and asked, "Why do you not try them?" He said, "The mere fact that you do not try them, that you have not tried them, and that you are releasing some of them, shows that you regard what has been done, and regard the men who have been doing certain things during the last year, not as criminals which they would be in certain circumstances, but something very different." That was his line of argument.

Mr. JOHNSON: Do you deny it?

Mr. HOGAN: Does the Deputy really suggest that we could try every prisoner taken in the act? Is that his suggestion? The Deputy knows as well as I do that it would be quite impossible for us to try the thousands and thousands of prisoners taken in the act. I make him a present now of the legal difficulties of getting the particular soldier, the particular man and the particular officer that captured these prisoners. Supposing that we had all that evidence, the Deputy knows quite well that it would be impossible for us to try all the prisoners taken in the act. He knows quite well, though, of course, it is not his business to suggest it, that supposing we were to try all these prisoners, we would have to set up special machinery for the trial of seven or eight thousand prisoners caught in the act. He knows that quite well, and what he is really doing is this: he is trying to put us in an impossible dilemma by saying "Release the prisoners or try them." His suggestion amounts to this: that we should try all the prisoners, every one that we have a charge against, and remember that we have seven or eight thousand prisoners.

The Deputy's suggestion is simply an attempt to put us in an impossible and in an unreal dilemma, and is not a facing of the facts of the case. In the next breath you have the Minister for Home Affairs charged with calling these prisoners common blackguards, and he is reminded that there are men on the hills who did as much for Ireland as anybody else.

Mr. JOHNSON: When you say in his next breath, are you referring to my speech?

Mr. HOGAN: No, I am referring to Deputy Hogan's speech.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The next speech rather than the next breath.

Mr. HOGAN: I assume that all the members of the Labour Party breathe the same air. At all events, all their speeches have the same rarified air. The next charge from the Labour benches is, that the Minister for Home Affairs referred to these men as blackguards. The Minister was reminded that there are some great fellows on the hills that did as much for Ireland as anybody else did. The Minister for Home Affairs was extremely careful to draw a distinction. He was extremely careful to say, and I repeat that we will never get anywhere unless we try to meet each other's points, that there were different classes amongst the Irregulars; that there were on the one side a number of ordinary, decent country fellows who were deceived and led astray, coerced, if you like, in a great many cases into this movement, and that, on the other hand, there was an extremely large number who took advantage of the invitation which they received from de Valera, who told them "Ireland is yours for the taking; take it," and who started to call this Republicanism. The Minister was careful to make that distinction.

Mr. JOHNSON: Can you prove that?

Mr. HOGAN: Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON: Is it a guilty act?

Mr. HOGAN: I think it would be better if the Deputy allowed me to finish my speech. There were men, I say, and every Deputy on the Labour

[Mr. Hogan.] benches knows this, and every Deputy from Clare and from Tipperary, and, indeed, from all over Ireland knows, that there were hundreds of these men who took advantage of the invitation they got from the President of the Republic, when he told them that "Ireland is yours for the taking; take it." In response to that invitation they went out and committed a series of offences, not only against life and property, but against all the decencies of life. Everyone here knows that the Minister for Home Affairs made that very distinction, that there are two classes to be considered. We probably caught the first class in arms, and I do not stand for trying them. I would release them. The Minister for Home Affairs would probably release them, and, as a matter of fact, has been releasing them, and all he claims is the right to make a judicious selection as regards the first class, even though they were caught in arms.

Mr. JOHNSON: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. HOGAN: Even if they were caught in arms the first class will be released gradually. As a matter of fact they are being released rapidly, and will continue to be released rapidly, though they are men who were caught in arms, whom Deputy Johnson wants us to try. But you will not catch these in arms—at least, not as often as the others. You will not get your bank robber as often in arms; you will not get your looter, you will not get the sort of man who became demoralised—whose character was so weak that he allowed himself to degenerate into a type that has very nearly disgraced this country. You will not get him in arms. He will be careful to advise his proofs before he does anything. The fellow who goes out at night and knocks his neighbour's walls, drives away his neighbour's cattle, or robs the local shop, will call himself a Republican; he will appear to the shopkeeper or bank manager as a Republican, with a revolver in his hand, but he will not be caught in arms. What are we to do with him? Deputy Hogan scoffed at the idea of "moral certainty." The Minister for Home Affairs comes from the country like ourselves, and he knows, as Deputy Hogan knows, that there is such a thing as "moral certainty" in these cases. He knows perfectly well of the conditions that obtain in the country, and that it is known that certain men either did a thing or inspired it. There may, however, be no evidence available; it may have been done secretly. The Deputy knows that conditions make it unfair to ask the ordinary citizen to go into court and to give evidence against the culprits. After a couple of years of revolution you have a different condition of affairs in the country from what you had previously. You have a change of mind and heart in the people. If you admit that there is a change which makes things more difficult, will you put up a constructive alternative to the Bill put forward by the Minister for Home Affairs?

There is no alternative that I can see. We take power, under this Bill, to intern, not the man who is caught in arms as such, not the man against whom there is nothing else, but the man, whether he is caught in arms or not, whether he is a prisoner at present or still on the hills, in respect of whom there is a "moral certainty" that he has committed heinous offences already, or who we know, from the intelligence we have in our prisons and elsewhere, has not changed his mind, but is likely to go out and commit the same offences again. The only power we take is to delay the release of men like this—not to release them until our foundations are a little more firmly laid and a little better set. Is there anything terrible in that? What is the alternative? What would Deputy Johnson or Deputy Hogan do with the village blackguard, who we all know has been committing offences and who, we all know, is likely to commit offences? Does he say, "Release him or try him?" There is nothing else in question. If you once take power to intern on suspicion, you can say: "Intern on suspicion everybody who is caught with a gun," or you can say: "Intern on suspicion everybody who has not been caught with a gun, but whom there is some offence against."

Mr. JOHNSON: Would the Minister say whether the intention behind Clause 3 of this Bill is to detain only those who have been guilty of this kind of blackguardism which he is now defining?

Mr. HOGAN: The intention under Clause 3 of the Bill is quite clear. The Bill gives us power to intern the man whom the Minister for Home Affairs described for shortness and in a way we all understood, as "the black-guard." It gives us power to intern the man who still takes up the position that he is either a member or a supporter of a rival Government not elected by the people, who claim to be entitled to take advantage of the arms that are dumped in the country to start this war again. Does the Deputy object to that?

That is the answer to the Deputy's question. Either we must have power to intern on suspicion, and we must trust the discretion of the particular Minister responsible, who is here in the Dáil, to be criticised day after day, for every act of his under this Bill, or we must take the bull by the horns and say, "Release or try." There is no other way out of it.

We ought to face the real issues raised in this Bill. We ought not to be putting up arguments for the sake of knocking them down. Meet the real points raised. I suggest to Deputy Johnson, apropos of his opening remarks, that what this country wants is not "good taste"—though it could do with a little more of it—but God's truth.

Mr. BAXTER: In introducing the measure, the Minister for Home Affairs told us that his predominant thought was to afford adequate protection to the simple people of the country, and he puts the responsibility on the Deputies here to discharge their duties to the people. I think we are to assume that his point of view as regards their discharge of that duty to the people is that they shall agree to the Second Reading of this measure which he has introduced. I have been listening to the Minister for Home Affairs and to the Minister for Agriculture, and I have been trying to get to the back of their minds and to discover what is the real reason for the introduction of this Bill. I must say that I am not yet clear, from either statement, what is the real purpose of the measure. The Minister for Home Affairs, in one part of his speech, told us of the dangers to the people of the country and of the difficulties that the law will have to encounter in getting decisions in the courts against people who commit offences. He went on to the part of the measure that entitles him to hold prisoners in camp or in prison without trial. He gave us his reasons why these prisoners should be kept. Nothing that either Minister has said, so far as I can see, is sufficient justification, taking into account the conditions in the country at present, for suspending three clauses of the Constitution. The principal argument of the Minister for Home Affairs, in introducing the measure, was, as far as I understand, the fact that jurors down the country could not be got to perform their duty under present conditions as they should.

They could not be got to give decisions because of the danger to their persons and because of their lack of physical or moral courage. Because of that fact the alternative is, where there is a suspicion that men or, I presume, women have committed offences, to cast them into prison, or into internment camps, during the pleasure of the Minister. He seeks power from the Dáil to arrest and intern men, and he also seeks power, and I think this is much more dangerous, for military officers to arrest and detain, for a period of seven days, people, up and down the country, who may be suspected of having committed offences. That is going very far, indeed, and if the people of the country and Deputies are to give power to military officers to go into homes as they please, and take away boys or girls, keep them for a period of five or six days without bringing any charge against them, and without any possibility of their being brought to trial, it seems to me it is going too far. The Minister for Home Affairs may assure us that these officers will not outstep their duty, and that although this liberty may be given them, they will have very good reason for [Mr. Baxter.] any drastic action they may choose to take. It will not satisfy me that this power should be given into the hands of military officers up and down the country.

It is only a few weeks ago, when coming up here with two men, who are very well known in my county, that I encountered these officers, in plain clothes, at the railway station. They presented revolvers at our heads and marched us off, without asking our names, after a minute inspection of our belongings—more minute than I had ever experienced before. They then hawked us through the city in a Crossley tender. They brought us to some barrack which rang up Headquarters, and our names were then, and only then, asked. The names were given to Headquarters, and orders came for our release with profuse apologies. A mistake had been made! But we had spent three or four hours going round the city. I do not want to see military officers given powers to treat citizens of the Saorstát like that again. I do not think it is right that such power should be put indiscriminately into the hands of any army officer in any country.

We are told that the state of affairs in the country at the present moment demands that this measure should be passed. The Minister for Home Affairs has given us an account of conditions in a few counties, and we have heard of these conditions from some of the Deputies. I did not hear my county mentioned. We have had some unpleasant incidents there and some shocking happenings within the last few days, but from what I know I say honestly that there is no occasion for such a measure to preserve the peace, to preserve law, or save the citizens of the State from attack by anyone. I say more, that I do not think it is going to afford the citizens of this State any more protection than they can have under the ordinary common law. I hold that the ordinary common law should not be suspended. If men commit offences they can be brought before the Courts and evidence can be secured against them. Juries can be found who will find verdicts, as juries have found verdicts recently, that resulted in the passing of death sentences. Surely jurymen can be got in every district in the country to discharge their duties. It would be time enough when they had failed, and when the Minister for Home Affairs was able to show the country that the existing powers were not sufficient to enable him to administer justice and maintain law, to take the present step. As to the provision in the latter part of the Bill that gives the right to hold these men and women at present in internment camps and prisons, and the distinction drawn between them, I am not prepared to agree that it is a fair distinction. I believe, and I think Ministers and their supporters will agree, that there are as desperate men outside the prisons and camps, and at liberty, as there are inside. These men are not doing anything very extraordinary. We were told by the Minister for Agriculture of proclamations of the Republican Government, of the dangers if certain people at present in prison were released, and what their support would mean. Well, proclamations have been issued, and I ask the Minister for Home Affairs to say what effect have these proclamations had? Is he seriously concerned about these proclamations? Does he fear that these proclamations are going to upset the State? I think he is satisfied that they are not going to seriously affect the State. Those people who tell us they are standing to maintain the Republican Government have stated that they are not going to give up the continuity of the Republican Government, if only in name. The Minister for Home Affairs is very careful to state at times everything that these people say. I think he should state both sides, and not state what is applicable to his own argument. That would be the fair thing to do.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: If the Deputy would tell me.

Mr. BAXTER: I am not in a position to do so. I think the Minister for Agriculture told us a few moments ago that the intelligence system in the prisons and elsewhere has enabled you to be in possession of information that no one else can obtain. I am sure you are in possession of more information at the moment on this point than I could supply you with. When it comes to the question as to whether the peace of the State is to be secured by keeping these people in prison, or releasing them, and when Ministers say that some of the men in prison would be a danger if released, I say there are as desperate men, and more desperate men, outside. There is comparative peace in the country, and I cannot see—and I do not think anyone else can—any danger of or any intention or any desire for a recurrence of the struggle that took place in the country during the past twelve months.

There is no desire, and no intention, and I believe the Ministry are satisfied about that, and have told us as much themselves. It is a very difficult thing to see why some men, who everyone in this country regard as very dangerous, have been released, and why others are being held in custody. We are told in the Schedule of this Bill that revolt against the Government of the country may be a reason why people may be arrested. We are not told whether that means armed revolt or whether it means argument to prove that the policy of the Government is not the best policy for the country. It is very vague and very indefinite. It seems to me that there is one conclusion that must, and will, be drawn by many persons in the country from this Bill. The powers the Ministry are asking for will force people to conclude that the Ministry do not want to give those people an opportunity outside to state their views, or when they do state their views there is a danger that they will find themselves locked up again. It is to be left to the Ministry to interpret what is revolt and what is not revolt. I hold that the Ministry through the existence of one political party are not the most capable judges.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Who should decide?

Mr. BAXTER: If any one is to decide let the courts of the country decide. If people are to be interned or imprisoned let those who charge them bring them before the courts and prove that they are guilty of offences, and when that is proved the country will be satisfied as much as the Ministry that these people should be locked up.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: I wish to make a few observations with reference to this Bill, particularly in view of the manner in which it has been debated. I had supposed that this Bill might be regarded as a non-political, non-party measure, and as one arising from the necessities of the time for dealing, during a transitory period, with crime which cannot be dealt with by any of the known methods of dealing with offences against the law. I have as great an abhorrence, as I am sure Deputy Johnson entertains, towards the infringement of the liberty of the citizen, or as Deputy Baxter entertains against detaining persons for holding particular political opinions. But what is our experience? It is not a matter of politics or of holding certain opinions, but of dealing with offences against the law. We have recently had very considerable tangible evidence of the difficulty that exists in various parts of the country in bringing persons to justice. That takes various forms. I am informed that in one place no jury will convict, and that so many jurors, or persons on the jury panel, have themselves been involved in offences with which persons may be charged, it is impossible to convict. I am informed by a State solicitor with reference to a charge against a man for having in his possession a large quantity of notes, undoubtedly looted from a bank, that he had been approached and asked what to do, and he was told there was no use in going on with the charge, as he might take it as settled that the jury would not convict.

We did bring a number of cases to Dublin, and, in the midst of various observations made about juries here and there through the country, it is well that one should realise the way in which Dublin jurors have done their duty. They have sat for many weeks dealing with cases from various parts of the country, and, whether they convicted or acquitted, I do not think that they gave a verdict that could be challenged; but it is absolutely impossible to impose on the jurors of Dublin the trial of all crimes in the country. They have stood it for weeks, but I do not know how much longer they would stand it and continue to deal with matters that should be dealt with locally by local jurors. Many of the offences, which it is impossible to hope to bring to their natural retribution, are properly described as offences against the State. These are cases of wholesale lootings, violence, cases in which armed bands, small it is true, quarter themselves on houses and compel people to support and maintain them—cases in which no one will give evidence. You have, on the one hand, the difficulty with the jury, and, on the other hand, the difficulty with witnesses. We have had experience of that, too, of people whose depositions were very guarded, so guarded that at any preliminary investigation which took place one knew they were keeping back matters, and who when the case was brought to Dublin unburdened themselves of all the facts. There is no doubt that in many parts of the country it is impossible to get crime dealt with normally in present circumstances. The way in which I view the situation is this. I do not view it as hopeless. I believe that when our new judiciary is established, and when we have our new Circuit Courts, in groups of counties within the ambit of a particular circuit, we will be able to get much more efficient trial by jury, and we will probably ultimately, in a reasonable time after the establishment of these Courts, arrive at a situation in which all crime can be dealt with within its own circuit. In the meantime, what are we to do? I will not be any party to returning to the old regime of jury packing. What remains? You cannot ask the juries of Dublin to try all crime. It revolts one to pack juries, and this simple expedient of deterrent detention seems to be the only middle course left between leaving these people at large, to the detriment of the country and a danger to the public safety, and bringing them to Dublin and imposing their trial on Dublin jurors. It is not quite fair to say that they will be left wholly without trial, because this Bill provides for Appeal Councils. These Appeal Councils may help in this way, that by shifting the onus and requiring the prisoner himself to put up the case to the Appeal Council, the facts may be got at and justice done that, perhaps, might not otherwise be done. When Deputy Johnson demanded a trial—I presume that means an effective trial for all prisoners, including those chargeable with political offences—I wonder, does he do so with the authority of any of those prisoners?

Mr. JOHNSON: I have no authority from, and no conversation, 4 o'clock. compact, or communication of any kind, with persons speaking on behalf of those prisoners.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL: This was purely a rhetorical question put for this reason. Trial was pressed for in the case of a number of persons deported from England during the year. They got a trial, and I do not know whether they are grateful to the people who pressed for those trials or not.

Mr. JOHNSON: It is out of consideration for those people you are refusing to try the rest. You have in your charge the chief culprits.

ATTORNEY - GENERAL : Deputy Johnson said in the course of his speech that he thought it was considerable wisdom to hold persons, whose offences were within a certain range, without trial, but subsequently demanded trial for them. I will remind Deputy Johnson of the effect upon people from whom a trial was demanded, and the result of that demand. I regard this as a simple measure for tiding over a difficult situation, which, I think, will be greatly relieved when we have established systems of courts, with juries operating in groups of counties, and not at all as a political measure, which some people describe it. There is only one other remark to add, and that is with reference to the general demand for a release which one hears from all sides. It is true that proclamations announcing peace have been published. If releases are demanded, should we not fairly ask should there not be reciprocity, because week by week there are proclamations and documents issued, signed over Army titles such as Chief of Staff and so on. What does this mean, taken in conjunction with the demand for the release? I say, let there be honesty and reciprocity, an honest intention to carry out those proclamations, relied upon for the one purpose, and it is probable that the other demand may be acceded to, even to a larger extent than it has been already acceded to.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I have very little to add to the statement which I made introducing the Bill. I was interested in the line taken by Deputy Johnson, but from our angle the dilemma he presented was this: It would be more reasonable to ask for the powers embodied in this Bill to deal with men still at large, who are making life a sour and unhappy thing for residents in particular areas, but you must not ask for powers to retain men whom you have already captured and who contributed greatly to that result in the past. Deputies who know anything of the situation in Leitrim or in East Galway know that there are armed gangs operating in those areas, that there are certain parts of those districts at any rate where a man holds what he has with his strong hand, conditions really not differing in principle, differing perhaps slightly in degree, from the conditions we might visualise as having existed in the Stone Age. We captured in a few cases leaders of gangs such as that, and men scarcely less desperate and ruthless stepped into the leadership by a process of natural election and they gained their promotion by the other man's misfortune. We are to release the person whom we captured and only use the powers we are asking for against the person who is still at large. What I foresee is this, if we are sufficiently fortunate to arrest a person who is a leader of an armed gang, his place would be quickly taken by the released former leader. Deputy Johnson makes me a present of that dilemma. I was reminded by Deputy Hogan that there were men interned and in prison who did as much for Ireland as any other men. I am quite prepared to believe that. There are men interned and at large who tried to do as much for Ireland as Cromwell or Mountjoy. I based the case for this Bill on the fact that there are areas in the country in which life is still unhappy, still unsafe, in which life is not a wholesome thing for the residents, because men are roaming around with arms, enforcing their will on the people, billeting themselves on the people, and creating in those areas conditions of terror which result in this, that you will not get evidence of crime, and that if you are so fortunate as to get evidence of crime, it is almost asking too much from juries to convict. That is the case in a nutshell for the Bill.

I am told that the challenge to the fabric of the State is a thing of the past, and I meet the people three-quarter ways who say that. It is more or less passed, but we have greater and wider duties than saving the fabric of the State. The challenge to the State may be passed, but a challenge to natural fundamental rights of citizens of the State is not passed, and these people are entitled to have those rights protected. One phrase was mentioned, the liberty of the subject. The liberty of which subject is my trouble? Of which subject—of 90 per cent. of the individuals of the country, or of the 10 per cent. who are encroaching and trampling on the rights of the 90 per cent? If we must choose between one and the other, if to vindicate and safeguard the rights of the 90 per cent., we must encroach on the rights of what would be 10 per cent., in an abnormal situation, I plump for opposing the rights of the 10 per cent. in order that the others may be more adequately safeguarded—in order that the other rights may be more fully and more adequately safeguarded and vindicated.

One factor that has to be considered when you are facing up to the question of the release of prisoners is this, and all Deputies will admit that it is relevant: What are the conditions in the area to which your released prisoners will be returned? If the conditions are bad, if the conditions are lawless, could you call it even an experiment to release prisoners and turn them back to such an area? It is not an experiment if the result is certain, and I submit that the result is certain, that there can be only one result of that course, and that is to make a bad situation worse.

[Mr. O'Higgins.]

I would like Deputies and people throughout the country to realise that that is a factor when the release of particular prisoners is being considered, that we have to advert to—what is the situation like where these men come from? If you throw them back into an area in which lawlessness is seething, are they likely to be model citizens, or are they likely to take up their old courses, the courses which resulted in their imprisonment and internment? Ought we to throw prisoners haphazard into Leitrim, into East Galway, into West Cork, and what would the residents in these areas, decent law-abiding residents, whose natural and fundamental rights are being infringed every day as a matter of routine, think of a Government who took that course? That is a proposition which Deputies ought to try to get their teeth into and chew before they talk vague sentimentality about our “bravest and best,” and so on. I think we ought to look on this question as something more than a peg on which to hang rhetoric. Deputy Gorey, at any rate, made an attempt to face up to the situation, and he made a proposal which, I think, did not meet with considerable approval, that was that the ordinary civil police should be armed.

Mr. GOREY: I did not propose that, except that we relied on the civil law.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I probably misunderstood the Deputy. It does not appeal to me.

Mr. GOREY: Nor to me.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Deputy Baxter said that there were men at large as desperate as any of the men in jail, and that they were not doing anything very extraordinary. Now, extraordinary is a relative term; it must be taken in the setting of the times. Deputy Baxter may not consider it an extraordinary thing that armed men should be going about the country living a non-productive, parasitical life, taking what they need by the right of their triggers.

Mr. BAXTER: I did not see any of them, anyway.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Well, Deputy Baxter must keep his eyes front all the time. I can assure him that there are such men. I have it on most reliable authority.

Mr. BAXTER: In uniform.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Not in uniform. He may not consider that an extraordinary state of affairs. I think it is not a state of affairs which the Government can afford to view with complacency, and I would venture a small bet that the residents in the areas where that state of affairs prevails, who are called upon from time to time to pay a tax, do not view it with any complacency. A government is not something apart from the people, something set up to be cursed or propagandised against, or anything in that way. A government, as I understand it, is a committee of the people with a mandate to make certain conditions prevail, to vindicate the ordinary natural rights of the people, and, so far as possible, to create and maintain conditions in which men can go about their business and carry on their avocations with a reasonable measure of security. That would seem to me to be one of the primary and elementary duties of a government. That is why we do not view with the complacency which Deputy Baxter seems to view it—the fact that people's rights are being trampled on, that men are living parasitically on the people by the right of their guns, taking what they want, leading an idle, parasitical, non-productive existence, drifting about in the picturesque, traditional rôle of “Ned of the Hill.”

There is even less excuse for that sort of thing if it is true, as we are told, the challenge to the fabric of the State has passed. If that challenge was still on one could say, “Well, after all, this is a revolution. These men are at war, and they may succeed in overturning the fabric of the State and setting up a new order of things in the country.” But we are told they have abandoned that. “The gun is now dropped and we will take to the platform and take up our pens for the production of election literature.” They are going to show how “much more potent as an instrument of Government is the loving regard which directs and inspires"—I think I saw something of the kind in a recent pronouncement. Then, what is the meaning of this system of armed bands roving around the country? While they exist they are the nucleus, the centre, to which released prisoners or other disgruntled elements in the country may rally, and we have to regard it, if not an actual danger at the moment, at least a grave potential danger in the future. That state of affairs exists, and we tried to take our responsibilities seriously in spite of the bad example set us by Deputies, like Deputy Baxter, who say that everything is lovely in the garden, and these men are doing nothing very extraordinary.

Of the prisoners, about 5,000 odd, I use the word "odd" in its mathematical sense, are left out of a total that at one time touched 15,000. We can proceed gradually, with a watchful eye on the situation in the country, to release these men, but Deputy Baxter will excuse us if in considering their release we pay particular attention to two main factors. Number one: the type of the man, what he is likely to do when released, what his future course of action is likely to be, and substantially we can only judge that from his past. Number two: the conditions prevailing in the area to which he would return on release. There is nothing very intricate, technical or profound in that. It seems to be that kind of common sense which is sometimes vulgarly called horse sense. It may not commend itself to some Deputies, but such as it is, it is the line we are following. I do not think that in a situation like that which confronts us and the people it is an excessive, harsh, or tyrannical thing to say that when a Minister who answers here daily to the representatives of the people is prepared to set his hand to a statement that a particular person is reasonably suspected of crimes set out in the Schedule of this Bill, that in all the circumstances we should have power to arrest and detain that person until the State recovers somewhat from the onslaught made on it, and the conditions through which it has passed. We have no real conception of freedom, no real conception of independence—

DEPUTIES: Hear, hear.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Hear, hear. If we had we would be dignified enough to appreciate what democracy means, and to resent more savagely and fiercely than we do the claim of any wretched minority to dictate to their fellow citizens at the point of the gun. It is the slave drop in us, the slave mind lingering in our midst, which makes us bear that thing with the equanimity and complacency with which we have borne it.

Motion carried. Third Stage ordered for Thursday, January 10th, 1924.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

WIRELESS BROADCASTING.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I understand the motion that I have put down on the subject of wireless broadcasting is being accepted by the Postmaster-General. In view of the fact that there is no opposition, could that motion be taken now and dispensed with?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: If the motion is unopposed it could be taken now. My information, on the authority of the Postmaster-General, is that Deputy Figgis insists upon a discussion. That, apparently, has now been remedied.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I am not insisting upon a discussion. If this motion of mine, as it stands, is accepted, I am quite prepared that there should be no discussion.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. Walsh): The motion is being accepted. I desire the fullest possible investigation into the preliminary stages of this effort of ours to devise a scheme for broadcasting. I welcome the appointment of a Committee. My only desire is that no unnecessary time would be lost in coming to business. It is very important for the sake of broadcasting, and it is particularly important because of the fact that notwithstanding our efforts broadcasting sets are being sneaked into this country without a possibility of detection. This matter should be got over without delay. I accept the motion though I do not quite agree with the wording of the second portion.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I therefore move:—

“That a Committee of this Dáil be appointed to consider the circular addressed to Deputies entitled ‘Wireless Broadcasting,’ especially in regard to the proposal by which it is intended that the State should pass over the right to licence and tax incoming wireless apparatus to a Clearing House under the control of a private company, the Committee to consist of nine Deputies to be nominated by the Committee of Selection and to be reported to the Dáil before January 16th, 1924."

Mr. WALSH: I second.

Motion put and agreed to.

Mr. WALSH: As far as we are concerned, we are most anxious to go ahead at once. It is purely a matter of accommodation for the members of the Committee of Selection. Presumably they will not get going before the re-assembly of the Dáil. In any case the Committee should be sanctioned by the Dáil and we will not have an opportunity of doing that before January 10th.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I could arrange to have a meeting of the Committee of Selection for January 10th and the nominations could be reported to the Dáil on that day.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I am quite agreeable to that course.

Mr. GOREY: As one of the members of the Committee of Selection, January 10th will suit admirably.

UNEMPLOYMENT PROBLEM.

Mr. MORRISSEY: I move:

"That the Dáil condemns the Government for its failure to deal seriously with the problem of unemployment and its refusal to provide means for ameliorating the distress arising from the failure of the Unemployment Insurance Fund; and, in particular, disapproves of any attempt to use the promised scheme of State Aid for road improvement and the existence of a large number of unemployed demobilised soldiers as means for forcing down the rate of wages paid for the ordinary work of road maintenance."

Speaking on the Railway Bill last night, the President said that next to unemployment the matter of the railways was the most important before the country, thereby admitting that this matter of unemployment is the most important problem with which the country is faced to-day. We are glad that the President and the Government have realised that, because one would be inclined to think, from the attention, or rather the lack of attention, that has been given to this matter, that they were not aware of the fact. Within the past two months thousands of men and women under Section 8, Sub-section (4) of the 1920 Unemployment Insurance Act have been cut away from unemployment benefit. Their ranks, as everybody knows, are being swelled, from day to day, by soldiers demobilised from the National Army, and by thousands of political prisoners who are being released from prisons and internment camps. There is no prospect before these people for the coming winter except the prospect of hunger and ultimate starvation. There is no unemployment benefit to be got. We know, of course, that every section of the community has suffered from the mad, destructive civil war which has been waged in the country for the last year and a half. But the workers have inevitably suffered most of all.

at this stage took the Chair.

Mr. MORRISSEY: We will be told, and perhaps properly, that were it not for that civil war, the Government would have been in a position long before this to undertake works of reconstruction and development that would have given employment. But the workers are being starved to-day in order that the country may be enabled to pay for the war that was waged about words and phrases, a war that the workers had no responsibility for. We will be told that because certain political parties saw their way to indulge in the luxury of civil war, that no money can be given for the relief of unemployment, that there can be no grants for reconstruction work on account of that war. The Government will, no doubt, claim that their first duty is to maintain law and order in the country. It must be quite clear to the Government that they must fail in that duty if they do not remove the cause or the causes of the lawlessness and disorder that obtain in the country to-day. The remedy for unemployment is work. I maintain that it is the duty of this Government to provide work for every man and woman in this country who is willing and able to work, and to provide it at a living wage. It is the duty of the Government to undertake works of reconstruction in order to provide the employment that is so badly wanted. I quite realise, and so do my colleagues on these benches, that if we are to have works of reconstruction, and if the nation is to be developed, as it should be developed, we must have the co-operation of every section of the community, and that every man must be prepared to take off his coat, and do his own part in the building up of the nation. The workers are prepared to do their own part, and the workers are prepared to make sacrifices for the general good of the nation. But the workers certainly are not satisfied to make all the sacrifices, and that is what is being asked of them to-day.

Speaking on the Railway Bill yesterday evening, the President said that if the country were to make proper progress, employers and workers would have to cut their cloth according to their measure. I would like to ask the President if he is aware of the fact that a lot of the workers in Ireland to-day have no cloth to cut. I believe if the Government does not tackle this problem of unemployment in a bold and determined way, in such a way as to give employment to men and women who are anxious and willing to work, that the country in the very near future will be faced with a situation compared with which the recent civil war was a mere bagatelle.

The Minister for Local Government recently issued a circular to public bodies about the grant of a million and a quarter which is to be made for reconstruction of the roads. And he said the public bodies must see that the present high wages obtained by road workers must be reduced, and that the present privileged position of the road workers must be altered. I wonder has the Minister for Local Government any idea of the wages paid to road workers?

Does the Minister know anything of the privileged conditions under which road workers work? I suppose it would be held a privilege that, in most counties, a worker on a road starts out to work at 8 o'clock in the morning, and if the day comes wet he has to walk back again wet to the skin, perhaps a distance of three, four or five miles, without receiving anything at all for his day. I desire to know if the Minister is aware of that? That is one of the privileged conditions under which the road workers live. We are told that the present high rate of wages must come down. I am sure nobody here would consider that a wage, say in Leitrim of 28/-, for a 60-hour week is a high wage with broken time. The wages of road workers range from 28/- to 45/-, and the hours worked by road workers range from 48 to 60 hours a week. I do not intend to deal at any great length with the question of this circular. It will be dealt with by other Deputies from this side of the Dáil, but I certainly say that if the Government want to face the problem of unemployment, they certainly are not going to do it by adopting such a policy as that of pitting demobilised soldiers from the National Army against the road workers of the country, and that is what they are trying to do.

In Mallow recently 35 men were let go, and were replaced by ex-National Army men at a reduction of 10/- per week. That is not the way to deal with the unemployment problem. I repeat what I said before, that it is my honest belief that unless the Government are prepared to make a determined attempt to provide employment and work for the people who are ready and willing to work at a reasonable wage, it will be faced with a position which, to say the least of it, is not pleasant to contemplate.

MR. MURPHY: I rise to second the motion, and I do so with very much regret. I think it will be apparent to everybody that it is a matter of very deep regret, not alone to members of the Labour Party, but to every other person in the country, that the Government of this State have done practically nothing towards the solution of this question. What is the position in the State to-day? As I understand it, as the members of the Labour Party understand it, and, I think, as everybody understands it, the position is that there are about 50,000 persons unemployed in the country to-day. You have that large number of people faced with this position, that they are not able to tell where the means to support them on the following day are to come from. The actual position is, that you have 50,000 persons on compulsory hunger strike to-day. I think that fact alone ought to be sufficient to induce the members of the Dáil and the Government of the State to realise that this is a very urgent problem, and one that requires to be dealt with at once if the calamity that we are faced with in the future, followed to its natural conclusion, is to be averted.

In addition to the 50,000 persons unemployed in the country, you have, as Deputy Morrissey pointed out, the ranks of the unemployed being swelled day after day by the men leaving the National Army at the present time, and the ranks will be further swelled by the unfortunate workers coming back from the prisons to their homes. In a good many cases these men will not be able to get unemployment benefit, because, as Deputy Morrissey pointed out, the Unemployment Act is for all practicable purposes already scrapped. The Ministry of Industry and Commerce issues a series of figures from time to time to the daily Press showing that the number of unemployed in this country is decreasing. I do not think that the figures that are being issued to the Press are correct. I would even go further and say that the figures, quite unintentionally perhaps, are most misleading. I believe that these figures, which are being served out from time to time to the Press as to the alleged reduction that has taken place in unemployment in this country, are not correct. The alleged reduction, I suggest, is due to the fact that unemployed men are not getting work, but rather to the fact that men are being knocked off the unemployment register, because under Section 8 of the Insurance Act they are held to be debarred from getting any further benefits.

It has been the fashion all over the country, and even in this Dáil, to sneer at the Unemployment Act. While I have always taken up the attitude that the Unemployment Act will never solve the question of unemployment, I still believe that that Act did a certain amount of good, and that it had certain merits. I know, of course, that the Act has certain faults, but these, I think, were due rather to its administration. It contained faults that could not be corrected, I suggest, on account of the loose code of morals that existed for the last two or three years, and also on account of the experiences that the country has passed through. To my mind, there was certainly not much ice cut by the cheap sneers that we have heard from time to time in the Dáil on this Unemployment Act. Neither do I think that there is much point in the remarks that we hear from time to time in this Dáil and elsewhere about the chronic idler.

There is one thing certain, and nobody can deny this, that the overwhelming majority of the workers in this country are not chronic idlers. The workers of the State are anxious to work for the benefit of their country, and they are not anxious to quarter themselves on the funds of this State, or to live at the expense of the taxpayers. To illustrate the points I am arguing, I desire to bring to the notice of the Dáil some of the conditions that exist in the constituency I represent as regards the Unemployment Act. I have before me, as I speak, instances of persons whose cases will be the subject of legal proceedings for obtaining unemployment benefit under false pretences. It is important that I should state that these persons are not workers. I have a couple of cases in mind which are to come before the Courts in the County Cork in the course of a few days of persons who attempted to get unemployment benefit, although at the time they were in the possession of two or three farms. At the outset of my remarks, I expressed the fear that nothing practicable would be done by the Government to solve this unemployment question.

I do not deny the fact that certain attempts were made or that certain schemes were brought about for the temporary relief of distress, and I would like, in passing, to say a word in connection with some of the schemes. Some time ago the Distress Committee of the Dáil initiated a scheme for the relief of certain districts. In a part of the country that I know the sum of £700 was allocated for the relief of distress. I would like to bring before the Dáil some of the facts in connection with the manner in which this money was spent. I have before me a case in my own district where the sum of £700 was handed over to a Rural Council to relieve distress amongst two or three hundred working men in that district and I know, and I could prove before any assembly or inquiry that may be set up, that that money was spent, not on the workers but for the benefit of members of the Council who kept the money and gave it to different people not in distress, and I think it fit and proper to say that in connection with any future scheme laid down for the relief of distress it would be well, and most necessary, that enquiry should be made and strict supervision carried on over the spending of that money. The position in the district I refer to was that the comfortable farmers' sons, members of the District Council, obtained this money given for the relief of distress and spent that money themselves among their friends and their cousins who are a class amongst themselves, and this money was spent upon horses and so on. That state of affairs is a gross wrong and it demands supervision, enquiry and attention from those responsible for the giving of that money. I have seen men who were unemployed for months go to a meeting of the council for the purpose of obtaining assistance from this fund, but they were turned away and would not get a single penny.

Now, I will mention some instances that came under my own notice in the constituency that I represent 5 o'clock. sent in connection with unemployment, and I will try to illustrate some things I have seen, even in my own locality, or in the County Cork at any rate, that have been done to relieve unemployment. Two or three days ago I put a question to the Ministry of Industry and Commerce, and I might say in passing, it is a matter for regret, on our part, to see that in an important debate like this the Minister for Industry and Commerce, or somebody from his Department, is not here. I put a question down to the Minister in connection with the closing down of Barytes Mine at Clonakilty in April, 1922. It was not closed down because the workers were turbulent or that they created an impossible position for the owners of the mine. As a matter of fact, and I do not know whether it is to the special credit or shame of the workers, they had previously accepted a reduction in wages, but they were guided in accepting that reduction by the fact that in doing so they were helping to keep the enterprise going. At any rate the mine closed down and that position obtained for the last twelve months, and between 100 and 105 men are now unemployed and walking the streets of Clonakilty, and in the last two or three weeks I was told that all these people, under the Section quoted by Deputy Morrissey, will be deprived of unemployment benefit. During the last twelve months the Minister for Industry and Commerce paid these people a sum of £5,000 at the lowest calculation, and I submit that if that money was spent in helping to keep the enterprise these men were engaged on going it would be well spent, and would save the awful position that the 105 men I have referred to have to face this coming Christmas.

I have other instances besides that. I questioned the Minister for Local Government a few days ago in connection with the allocation of money for the relief of distress in another part of Cork — Castletown-Berehaven. That district is one of the hardest hit by the present situation. It used to be a fishing station of some importance, but now it is practically deserted in that respect. There again we are faced with the position that the Ministry of Fisheries has no money available for the development of the fishing industry. The Minister for Local Government, in his reply to me, said that a certain amount of money had been allocated to this district for the relief of distress but that the money was held up owing to irregular activities in the district. I understand there is a certain amount of truth in that statement. I think some measure of comfort for the men in that district depended on the employment that they could get and if the Minister for Local Government, or some official in his Department could have devised some scheme, if not then, well, at a later day, it would have given these poor people at least the right to live. I could go on multiplying for a long time the instances I have given in this matter, but I do not intend to weary Deputies in the Dáil by long speeches or by numerous statistics on the question. But I claim the indulgence of the Dáil to refer to the circular mentioned by Deputy Morrissey already. The Minister for Local Government in issuing this circular and sending it out to the Council makes, to my mind at any rate, two or three extraordinary statements. He says: "It is in the national interest to secure a high standard of road maintenance, but if the large mileage of trunk roads requiring reconstruction is to be dealt with efficiently and with due regard to the cost which can reasonably be borne by ratepayers, a stricter control of expenditure must be instituted, existing rates of wages must be reduced and the present privileged character of road labour reviewed."

Like Deputy Morrissey, I have yet to learn that the position of the road workers, as far as I know it, or so far as our Party knows it, is in any way privileged. Down in the County Cork where we had experience of the ravages caused by two wars, I make bold to say that the position of the road workers has been anything but an enviable one. In my opinion when the Minister for Local Government says that there is not a proper standard of efficiency under the direct labour system at present he is condemning that system without giving it due consideration and I do not think that without going into the matter fully he is warranted in coming to such a conclusion. He should get all the facts of the question put before him and give the matter due consideration before coming to such a conclusion. I know that the road workers in the County Cork who have been trying to earn a living as road workers during the last two or three years were certainly not in a privileged position. I know that in many of their homes at the present time, and even during the period I refer to, there was nothing but pure naked and unashamed hunger. Therefore I say it is a slight on a body of unfortunate men to suggest that they occupy a privileged position without at least adducing some evidence as to what the privilege consisted of. I understand it is the intention of the Government at the present time to put on the roads members of the National Army who are demobilised. Two or three days ago I heard a handsome tribute from the President uttered in this Dáil in praise of the men of the National Army. I certainly, and I am sure I may say the same for everyone on these Benches, would not gainsay a word that the President spoke in praise of the men of the National Army on that occasion. We are as much indebted to them as to any other class for the way in which the structure of this Nation has been saved, but I do say it is not worthy of the traditions of the Army nor of the Government of the people to ask these men when leaving the National Army to go back into the world and engage in a mobilised system of scabbing on their fellow workers.

I do not think it is right to ask the men who are leaving the National Army to go back and assist in breaking down the system of wages. I do not think it is wise to ask men of the National Army to go back into their own districts and to take the bread out of the mouths of their starving brothers. The workers of this country looked forward to the establishment of this Government with hope. They gave some earnest of what they were prepared to do in the establishment of this Government. I say that the workers have been disappointed. I believe—and I think I have some reason for believing—that the attitude of the Government, as revealed from time to time, is an attitude of hostility to the workers. Three or four weeks ago we had announced here the decision of the Minister for Finance to attack the position of the National teachers and old age pensioners. Yesterday we had a report from the Postmaster-General that turned down the recommendations of the Commission set up by the Government to enquire into the conditions of the Postal Service. Now we have the attack on more unfortunate people still—the road workers. I cannot believe that any Government that set the slogan, “Justice, Equity, Freedom, and Common Citizenship,” in 1918, would have adopted a policy that means reduction in wages and starvation in 1923. The Government has not attended to this matter in the fashion that it ought to have done. The question does not brook any further delay, and believing, as I do, that the Government has ignored this matter, either deliberately or unintentionally, I second this motion.

Mr. HALL: The two speakers who supported this motion referred to the road workers and to the road workers only. There is another class of worker in Ireland to-day who is in the same deplorable condition as the unemployed road worker. That is the agricultural worker. He has suffered at all times from unemployment, and when unemployment came he was always left out in the cold. He had not the assistance of unemployment insurance. That Act was not at any time meant for the protection of the agricultural workers. Coming from an agricultural county—Co. Meath—as I do, I am aware that there are figures available showing that 37 per cent. of the agricultural workers of that county have been idle for the past seven months. They have been thrown on the roadside by the employers, who call themselves farmers. As every Deputy here is aware, Co. Meath is not a county that is inhabited, in any sense, by a farming community. It is a county that is controlled and owned by the large propertied classes, known as the grazier and the land grabber. It is within the knowledge of everybody that you will find in County Meath 2,000 acres of land owned by one big capitalist, who calls himself an employer. But when we come to examine his machinery of employment, we find that on that 2,000 acres of land he has employed only two men and two dogs. The same thing applies to Westmeath and to many other counties. When the Government formulates its plans for the relief of unemployment, I trust that it will embody in them some provision for the relief of the unemployed agricultural workers as well as for the unemployed road workers.

Down in County Meath there are at present only 33 per cent. of the road workers employed, leaving 67 per cent. with no means of livelihood, save in very few instances. Some of them draw the miserable dole from the Unemployment Exchange. It is a fact that the unemployed road worker went to the Labour Exchange—a distance in some cases of from 6 to 15 miles—signed the usual declaration there, got the usual forms of declaration signed in his own locality by householders, certifying that he was unemployed during the period in question, and notwithstanding all this trouble, to my own knowledge there are 39 men who have been looking for this unemployment benefit since the 27th October last, and who never got a penny yet. Moreover, there is no sign of it. They have been told “Come back next week and we will have it for you.” But it does not come. The Government are well aware of these things. When questions regarding the relief of unemployment have been put to the Government, it has often occurred to me that the Government have not been one bit sincere in their replies regarding the unemployed workers. We have been told time and again—and the Labour Deputies in the last Dáil were told—that the matter “is under consideration.” It is always “being considered,” or “it will receive immediate consideration.” But this piece of administrative machinery, which I take leave to describe as “the machinery of consideration” is turned by a very slow process. The engine that is driving this piece of machinery must go out of order very often. Like a piece of elastic, “consideration” can stretch 900 times the length of itself. “The matter will have immediate consideration!” That is one of the familiar phrases from the Government benches. And you may be assured that that is the last of that particular matter you are going to hear until you raise the same question again. And again you will be told that the matter is going to have consideration. The process of consideration is apparently very long drawn out.

To come back to the road workers—and I am very glad to see the Minister for Local Government here—there has been collected in County Meath in motor tax £16,404 between January, 1922, and November 30, 1923.

Notwithstanding the fact that that money has gone to the Government not one penny of it has been distributed in the maintenance of the roads or for the relief of unemployment. Another rate, of 6d. in the £, was raised by direction of the last Minister for Local Government in connection with the Damage to Property Act. That rate was supposed to be for compensation and for repairs to damaged property. In County Meath £13,937 1s. was raised, and at the same time £3,916 0s. 7d. was spent by the County Council in repairing bridges. Although the County Council spent £3,916 repairing the bridges and raised nearly £14,000 under the Damage to Property Act, the Minister for Local Government never recouped the £3,916 to the County Council. The Minister promised the Vice-Chairman of the County Council that the £3,916 would be refunded and that it could be used for the relief of unemployment in the county. That promise was like the piece of machinery entitled “consideration.” We have to wait for it, and probably we may get it as an Easter gift, when a new rate will be in course of collection, and when the County Council will be in a better financial position than it is now.

On the 30th January last the estimate of Dunshaughlin Rural District Council was put before the County Council by the County Surveyor. The estimate amounted to £5,588. The District Council believed that there would be no grants available. Apparently they were fortune-tellers, because they were right. They increased the estimate for the one year by £7,000, and it was adopted by the County Council on the 26th February. On the 15th March sanction was requested for the increased expenditure, but several months passed before the machinery of the Department could be moved. It was on 12th July they sent their sanction, over two months after the statutory time for the striking of the rates by the County Council. The County Council could not wait for sanction and had to carry on with the estimate they had adopted. Some of the rate that was struck on the 7th May was collected when some of Deputy Gorey’s people became uneasy. They challenged the rate and got it quashed. At this time Dunshaughlin District Council and the County Council, as well as the workers, were agitating with the Local Government Department for relief of some kind as a substitute for the rate that had been quashed. These bodies were supported in their appeal by the largest ratepayer in the county, who was resident in the Dunshaughlin area. The request was that the County Council should be allowed to raise a loan of £7,500 for road maintenance in Dunshaughlin Rural District. Dunshaughlin Branch of the Farmers’ Association did everything possible to assist, and endeavoured to have the loan spread over a term of seven years. They thought that would be better than having the amount collected in two moieties this year. A deputation, representing all parties, interviewed the Minister for Local Government and statements were made during the interview by officials that I do not think really represented the mind of the Minister. I do not believe the Minister is as hard as some of his officials. It is my opinion that the machinery of that Ministry needs a little touching up.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

We are not discussing the Ministry of Local Government now.

Mr. HALL: We are discussing the failure—

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

That is outside the scope of the motion.

Mr. HALL: It is through the Minister for Local Government that we will have to get relief for road work, and an opportunity was afforded for providing relief in Dunshaughlin by raising a loan of £7,500. Since that date the Ministry of Local Government has not [Mr. Hall.] communicated with the Meath County Council nor has it given any authority as to what line of action should be taken. While that is going on road workers and their wives and families are starving. The children are barefooted and hungry as their parents have no means of livelihood. If we believe we are economising by leaving the workers and their families in that plight we are certainly making a big mistake.

If these workers go on the rates in another way, if they go into a county home, or receive home help, they become a burden. Before any of these relief systems are put into operation in the country, the Government should endeavour to relieve the present distress. In County Meath we have something like 2,800 men unemployed. I believe unemployment is worse in County Meath than anywhere else.

Mr. GOREY: What is the cause?

Mr. HALL: It must be realised that in 1920 and 1921, during the "Black-and-Tan" period, the workers throughout Ireland were disemployed for ten months and never grumbled, as they knew that it was in the interests of the country and that it was to assist in the national struggle, and also that the County Councils could not, at that time, carry on. Now, we have a lot of them still unemployed, and if a grant is available for employment on the roads, we are told that discharged National soldiers are to benefit by taking the place, as we have been told by Deputy Morrissey, of the ordinary road worker. He has to be dismissed and they are to be employed. The road worker who sacrificed a good deal in 1920-21 is again called upon to sacrifice his interests and those of his wife and family. He is, moreover, asked to accept a lower wage. The discharged National soldier is to be turned into a machine whereby a system of lower wages for road work is to be adopted. I do not think that that is very fair. If a soldier has served the nation, as undoubtedly every one of them has, I think it is up to the Government to give him a decent means of livelihood, without interfering with the unfortunate road worker who has toiled for years on the road. I do not think that that interference should take place at the hands of the discharged National soldier. I appeal to the Government to do everything humanly possible in the matter. I think it is about time that they got in earnest about their business, and instead of passing some of the Bills which they have brought before us, they should tackle this very serious problem that affects the means of livelihood of a large portion of the community. The question of unemployment will have to be faced, and it is the duty of the Government to adopt some immediate and adequate means of dealing with it. I hope the Government will take up that attitude and relieve distress. We do not want to burden the ratepayers, but the Government have sufficient money to deal with the problem. There is, for instance, the road tax, for which £16,000 has been collected in Meath, and probably the same amount in other counties. Why not put this money to its proper purpose, and why not, also, allocate for that purpose the money collected under the Damage to Property Act?

Mr. O'MAHONY: Deputy Morrissey, in moving this motion, was terse, and the arguments in support of it were in the main temperate and commendable. We are now dealing with the natural sequel resulting, as he said, from a mad war of words and phrases. I agree with him that the remedy for the position is work for all and that it is the duty of the Government to employ all they possibly can, as he suggested, on works of a reproductive character at a living wage. Now, without revealing any secret, I can relieve the mind of any of the Labour Members of any doubt they may have as to the intentions of the Government in this matter. The Government are going to deal liberally and generously with the situation. They are going to discharge their duty in a generous spirit to labour and in a manner which is the country's due. With that spirit on the part of the Government, I anticipate hopefully, as a result of the statement of Deputy Morrissey, that we shall have the active and healthy co-operation of the Labour representatives to enable us to round any corners that may arise on the question of wages or on any other detail associated with the scheme. Deputy Morrissey said that the workers were prepared to make some sacrifice, but that it would be unfair to expect them to make all the concessions. Nobody expects them to make all the concessions. It is a situation of "give and take," a situation in which labour should yield something, and in which capital or the Government—whichever way you regard it—should also yield something to labour. There is a common interest in a satisfactory settlement of the situation, and I believe that if the details are worked out to a healthy end it will be the beginning of an era in which unemployment, as we now know it, will be virtually unknown. The work to which the Labour Deputies have mainly confined themselves is work in association with unskilled labour—the reconstruction or the re-making of the roads.

I anticipate as far as possible the Government will expedite the beginning of such work. I need hardly point out that schemes should not be embarked upon without due consideration of all the work, that the men associated with the work should be selected in so far as selection is permissible, and that all those details will take some little time.

Mr. MORRISSEY: They are taking a long time.

Mr. O'MAHONY: And when these initial difficulties are got over the machine will then be in a position to secure that for every expenditure of public money we shall have the largest amount of labour employed and the greatest amount of beneficial results. I was sorry to hear the different Labour Deputies harp so much on the question of the employment of demobilised soldiers on this work. Who are the demobilised soldiers? They are the men without whose aid we would not be in a position to-day to discuss the question of unemployment or that of any other material reconstruction work in the country. Are the wounded soldiers of the war, if I may use the expression, to be thrown on the world and to become the new recipients of the dole or of home assistance. From what ranks were they recruited? They were recruited largely from the labour ranks. Surely if we are to differentiate at all with respect to those men, we should differentiate in their favour rather than otherwise. There is no necessity for differentiation. I think there will be room for all. They are all citizens of the common State. They are entitled to receive, at the least, common treatment with other members of the Labour ranks, and it was a mistaken policy on the part of some Labour Members to suggest that they should not be so treated. There is room for all, and all will be generously dealt with.

The seconder of the motion said it was work and not the dole that was wanted. I agree. The dole to a certain extent may have been a necessity, but no one can deny but that it has had a demoralising influence on the worker. I trust that the money the Government are now going to place at the disposal of labour—it will be largely used in labour, material will only to a small extent enter into the expenditure—will have the result of making unemployment disappear in the future by reason of the encouragement given not alone by the Government but by private employers in a more generous employment of labour when they see that labour recognises its responsibilities as well as its rights.

There is another class of labour, the claims of which have not been touched upon so far, and those are the skilled workers. In that respect I hope the Government will hasten forward a generous scheme of housing, particularly in favour of the dwellers of the towns and cities of the country. We know many cases, particularly in the City of Dublin, of the conditions under which the workers are housed. It is a disgrace to civilisation, and in no small degree, I believe, accounts for the discontentedness of labour. With respect to that particular phase of activity in favour of the disappearance of unemployment, I would like to call attention to what I might call attendant industries of the country, that have been hitherto neglected, and about one of which I put an important question in [Mr. O'Mahony.] the Dáil a short time ago. I got an answer that the matter was being considered. That was with respect to the slate industry which in this country has a capacity of taking off the unemployment market a large number of men who will have a large earning capacity, and which in addition will provide the roofing of Irish buildings with Irish slates produced by Irish labour with material as good as the imported article. Following the question I put in the Dáil, I had a communication from, I think, the Manager of the largest slate industry, at present in Ireland, one that has been dormant for some years past but has been recently revived.

Mr. GOREY: What is the address?

Mr. O'MAHONY: He says that he has 74 men employed but for want of capital he is unable to discharge one-fiftieth of the orders placed with him. Here is his suggestion to relieve the difficulty. If the Government will give him, not a grant, but the loan of £6,000, to be repaid in 10 or 15 years, he guarantees that within six months he will employ 100 additional hands, within 18 months a further 100 additional hands, and at the same time within the period discharge the loan to the Government.

I say that that ought to be closely inquired into by the Government, and if they are satisfied that there are assets behind it to warrant an advance of £6,000, that it should not be a loan in the ordinary sense, but an absolute grant as long as the man receiving it keeps up his end of the wicket, because I look upon the continuous employment of 100 men alone as of greater value, morally and materially, than an absolute grant of £6,000 out of the nation's purse. Furthermore, this man states that want of capital is holding him up, that this grant would enable him to develop an industry that has been recently associated with slate quarries, the crushing of slates for the production of bricks and cement. Deputy Morrissey and the other Labour Deputies demurred to the suggestion contained in the Government's proposal that wages should be revised with respect to the proposed expenditure on the roads. I am sure that they do not object to an inquiry, at any rate, as to that.

Mr. MORRISSEY: No.

Mr. O'MAHONY: The very figures quoted by Deputy Morrissey go to show that there is a necessity for an inquiry. He stated that in some districts the road workers' wages were 28/-, and in others 45/-. There is no earthly reason why, within the Twenty-Six Counties, there should be such a difference in wages to the same class of men who do the very same class of work.

Mr. JOHNSON: Will you level it up?

Mr. O'MAHONY: A further point I want to impress on the Government is this: Hitherto all the speeches have been directed to the subject of the reconstruction of roads in the rural areas. We have also to consider the worker in the urban area, where the cost of living is higher, where the numbers are greater, and where poverty and unemployment are more dominant. I say that in any scheme the claims of these men must be carefully considered. I understand that the administration of any scheme will be largely in the hands of the county surveyors, who have very little association with town interests. Officially they are not connected with the town, as the urban areas are self-governing bodies. I hope also that if the county surveyors are engaged on the question of a most important work, the early reconstruction of destroyed bridges, they will engage a large number of skilled and unskilled labourers to make good the damage. Owing to the condition of the bridges throughout a large part of the Twenty-Six Counties, and particularly in County Cork, this is a work of great urgency. That question was raised recently by Deputy Hennessey, and I have a letter from the South complaining of two very dangerous bridges that ought to be put in hands immediately.

I think these are the main points to be considered as regards the present position of unemployment. The motion in its present form and in all its detail is one that I cannot support. In so far as it states that the time has arrived when the Government should take active and immediate steps and give prompt effect to any decision arrived at to deal with this problem, I am in hearty agreement, and I hope that if any question should arise as regards wages, or any other matter, that we will all lend whatever little weight we possess to round off the corners and to cause the differences to disappear owing to the great demand that the conditions of the workers make upon us for a speedy settlement of the problem.

Mr. J. GOOD: I agree with what the President said yesterday and also with what the mover of the resolution has told us, that unemployment is one of the most serious problems facing us at the moment, but I am afraid in Ireland we are too prone to rely on the Government for everything. I would suggest that we should now set up a new order of things, that we should try to rely a little more on ourselves and less on the Government. It has always appeared to me that the system of relying on the Government to help us in every emergency is demoralising and injurious. It has been pointed out by Deputy O'Mahony, it was also mentioned by Deputy Morrissey, and I agree, that the remedy for unemployment is work. Work depends very largely on cost and on wages, and if wages are so high that they stop the progress of work, how are we to get work for the unemployed?

The industry that I happen to be connected with, and with which Deputy O'Mahony, I think, is also connected, is one that could give employment to a very large number of the unemployed in this country of ours. It could give immediate employment. We are sorry to say that there was destruction of buildings in a great many parts of the Free State. There is an urgent necessity for their restoration, and that work could provide immediate employment for a large number. How is it that we cannot give immediate employment on this work? The reason is, as I have pointed out before, that the cost of carrying out building work is so high at the moment that it is absolutely prohibitive. I have pointed out here on two occasions, I think, already, that the wages of a bricklayer in Dublin to-day amounts to £4 2s. 6d. a week. Men in London in all these skilled trades are looked upon as super-men. The super-bricklayer in London to-day receives, for the same number of hours, £3 11s. 6d., 11/- a week less than the man in Dublin. What has stopped employment in that large industry is obvious from that, and in order to get over that difficulty I suggested, a couple of weeks ago, to Deputy Johnson, who, we all know, has great influence with those engaged in the Labour movement, that if he would use that influence and that great ability which we all know he possesses, in a short time, I am sure, with a conference, we could get rid of this difficulty and thereby provide employment for a very large number without worrying the Government or adding to the burden of the taxpayer.

I agree with what has been said that the dole is a demoralising, if not an iniquitous system of providing for unemployment. I

6 o'clock.

I do not think the dole, as regards the Free State, has ever been administered on a fair basis. As we know, unemployment exists largely amongst what is known as unskilled labour, and unskilled labour, I suppose, receives in Dublin an average wage of approximately 50/- a week. The average family unemployed at the moment would receive approximately 25/- a week from the dole. That means practically half of the rate of earning that would be received by the head of that household if he were working. Our attention has been directed to the fact that the road labourer, in some cases in Ireland, receives 28/- per week, and though I do not know much about the farming industry, I think that 28/- would be an average for many of the districts in Southern Ireland. A family unemployed in these districts receives the same dole as a family unemployed in Dublin district. While in Dublin districts it is only 50 per cent. of the wage earned by the head of the family, it is practically equivalent to the wage in the other case. It has done untold harm, and it has killed industries, I am satisfied.

Mr. GOREY: This question of unemployment is not new in the Dáil. It was mentioned more than twelve months ago, by Deputy Johnson and his party. Means of relieving unemployment were suggested, and several channels mentioned, which could be utilised towards this end. It is not a matter that has been sprung on the Government. Deputy O'Mahony, in talking about the industry of the slate quarries, said that a certain quarry, in Munster, I presume, and probably in Cork, would go on working and employing more men if they got a loan of £6,000, or a grant. We have a quarry in South Tipperary that wants no grant or loan. It wants work in the building trade started where it can get a chance of tendering for contracts. A Deputy, speaking of unemployment in Meath, referred to the road-tax, and the allusion was meant to keep up the wage of the road-worker in Meath to 45/-, or whatever it is. I would say, as the Minister for Agriculture often says here, let us face the situation, let us realise the facts. Deputy Good evidently does not know the country when he says that 28/- is the average wage. It is less than that. A strike has been fought out in Waterford, and the Labour Party have asked their men to go back, and the wage is 25/-, a reasonable average, I think, for counties I am acquainted with. If the agricultural industry can only afford 25/-, I am taking that as the basis for argument, how can a worker who does less on the road expect to get 45/-, 38/-, 37/-, or, as in Dublin, 52/- I believe; Wicklow, 40/-, and Cork, 43/-? Do we want work for a few, or work for all? If we want work for the unemployed as a mass, we will have to cut our coat according to our measure. We can only employ them according to the resources of the country, and if we are going to relieve the mass of unemployment we cannot give a fancy wage to one class of the community, and none at all to another. We will have to give a reasonable wage to all, according to our resources. Deputy Hall referred to unemployment in Meath. Strikes and unemployment go hand in hand in the agricultural districts, and they are common where the Labour leaders have not realised the position in agricultural districts. They have put up and fought strikes without knowing the position, or realising what they were facing. They have been fought out in several districts with very bad results for labourer and farmer, but they were fought out because, as I say, the men who started them did not realise the position. It is no use, to use a very homely phrase, expecting blood out of a turnip, for there is no blood there. I have every sympathy with the motion. I advocated in the Dáil time and again that there were several heads of work that could be started for the relief of unemployment if the money was there, or whether it was there or not, if it was productive work it was the duty of the State to give work. Are the Labour Party ready to accept a wage if this productive or non-productive work is given—I do not care which, but I prefer productive—common to these districts where the work could be started? If Labour is prepared to do that, they are facing the situation, and there is no excuse for the Government not facing the situation. If both parties do not want to face the situation, according to the resources and conditions of the country, there is no use in handing in motions on unemployment and talking about it.

It is by facing the situation honestly and trying to deal with the country according to its resources, that we will get on the right road and come to a happy ending of this matter. If we are all genuine about settling it, let us come to the scratch and say so. You cannot pay a wage in agricultural districts—a wage that sometimes agriculturists cannot afford—except every worker in the district is prepared to accept the same amount as a wage. There has been talk about the wages of the road-workers and the wrongs inflicted on them. That is merely tinkering with the question. It is not honestly facing the situation and facing it in the interests of the masses of unemployed. Is it going to be a big wage for some people and none at all for others, or is it going to be a reasonable wage for everybody? If Labour is prepared to say it is going to be a reasonable wage, the Government, if it is not ready to meet them half way, does not then deserve to be a Government, and taxpayers do not deserve the rights of citizenship if they do not heartily agree. If the situation is not met honestly on both sides, I see no hope at all for relieving unemployment. If the situation is not met fairly and squarely what is the use of this motion?

Mr. LYONS: I am really surprised at the speech of Deputy Gorey.

Mr. GOREY: Deputy Lyons is generally surprised at me.

Mr. LYONS: When one reflects on the beautiful landscape that was painted by Deputy O'Mahony, recollecting Deputy Gorey's speech, one would imagine he was doing his utmost to soothe the nerves of the Labour representatives in order to prepare them for the attack of the Leader of the Farmers' Union. Deputy Gorey's statement was an attack on wages. How can any honest man think for a moment that a wage of 25/- or 28/- a week is capable of maintaining a husband, wife and family?

Mr. GOREY: Face the situation.

Mr. LYONS: I am prepared to face any situation against any member of the Farmers' Union in any part of the Saorstát. Take the case of a single man who has to go into lodgings; he has to pay 30/- a week for his upkeep. A lot has been said concerning road-workers. I know the road workers have been very hard hit. Under the circular letter sent out recently by the Minister for Local Government, the road-workers generally will suffer a serious amount of harm. I agree with the Deputies on the Labour Benches that it will have that effect. Take the case of Westmeath county. The rate of wages there is 45/- a week. That certainly appears to be an enormous wage, but when you take into account that 45/- a week is only paid during alternative weeks, the situation is quite different. The wage really amounts to £1 2s. 6d. The workers have been employed fortnight about for the last 12 months. Every second fortnight they have to hold out their hand for alms at the Labour Exchange. The majority of those workers live in South Westmeath and they walk a distance of 9 miles to Athlone where they are told by the Manager of the Labour Exchange to call again next day. Meanwhile, their children go hungry from morning till night.

Then again, there are demobilised men from the National Army. A lot of those now demobilised were not fortunate enough to be working prior to enlistment. When they had not an unemployment card before joining the Army, on demobilisation they are not entitled to anything. Some of them in the town of Athlone are dependent on the rates or the funds of the St. Vincent De Paul Society. Is it not a shame that men who offered their lives in order that we might meet here are dependent on the St. Vincent de Paul Society or on the County Home for their own and their dependents' upkeep?

I have written letters to different Ministers concerning most of those cases. In Co. Westmeath we have received, by way of a grant to relieve unemployment, a sum of £2,330. Sixty per cent. of the workers in the county are unemployed. The Council have decided that as soon as the Minister for Local Government forwards the money, work will be started and the wage will be 32/- a week. The man who worked on the roads before joining the army will be receiving 13/- a week less now than he received then. Still we hear the cry that the wages must come down. Every employer of labour, let him be a shop-keeper, manufacturer, farmer or any other professional gentleman—I do not associate professional gentlemen with some of the Farmer Deputies—must fully realise the position of the workers.

In 1914, when manufactured commodities went up in price, the wages of the workers did not rise in proportion. Now the cry is that the cost of living cannot be reduced until the wages come down first. Where are the excessive profits made on the sweat of the workers between 1914 and 1917? I agree with the terms of the motion, and I realise that the unemployment problem must be relieved. I do not like the first words of the motion, because they indicate, to my mind, a vote of censure upon the Government. It must be realised that the Government has tried to carry on against a minority which was out for the sole purpose of cutting the throat of the nation.

Since I had the honour of being a member of this Dáil—since September, 1922—there have been some very hard times, and I am sure I am voicing the opinion of the people that I represent when I say that it is not the intention of the workers in general to pass a vote of censure upon the Government they have elected themselves. But the workers have made sacrifices, and they ask in return that they be given employment in order that their sacrifices may not be in vain. I appeal to the Government to have something done immediately to ease the unemployment situation. Let them not do so in a manner like the slow motion picture that you see in the cinema after a great fight. I ask the Government and I honestly impress upon them to start the work at once. I quite agree with one of the Deputies on the Labour benches, the Deputy for Cork, when he says that when you write to a Minister or ask him a question the reply you get is "The matter is having attention."

Now, I would like to point out that there are a great many industries in the country on which employment might be given, apart altogether from the roads. We have at the present time, in Westmeath and Longford, hundreds and hundreds of acres of turbary and bog land. This is an absolute loss to the nation at present. There is a huge amount of wealth in it and great possibilities for employment if properly worked. The lakes and bog land can be drained and the turbary can be turned into fuel. If you invest money in that you get your money refunded again. I know very well it is necessary to keep up the roads. But I think it is just as necessary to keep the home fires burning, and I ask the Minister for Defence not to make scavengers of the men who went out to fight for the freedom of the country. It is a very poor return for a man who left his home and family and went out at the call of his country in order that he might bring peace and save the nation from utter ruin to be put in the position that the song he would sing now would be "Scavengers are we."

General MULCAHY: As a matter of explanation, what does the Deputy mean by "making scavengers"?

Mr. LYONS: A scavenger is a man who works on the roads with a brush and shovel. I think that the Minister for Defence or the Government should have something better to offer the man who went out to fight for the country. I know it is very hard to cope with the large number of men who are being demobilised, but I think at the same time that something a little better than scavenging work should be given them. If it is necessary to turn them on to road work, give them enough wages to keep body and soul together.

I appreciate very much the speech of Deputy O'Mahony, and I was delighted with the beautiful picture he painted for us. I sincerely hope his suggestions will be put into practice. In speaking on the matter twelve months ago, I said I hoped something like that would be done, but up to the present my hopes were not realised. The workers of Ireland have too long been treated to the invitation "live horse and you will get grass." What I am afraid of is that the horse may die in the meantime, and the same fate may befall the worker. We are told "Live; there are good times coming." I sincerely hope Deputy O'Mahony's suggestion will be put into operation and that the Government will do something to relieve unemployment by breaking a link in the unemployment chain and giving them an opportunity to live in the country for which they have made so many sacrifices.

Mr. CORISH: I desire to support this resolution in its entirety. At the outset I wish to say that as far as the word "scavenger" is concerned, it was introduced into this motion by Deputy Lyons. The men for whom I speak are so anxious for work that they are prepared to do any sort of work, and I do not think it degrades a man to sweep the streets if he is paid for it.

Mr. LYONS: I did not intend, when using the word, to make little in any way of the National soldiers. I do hold if they are employed on the road they should get the same wages and not be given very much less than has been paid up to this.

Mr. CORISH: I also would like to resent at this stage some of the statements made by Deputy Good. Deputy Good has stated that the dole was an iniquitous system, and he talks as if the dole were in operation at this period. He stated that the administration of the dole by the Free State has been abused, or he used words to that effect. Now it must, and I am sure it will, be information to Deputy Good to be told that there is no such system at all as the dole in operation in the Free State, but that in England and in the North of Ireland the dole is still in operation. Deputy Good draws a comparison between the wages paid in England and in the Free State. In doing so he suggests that if the wages that prevailed in England were in operation in the Free State, we would have no unemployment here. Anybody who has read the history that is being made in England for the past two or three weeks will know that that statement is an absolute fallacy. The great Tory Government found it necessary during the past six or seven weeks to go to the country and have a general election on this very question of unemployment. I think that proves conclusively that although wages are lower in England than in the Free State that low wages is not a remedy for unemployment.

Mr. GOOD: On a point of information, might I point out that what I said was that it would be a remedy, or would give employment to a great many unemployed at present. I did not say that it would do away with unemployment.

Mr. CORISH: I do not think that makes the situation anything better. I think the inference I drew from Deputy Good's speech is the inference anybody might draw from listening to his argument. So far as the county councils are concerned, the inference that Deputy O'Mahony endeavoured to get the Dáil to draw from Deputy Morrissey's and Deputy Murphy's remarks was that we on these benches resent the employment of ex-National soldiers on the road. That is an entirely wrong idea to convey to the Dáil. On the contrary, we did not object to ex-National soldiers being employed on the road. We, as well as every other section of the people, recognise that a great deal of gratitude is due to the National soldiers, and the country ought to be thankful to them for bringing us into the state of comparative tranquillity that we enjoy to-day.

What we do object to is that the men who have served their country well for the past 12 or 18 months are now being sent back to civil life to blackleg upon their fellow-workmen, because that is the meaning of the circular referred to. Deputy Gorey has spoken about the agricultural wage. Other Deputies and Deputy Gorey have spoken about a 28/- a week wage. In the circular that has been sent to the Wexford County Council by the Minister for Local Government, we were asked to decrease the wages below the standard of agricultural wages. The standard agricultural wage in Wexford is 28/-, but it was suggested that we should pay men a figure very much less than that. The suggestion was that we should pay men on road work 4/6 per day and that all these men employed should be ex-National soldiers, and we resent that. And I appeal confidently to the men themselves who were asked to take up work at that wage to resent it, too. It is not a fair position to place these men in, and one is forced to think that when the Ministry of Defence or whatever Department was responsible for it, suggested or made an order that the unemployment cards of the National soldiers should not be stamped during the period they were serving in the Army, they had this in mind.

That was done with the idea that you could force those men into the certain position that they cannot draw unemployment benefit at the end of their period in the National Army. Now, so far as the dole is concerned, I want to make it absolutely clear and plain that the workers of Ireland, or the huge majority of them, so far as I know them, want honest work; and they are prepared to give a good return for any money the Government are prepared to put into any scheme. Certainly, to some extent, and so far as a few instances go, there were men who did not work very much who were demoralised by the dole, but men who were working,

[Mr. Corish.] at the time the slump came, in this country, want work again, and do not want this unemployment benefit if there is anything else forthcoming to provide them and their families in decent comfort. I had a letter from New Ross a few days ago stating that 400 unemployed men held a meeting, and passed a resolution, and sent it on to the Ministry of Industry and Commerce, stating that they did not want unemployment benefit, that they wanted work, and that the time had arrived when everybody should do his best to put the country on its feet, and so long as unemployment continued, the country was not going to be placed in the position in which it should be in.

Let me give an example of how wages affect certain districts. Again referring to the statement of Deputy Good, I would like to point out this particular instance. In Wexford plans were submitted by the Local Government Ministry for the building of certain houses, and a contractor undertook to build them at £630 each. The wages in Wexford for bricklayers, carpenters and plasterers are 1/6 per hour. Similar houses were built in Dublin by a contractor for £475 each, although the wages in Dublin and its vicinity are 4d. or 4½d. per hour more. You cannot blame the workers, in this occasion. That is one instance, and one example, and there may be more, which show that the workers are not always to blame and that the contractors are getting a great deal more out of the work than they profess to in matters of this kind. Deputy O'Mahony talked about building houses, and I do hope the Ministry, before very long, will seriously tackle the housing problem, but as there are necessary details in connection with matters such as house building that take a considerable time to get ready, I do not think the present moment is the proper one to consider housing schemes as providing an immediate remedy. So far as skilled workers are concerned, I know they are prepared to do unskilled work if it is offered to them in present circumstances. I appeal to the Government to look at this from the proper angle and to try and secure the confidence of the average man in the country. People in the country certainly realise that the Government has gone through a very bad time. They know the state of affairs that prevailed for the past 12 months contributed to the state of affairs now existing, but they are looking with confidence to their Government to do something to help them in this crisis, and I do hope our appeal on this occasion will not be in vain.

Mr. ALFRED BYRNE: I join in the demand put forward by the Labour Party that something should be done, and done quickly, for the relief of unemployment in the Saorstát. In the city of Dublin to-day I can give the Minister for Local Government a few instances, if he wishes, where there is actual starvation within a stone's throw of Nelson's Pillar. It is very hard, almost impossible, indeed, to get people to believe that that is so, but it is so, and quite recently we had a coroner's inquest where the verdict was that the deceased person who was the subject of the inquest had died of starvation. There is starvation in the city of Dublin to-day, and I ask if the Government is going to do anything for the relief of the unemployed that it should be done very quickly. In Dublin we have not got the number of road workers referred to so frequently in the debate. I am aware that the road workers are a very deserving class of persons, but we have in the city of Dublin men engaged in the workshops, men engaged at the lathes who are walking round the streets of Dublin, who do not want the dole and do not want charity, but who do want decent work. I make a suggestion to the Minister for Finance and to the Minister for Local Government as to how they could immediately remedy these things. We have in Dublin at least 25,000 people living in single room rookeries. These rookeries should be swept away. They are rat-infested rookeries and we have people living in abject poverty in houses without any proper sanitary accommodation. I made a suggestion some time ago, and I was satisfied at the time that there were many persons prepared to adopt the suggestion made, and that was that private builders—men with small capital—should get a Government grant, no matter how small, towards building houses. If that were done it would remedy the housing shortage and it would also provide decent employment for many men now hanging round the Labour Exchanges looking for anything that comes their way.

I am a member of the Dublin Port and Docks Board, and about two years ago a very elaborate scheme of reclamation of valuable land fell through because that Board could not raise sufficient money to continue the reclamation of the land. The grant in that case was first given by the Lord St. David's Committee. The continuance of the grant would have provided employment and produced very valuable rateable property for the citizens of Dublin. I also think it is time that we had the Fiscal Commission's report. If this report could remedy some of the injustices to Irish industries, if it could stop the wholesale dumping of manufactured articles which could be made at a very reasonable rate in the city of Dublin, I think the Fiscal Commission would be doing very good work indeed. We have in Ringsend three or four bottle factories closed down entirely, and we have every Thursday at the Port Board a return showing—and it is rather unfortunate that it should be so—on an average from twenty to thirty tons of bottles dumped in Dublin almost every week. The boat carrying these manufactured goods, manufactured on starvation rates of pay, is allowed into this country without paying a penny tax, and the ship that carries these goods passes by, before it gets to its landing stage, the bottle factories that used to supply Ireland with bottles. I think something should be done in that direction.

I join with Deputy Lyons who spoke about the discharged soldier, the man discharged from the army and sent home to his wife and family and not allowed to draw one penny of unemployment benefit, the man of whom Deputies in this Dáil were so loud in their praises. It is because of the services rendered by these men that we are enabled to sit here, and it is also because of the protection they rendered that our own houses are still standing. Now we have these men thrown out of the Army and not allowed to get the same privilege as is enjoyed by the men who did not do anything to protect the interests of the State. We grant, of course, that the unemployed did do their share, but as regards taking responsibility and putting their lives in danger, they did not do as much as these men who are now leaving the National Army, and I think something ought to be done for the latter. I think it is unfair and a shame for the Parliament of the country to allow the discharged soldier, who has served perhaps for twelve months or two years in the Army, to be sent home, and that simply because his card was not stamped during the period of service—because a condition in the allocation of unemployed money as regards having twelve stamps on his card previous to joining the Army was not complied with—he should not be entitled to get anything.

I did ask before that some amending measure should be introduced in order to give these men at least the same privileges as are enjoyed by those who did not join the Army. In conclusion, I desire to say that I support very cordially the Motion which has been very ably and very reasonably put forward for consideration from the Labour benches.

Captain REDMOND: There seems to be general agreement in all quarters of the Dáil on several points in regard to this question of unemployment. In the first place, unemployment is there. That is an unmitigable and an unwelcome fact, and it is also to be regretted that it is not very much on the decrease. I am glad, however, to say that it is not very much on the increase either. The problem also exists in other countries as well as our own. All through the world, since the great world war, one of its consequences has been this awful spectre of unemployment. That is an admitted fact. In the second place, the dole has been condemned in all sections and from all quarters of the Dáil. The dole, undoubtedly, had a demoralising influence on the workers of the country. The workers of the country to-day say that they do not want the dole, the employers say that they do not want the dole, and as far as we are concerned in the Free State, the dole is practically non-existent. The third point of agreement to my mind is that something should be done, and must be done as soon as possible by the Government. Arising out of the third point, as regards agreement, comes the question as to how that something is to be done. I admit most readily that the problem is an exceedingly difficult one. It is a difficult one for any Government.

The late British Government went to the country because they considered that unemployment was rampant there, and that the way to remedy it according to their minds was by a system of protection. They may have thought that was the remedy, but the British electorate evidently thought otherwise. As far as we are concerned here, it has not been seriously suggested that protection shall be our remedy. It is true it has been mentioned previously by Deputy Johnson, but that, at any rate, I do not think is even his immediate proposal. But how is the Government, faced with this difficult proposition, to meet it? It has to, and it must, provide means and methods of doing away with unemployment, financial means in the first place, and channels through which and by which these means may be utilised. Our Government is not overwhelmed with riches, and, therefore, I can thoroughly realise the difficulties that the various Ministers will be in with the Minister for Finance when they approach him on the subject of endeavouring to get means for their Departments to stay unemployment. There are, however, certain channels well known to everyone which, at any rate, suggest a possibility of removing this difficulty.

There is housing and improvement of the conditions of the people, not only in the metropolis, where, as Deputy Byrne stated, things are bad, but, as I can assure the Dáil, in the country and in the provincial towns, where they are equally bad. It is not so much, to my mind, a question of finding employment for skilled, as for the unskilled workers. Possibly it is true that there is a certain amount of unemployment amongst the skilled artisans of the country; but everyone knows that the great bulk of labour in this country is unskilled, and that it is necessarily among the unskilled that the greatest unemployment exists. To my mind, therefore, a system which would give the greatest proportion of employment to unskilled labour and which, at the same time, would be for the benefit of the nation at large, is what the Government should immediately, at any rate, address themselves to. It has been suggested that there should be a great system of national trunk roads instituted. All this requires money, and it is as to how the money is to be provided that I am most anxious to hear what the Government have to say. Housing must be seen to; the roads are there to be repaired; bridges have to be rebuilt, and there is also the necessity for repairing, and even for the construction of harbours round our coasts. There are plenty of means of giving employment, but the difficulty that I see is to find the money for employing these means. When that aid is brought forward, as I am sure it must be shortly, by the Government, I hope it will not be suggested, as Deputy Corish led us to understand, that the Government intend to bring about a reduction of wages throughout the country, by paying the men employed on these works of reconstruction, whether they be ex-National soldiers or otherwise, a less wage than the existing local wage for unskilled workers. Certainly, I think that would be unfair, both to the workers you are about to employ and to those who are already in employment in similar forms of work in the district. It has been stated that unemployment is largely due to the rate of wages. I think Deputy Corish met Deputy Good very fairly on that point, when he showed that in England to-day, though wages in some respects may be lower, yet unemployment is, if anything, more rampant. I am not going into the reason for unemployment, and I am not going to enquire as to whether the present position is due to past actions on the part of employers or trade unions. What we have to go into is the immediate question of unemployment at the moment, and to see what we can do to remedy that state of affairs. I am confident that the Government cannot and do not wish to ignore the state of unemployment in the country, and I feel sure, having heard the speeches from the Labour Benches, that if the Government bring forward a fair scheme of employment, based upon wages that will not in any sense be "blackleg" wages," the Labour organisations throughout the country will meet them more than half way and endeavour, along with the Government and the employers to, at any rate, better, if not abolish, this appalling state of affairs.

General MULCAHY: As a matter of explanation, and before we get too far away from the statement that was made by Deputy Byrne in connection with unemployment benefit for men who served in the National Forces, I wish to point out that service in the National Forces does not deprive a man of any benefit that he would otherwise be entitled to. Men who before they entered the National Forces were employed in insurable trades are kept by contributions during the time they were serving in the National Forces, in benefit, so that they may enjoy, on leaving the Forces, the benefits of the amounts previously paid, as well as of the amounts paid during their service. A man who was not employed in insurable employment is no worse off on leaving the National Forces than he would have been if he never served in them. The Deputy was present, I take it, when the Act was passed which dealt with that particular matter. As far as making service in the National Forces an insurable occupation, considering the short period of time that men enlisted for, and considering the great cost it would be to make service in the National Forces insurable, it was considered inadvisable to do so. The cost of making National Service insurable would be something like £250,000 for the last 12 months.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: I do not intend to detain the Dáil very long, as I am sure Deputies are getting tired of this almost interminable discussion. There are one or two points to which I would like to call attention. In the first place, I would like to say that I have the fullest sympathy with the unemployed. I think it is a shame and a disgrace that any man able and willing to work should find himself in this country in the position of not being able to get work and being obliged to take advantage of the dole. I am aware, strictly speaking, that this is not a dole, that there is an unemployment benefit to which the worker contributes. But the Government also contributes, so that it amounts, to a certain extent, to a dole. It seems to me that if the leaders of labour in this country took their courage in their hands and recognised the economic conditions that exist, we would find a solution of this question much easier. We have sad knowledge of the evil effects of the guidance which has been given in certain cases by leaders of labour, at any rate in the county I represent. In Tipperary, Waterford and Cork creameries belonging to Messrs. Cleeve

7 o'clock. are now in process of liquidation. That is directly due, in my opinion, to the unsound advice and the unsound leadership that the workers got.

Mr. JOHNSON: May I ask Deputy Heffernan if he knows the views of Messrs. Cleeve on that point?

Mr. HEFFERNAN: I do not know the views of Messrs. Cleeve, but I know the views of the farmers who are very closely concerned in the matter. I am giving the views of the farmers. There are in these counties, and in the towns at present, considerable numbers of unemployed, and I maintain that their disemployment was directly caused by the action of their leaders last year, when they caused these workers to take possession of the creameries, and attempt to establish forms of Soviet.

An immense financial loss was caused to the owners of the creamery but a still greater financial loss was caused to the farmers. A great loss was also caused to the workers, directly and indirectly, because we find that on account of this action there are hundreds of men unemployed in the towns of those counties. In Tipperary town there are a great number of unemployed. I think those men should place the blame for that unemployment on the shoulders of those properly responsible for it—the men who acted as their leaders at that time.

A recognition of economic conditions would greatly help to solve this problem. It must be recognised—it has been stated and emphasised by the Minister for Agriculture and others—that the basic industry, agriculture, is now in a very bad condition and that, as a matter of fact, it is not a paying proposition. I maintain that on the condition of agriculture depends the condition of employment in the country. If the agricultural workers are paid a certain wage, it is not reasonable or fair that other workers living in a rural district should be paid a higher wage. It seems to me that it is not reasonable or fair that men who are working on the roads and living side by side with agricultural workers should be placed in a position of exceptional advantage. My idea is that economic conditions should be so brought about, that the position of the agricultural worker would be improved and that he would be paid a somewhat higher wage. Before that can be done, to me it seems almost certain that the wages which are enjoyed by the other workers must come down to some extent. I do not think anybody on those benches or on the other benches in the chamber desires to crush down the worker to a wage below a living standard. It is my desire—and the desire I am sure of the other Deputies who sit on these benches—to see that wages are paid which will maintain a decent standard of life. But, as Deputy Gorey said, we must cut our cloth according to our measure. We cannot take a quart out of a pint pot. We cannot get more money out of agriculture than agriculture produces.

I also agree with Deputy Gorey that it is advisable that work should be provided, even though it be unproductive work. But, if possible, I think that the work to be provided should be productive work, and I think there are excellent openings for the Government in existing conditions in this regard. I understand that a considerable grant is to be made for the relief of unemployment, and I trust that that grant will be devoted to such uses that employment of a productive character will be produced. I refer to such matters as drainage, afforestation, reclamation and other productive work in connection with agriculture. In particular, I would call the attention of the Government to the necessity for the drainage of certain rivers and consequent reclamation of agricultural land. In my county there are two or three rivers which are always blocked up, with consequent silting. The result is that considerable areas of valuable agricultural land are flooded periodically, and the land is deteriorating from year to year. I suggest that the Government should take serious notice of those facts and, when they bring forward their scheme for unemployment, that they should make arrangements whereby grants should be given to the responsible authorities, so that employment could be provided at the productive works to which I have referred.

I agree, to a large extent, with the first portion of this motion put forward from the Labour Benches. I do not agree with the latter portion of the motion because I think it is advisable that wages paid to the workers on the roads, who would be earning this grant and who would probably be demobilised soldiers of the National Army, should approximate to the wages earned by agricultural workers in the same districts. It would be very inadvisable to add to the jealousies and constant disputes which arise in the country districts. The reason for this circular by the Local Government Department is, I think, easily understood. They have control over those funds in connection with the roads, and they feel, having that control, that they are entitled to specify the wages that should be paid. They do not control the wages of other workers of local Boards, with the result that they cannot dictate what wages should be paid to these constantly-employed workers. It would be advisable, if it were at all possible, that Labour leaders should make a compromise and get into touch with those responsible for paying those wages. Some arrangement might be come to whereby the wages paid to demobilised soldiers would be somewhat increased and that, in order to balance things, the wages paid to the ordinary road workers would be somewhat reduced.

Representing, as I do, the farming community, who constitute the main source from which the money is drawn for the payment of road workers, I think I should state my view that it would be impossible for the industry to bear any longer the immense drain upon it in the form of rates. The cry is common up and down the country that the farming industry is not able to bear the rates. I know perfectly well that that is the case. If we are to have things moving in a harmonious way, it is necessary that some effort should be made by the Government to reduce rates. Evidently their intention in sending out this circular, which has been so much criticised, was to induce economies in local administration and to point out that, in order to bring about those economies, wages would have to be reduced.

The PRESIDENT: I did not notice during this discussion much attention being given to the condemnatory terms of the resolution or to the subject matter with which it deals. After all, if there be unemployment, I think it only fair and reasonable that the ground should be examined in order to see what is responsible for it, what is its cause, what led up to it, and what steps, if any, are going to be taken to try and do away with it. I think that anybody who has observed the course of events in Europe and Ireland for the last ten years will have no hesitation in being able to place his finger on the real cause of unemployment. It is not necessary to go to any length to explain that the whole system of economics was disturbed by the late war, by the revolution here, and by the changes that naturally followed those two events—the raising of prices, the raising of incomes, the lowering of incomes, and alterations in capital. Compared with that which now exists, there was a far sounder system of economy ten years ago. Ordinary business at that time, the expansion of business, industrial concerns, and commerce generally had much more reason to be satisfied at that time than they have now. There is a certain nervousness brought about by rapidly changing circumstances, by the uncertainty of business, by industrial strife, and so on, and, whatever objections there may be to that particular term by the Deputy from Clare, one must not exclude those considerations when considering this problem. Whatever economic basis there was at that time it had a long growth, and the longer the growth the firmer the roots of that growth were implanted in the soil.

It is not for the purpose of standing over or praising that particular economy that I mention it but rather to show that it is not in a day, a week, a month or a year one builds up such conditions of affairs as satisfy the business community, capitalists, financiers, and other people who are almost inseparable from the economic system. I think the changed conditions and the alterations in income and capital led in some measure or another to this particular problem which we have now to try and solve. The reasons which led to those conditions are gone. The late war has gone, let us hope for ever, although there are indications now and again that there is a possibility of its resumption. Our own revolution has gone, and I think it is time for all parties in the State to take stock of the changed conditions and to see how far those changed conditions are responsible for this particular difficulty and this great problem that must be solved, either now or in the future, and see if there are root causes in the changed conditions which are going to make unemployment perpetual with us. We cannot exclude from our consideration in this matter, as I mentioned to the Dáil a month ago and as the Minister for Agriculture mentioned within the last fortnight, what are the prospects and what is the condition of our main industry. Without being in any way disrespectful to the members of the Farmers' Party, I would not be disposed to take their particular interpretation as to how it stands, as, like our friends opposite, they are inclined now and again to exaggerate a little, and one must conclude that this country must become bankrupt if one were to take the farmers' interpretation. One must also conclude that the Government, and those who support it, with all its works and pomps should have been damned long ago if one were to take the labour interpretation.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE at this stage resumed the chair.

The PRESIDENT: It is a matter of serious consideration how that particular industry stands with regard to the other industries. If examined on that basis, we must say that the Farmers' Party are entitled even to exaggerate a little and to say that their industry is charged with costs and liabilities which if it is not able to bear is at least groaning under. Some of the recent statements dealt with unemployment as if it were a passing phase, as if it were something which must be given a tonic and the tonic will do the rest. That is not the manner in which the Government approached this matter now or during the last six or twelve months.

A DEPUTY: Hear, hear.

The PRESIDENT: That is, I think, the manner in which the Deputy who says "Hear, hear" seemed to look upon it a short time ago. Ministering to it either in the form of uncovenanted benefit or relief works is only leaving it there, and, to some extent, perpetuating it. If we are prepared now to see how far we can place this new economy that we are all charged with on a more stabilised and a sounder basis than it has been upon, and—even members on the opposite benches will admit it—than it is at present, if we are to take into consideration the question as to whether a mere temporary and passing relief is to be administered, one of the first considerations is the uncovenanted benefit or, as some people will call it, the dole. If we are to consider the dole we ought to consider it from the very beginning. It was not of the seeking, I think, of the Labour Party or of any of the labour leaders of this country that it was given to this country. It was an easy way of getting out of the difficulty when there were capital monies in the possession and under the control of a very much richer country than this. We cannot afford that particular form of assistance known as the uncovenanted dole. The fund which distributes that particular form of assistance, or insurance, to give it its proper term, is now something like £1,000,000 on the wrong side. We will have to advance something like £1,000,000 to that fund in order to allow it to discharge the payments it has made or which it will be committed to.

Even if we were to use that particular form it would only be shelving the problem, and it has this great disadvantage, it makes for indifference. It does not make for comfort, and is particularly costly, and I would ask members opposite when they criticise us on this question not to lose sight of the fact that this is a poor country relatively when considered in the light of our neighbours. The last time I saw a return of the revenue of Scotland, which has not a population much greater than ours, it was in the neighbourhood of £100,000,000. Our revenue is one quarter of that. We are not as rich as Great Britain. We have not her potentialities, and we are not on the scratch mark with any of those countries on the continent whose coasts flank our own. We have not got any right to consider the methods which have been adopted in other countries in dealing with this subject.

Mr. JOHNSON: Not to consider them?

The PRESIDENT: Yes, not to consider them. In some countries they have adopted what is known as inflation. We have not got a right to consider that. We have made no great sacrifices, and we have got nothing to show why we should disturb a very serious credit situation. In other countries on the continent what we take as a pound standard, is worth only 6/8. We cannot do that. We have in the first place no national debt. The ten millions we have borrowed is a national debt, and in good faith it must be returned in the form in which it was borrowed. We are not entitled to consider that question of inflation as a means of alleviating our situation, even if it has solved the difficulty in other countries.

On an examination of returns that we have had from different parts of the country, we find it very difficult to agree with the case that has been made by various members of the Labour Party. I do not see why there should be an extraordinary difference in the rate of pay in the different counties of Ireland of the road workers. The amount varies from 4/6 to 8/8. I cannot see why there should be for another form of payment the difference between 5/10 and 9/7. The agricultural community in those particular places do not get that difference in the price of their produce, and why the cost of living should vary so much between one county and another is certainly beyond my comprehension. In distributing public funds we are not entitled to pay to one county, 9/7, and to another county, 5/10; nor would there be a justification for giving 8/8 for an article in Leitrim, and 4/6, say, in the County Galway. We cannot make a distinction between the counties, such as that of the different wages paid. I think I would have the majority of the people in the country behind me on that question. Members opposite may dispute it but there are the facts. We get money from the public on an equal basis. We are not entitled, getting it on a level basis all over the country, to distribute it unequally by reason of certain changes in the rates of wages paid in different districts.

Deputies say we have failed to deal with unemployment. What have we done for unemployment? I mentioned the million pounds. Since we came into office, sometime in January, 1922, we have practically provided a million pounds for housing, and I invite the Deputies opposite to concern themselves, even to the point of considering what that million pounds meant. Deputy Corish said a house is built for £630 in Wexford, and the same house costs £475 in Dublin. I wonder would a man who is paid 1/6 per hour for building that house in Wexford pay £630 for it. If you charge the State 1/6 per hour for your work, are you prepared to buy the article at the fair cost at which it was built or made?

Mr. CORISH: On a point of explanation, what I wanted to point out was that the workers are blamed for the high cost of production, and here you have a case in Dublin where tradesmen are paid 1/10½ per hour. The house is built for £475. In Wexford, where the rate is 4½d. an hour less, it costs £630, which shows that contractors are reaping some of the benefit.

The PRESIDENT: Take it at the smaller price. Will they pay £475? If not, we are not on an economic basis. Another Deputy who is a member of two local authorities, said this is the duty of the Government. Then what are the two local authorities doing? One of them will be entitled at the end of the financial year to get £100,000. What are they doing for this unemployment question? They sent us in a political petition a few days ago, and if they spent as much time on considering constructive proposals dealing with important questions, such as unemployment, and then when they had exhausted their energies on that subject, were to take up politics, I think the people they are supposed to represent, would be better satisfied.

Mention has been made of the Fiscal Report, and I am leading up now to a point which I have barely touched on. We are not satisfied, in connection with any report coming from any quarter, dealing with the Fiscal question, to start off at present prices. We want to have those prices examined to see whether or not they are economic, and if they are uneconomic we would not be justified in starting off on that basis. A Deputy said that if we prohibited bottles coming into Dublin by putting on a tariff they could be made here. The Deputy did not state at what price they were being brought in, and at what price they would be made here. It is not fair to get up and say that. Can the people of Ireland afford to pay uneconomic prices for articles manufactured here? If we start on that basis and build on it you will have no money to buy, either here or elsewhere. If it can be shown to us, if the Dáil can be persuaded, that there is unfair competition in the matter of dumping, that there can be a fair return for work done here, we are prepared to do everything in our power to ensure that the men working here will be guaranteed their employment, guaranteed their output and guaranteed from any form of dumping which is unfair, but we are

[The President.] not going to put a tariff on goods coming in if the prices charged locally for the same goods are beyond their value. For something like twelve months we have had representations from people in business from all parts of the country, every one of them having the same story. It is not altogether a question of the high wages. I would not care twopence if the prices were twice as high provided the output were four times up, or only three times up. The question is: Can we get value for value, and I think the Deputies opposite will admit that that is a fair case to put up, that if workers in any part of the country are provided with money for such a thing as housebuilding they should themselves be able to purchase these houses at a reasonable price, that the improvement should start from the bottom, and that it ought not to be a question of building houses for rich people only.

Even with the unsatisfactory state of affairs existing here people are coming along to start businesses. We have evidence that, for the last six or eight or nine months firms have started and manufacturers are coming and spending a good deal of money in putting up factories. But they are banking upon the sound commonsense of the people that if the conditions at present prevailing are unsatisfactory the people will realise it and that it is only a passing phase, to be improved as soon as the people have had sufficient time to consider the importance of these questions.

Recently in a certain Government Department—I cannot vouch for the story, but I mention it now so that if there be any truth in it the people concerned will learn something—some people recently demobilised from the Army were employed, and I am told that it is common talk amongst them that they are not going to give a return for the money they are being paid. That is not the spirit we would expect, that men coming from a fine, honourable service like the Army, should take up, and if we find they are not giving a return they will be shunted, even though they are threatening great things if they are shunted. We are not going to take these threats or be afraid of the consequences. If they do not give a return for the money, no matter who they are and no matter what services they give, they will go, and I think that is the view even of Deputies opposite.

Mr. JOHNSON: Even! I suggest to the President that it is especially the view of Deputies here.

The PRESIDENT: As regards the Government's failure to deal with this question of unemployment, I think I have at some length dealt with what the Government's view on it is, that is, getting on a basis where value will be offered for Government money, or for the people's money, for any article received or any service rendered. If we are agreed on that—I suppose that it would be with some reluctance that I would be given a Tá vote from the other side just now—then the other points could be very easily supplied. The Government's policy is to apply as much money as can be made available to constructive works rather than to Uncovenanted Benefit. The principal scheme of works is a road scheme. That absorbs unskilled labour almost entirely, and we are prepared to make available for that road scheme a very considerable sum of money. With that scheme and the reconstruction of bridges and such work, I anticipate that we will be able to have available, along with one other little activity that I will mention later, a sum of approximately £2,000,000, or close on that. The Postmaster-General told me some time ago that he expected an influx of something like 100,000 American visitors next year. If that be the case, I think that the roads ought to be in a reasonably good state of repair by the time they come, and that the impression they will get from this country will be such that, in spite of what the Press may have said about us during the last twelve or eighteen months, we can remedy defects in a comparatively short space of time.

Mr. A. BYRNE: Will you re-build the Post Office?

The PRESIDENT: There are other points to be considered in connection with the re-building of the Post Office, and I think that although the present arrangements are, perhaps, not delightful, there are more important matters which might be considered. The Deputy mentioned one, and it is an important thing to bear in mind, that there are a large number of people in the city of Dublin without proper habitations. If we concentrate upon swell Government buildings during the next two or three years, a smaller sum will be available for building houses for the people who are so admirably represented by Deputy Alfred Byrne.

Mr. A. BYRNE: You got in on me there.

The PRESIDENT: I always like interruptions. Now, we come to the second point. A very considerable amount of time has been spent on the consideration of this subject. I have had many unofficial conferences with employers, whom we selected, and with responsible Labour leaders. We put it up to the employers on, I think, the last day what our views on this particular subject were.

We pointed out to them we could not afford much money, but that we were prepared to go a fair distance and guarantee that, if we were met. They agreed to meet us, with some little hesitation. At the last meeting we held one of the Deputies appeared to be troubled with a rather scrupulous conscience, and mentioned that there was a fly in the ointment. I think we made his mind easy on that, so that it would not be a stumbling block, and I think we parted, they, on their side, undertaking to do whatever was in their power to find accommodation on this proposal we are going to make. Considerable advances must be made by the other side.

The Government is prepared to put up a sum of £250,000 in the nature of subsidies for the building of houses, and a sum of something like £50,000 for the reconstruction of houses under certain conditions. These houses are to be built for a certain price. The local authority, or any person bringing down the sum of money we have stated, must be entitled to get a house. In other words, we wanted to make sure that when asking for accommodation from the various trades or trades unions they, in turn, would derive the maximum share of the benefit from this particular accommodation that we are asking for. There are three forms of houses—three-roomed, four-roomed and five-roomed. The Government grant for a three-roomed house is £60; a four-roomed house, £80; and a five-roomed house, £100.

Mr. JOHNSON: Are these confined to cities?

The PRESIDENT: Yes; and in rural districts £50 for a three-roomed house; £70 for a four-roomed; and £90 for a five-roomed house. We have a Bill ready to introduce immediately that we get accommodation on this; and every possible facility will be afforded, as far as the Government is concerned, even in the payment of the money. We have been told that a housing scheme would not, of itself, provide much employment. We calculate that the roads scheme I have mentioned should absorb anywhere from 12,000 to 20,000 men. We calculate that the housing scheme should employ somewhere in the neighbourhood of 10,000 men—possibly not 10,000—but with another scheme to which the British Government is committed, there should be something like 10,000 employed. I mention the housing scheme first, because most of the unemployment is confined to unskilled workers. There may not be opportunities just now, or for a month or two, for building. It is the bad season, but it is a time when sites may be developed and other work done which would give employment to the persons most concerned. We want a considerable reduction in the cost of houses. I want to give Deputy Johnson as little chance of attacking me as possible when I said, in the cost of houses, if you put in twice as much work as you put in up to this, I do not care what wages you get from Deputy Good. I do not think he would object to paying present prices provided he gets more work done, but we want the houses at these prices, and I hope that the Builders' Committee which met us will be received in a good spirit in trying to find accommodation on this question. They say:

“That the Government be in-

formed that their proposals have been carefully considered, and the Committee are of opinion that houses can be built with the grant of the subsidy and the assistance of the local authorities as set out in the proposals, provided that labour is willing to reduce materially its rates of wages (which are at present the highest in Great Britain and the Irish Free State) and that the cost of building materials, which are governed to some extent by the cost of labour, can be reduced to reasonable figures. The Committee are prepared to open negotiations immediately with the representatives of labour and the providers of building materials, if the Government will call upon these parties to meet together in the National interest to see what can be done to meet the demand for houses. After these interviews have taken place and the views of both parties are ascertained, the Committee are prepared to put forward proposals."

I am not positively certain about the price of a house. I think about £500 for a five-roomed house, £400 for a four-roomed house, and £300 for a three-roomed house.

Mr. CORISH: On what prices were they based? Were they based on a reduction of wages?

The PRESIDENT: Those prices are to some extent based on what we would call the "middle-cut," or, perhaps, not quite the "middle-cut." We took into consideration first what would be a fair price for a house, and then we considered the present prices for houses. We did not go quite, but nearly, half way in this particular price. I hope Deputies will give me sufficient credit for these figures to say we are not getting down in these figures to an economic basis, but we hope eventually to get down to it. Mention has been made of a drainage scheme, but we are not satisfied that drainage schemes are feasible at present. They are big works that take perhaps even more consideration than the question of unemployment, before one is ready to deal with them. Engineering experts have to be employed, and other matters attended to, but there have been certain minor drainage works in various parts of the country which have been almost inoperative for some time, and we propose to consider the question of utilising the Board of Works and having those drainage schemes attended to in the next few months. That was one of the services I had in mind when I mentioned the sum of £1,750,000 or £2,000,000. Representations have been received as to the carrying out of work in the county boroughs, the clearing of sites in O'Connell Street, and reconstruction in Cork. If the Dublin Corporation would put their politics in their pockets for a time and consider that, we might get on with a little business. Large sums will be paid in the current year for compensation, some of which will be for building and reconstruction, and I ask the sympathy of the Dáil and of the people of the country in this matter. Unless the price of building is brought down, the country will be salted in the amounts that will be decreed in the various Courts, and the more the country is salted the less chance there is of providing the common people with decent habitations. Our means are strictly limited. That point need not be stressed, and I think Deputy Johnson is aware of it. What we want in this accommodation we are getting is to see how far it is possible to spread out the money we have got so that the maximum benefit will be derived by the people.

Captain REDMOND: May I remind the President that I think he was going to refer to the £1,500,000 grant from Great Britain for houses for ex-service men?

Mr. CORISH: Would I be in order in asking the President if the Government is prepared to approach the banks to help the local authorities to get the remainder of the money on somewhat favourable terms, such as in connection with other housing grants?

The PRESIDENT: We had not in mind using the local authorities in this housing scheme, except to this extent; if they were willing to give sites to provide builders with an opportunity of erecting houses; they could be utilised to that extent. In the Bill we propose to insert a clause dealing with rates, spreading over a number of years the payment of rates, charging, say 5 per cent. the first year, 10 per cent. the second, and so on until the 20th year, when one would pay the full 100 per cent. That would come out in the Bill, but there is no use introducing a Bill unless there is agreement as regards the cost. With regard to what Deputy Redmond said about the Soldiers and Sailors Trust, we have been in communication with the British Government on that particular subject. Personally, I think what has held up that scheme is the relatively higher price which these buildings cost in the Saorstát as compared with the Six Counties. That is only an opinion, but I am not far wrong in expressing some opinions on these questions of finance.

Captain REDMOND: Is the President in a position to say whether the Trust has been fully completed yet?

The PRESIDENT: We have appointed our trustee. We appointed him many months ago. I have seen a despatch about the matter recently, but I cannot remember the exact terms of it. It was a draft of the Treasury Regulations and we made some suggestions with regard to them. I do not think there will be much delay in this matter. I would almost guarantee that there would be no delay if we can get this agreement. I firmly believe that is the only thing holding it up. We will get our proportion of the one and a half millions.

I was dealing with local authorities and what they can do in this matter. I am not at all satisfied that local authorities are the best method of dealing with houses. Utilise the local authorities and what happens? Every pane of glass that is broken costs twice as much to replace as it would cost the ordinary man if he did the work. Now, as regards the collection of rents, the local authorities must pay a fairly high wage to a man to do that work. Those are charges that the houses cannot bear, and they fall either upon the tenant of the house, or upon the local authority. These are times when I think every possible effort must be made to bring down rates of local authorities.

It is not for nothing that the Minister for Local Government asks for a Special Bill, and tells us that the County Councils were in debt over overdrafts for something like £800,000. One can quite understand that until this is wiped off, and until those Councils have established their credit again, the various banks cannot be blamed for saying: "We prefer to lend money to people who can afford to pay us, or who can make some effort to pay us." I mentioned that local authorities could give sites, and develop ground. Then there is the question of the rates, but I suppose I would be out of order in developing that matter as it would be one of the terms of the Bill that we would introduce if we got this agreement. The Government is not concerned in making an offensive on wages. I hope that point will be appreciated by the Labour Party.

Mr. JOHNSON: It is very much like confirming it.

The PRESIDENT: I am very sorry that impression has been created. What we are concerned with is seeing that value is given for what is received. During the Election, I stated that every honest day's work done by any man in this country added to the value of the country and enriched it. If 100,000 men do twice the value of the work they have done formerly, the whole country is going to benefit. That is the only point I know which is in dispute between us, although we may have approached it from different angles.

The unemployment position is very serious. I mentioned already the one million for housing. We gave something like £100,000 for roads earlier in the year. We managed to get back from the British Government all the old grants that had been withheld. We also managed to get from the British Government the cost of the damage that had been done by the British Forces, leaving us to bear only our proportion. A very considerable amount of that money has already been put in circulation. To some extent, people who have got it have not used it, or have not started to use it for the purpose for which they received it. There is no use in denying the fact that high prices have kept them from doing so. Even now there is a considerable development in the work of reconstruction in Cork.

We realise that this unemployment problem is a very serious one, and one, too, that makes the general condition of affairs in the country serious. But the Government is prepared to go far towards providing constructive remedies. I would certainly ask the Labour Party to judge these proposals, not in the light of wages resulting from collective bargaining in private industry, but in the light that it is their duty to assist us in securing work and maintenance for as many of the population suffering from the distress of unemployment as the most generous possible extension of the State's resources will permit. I do not want the Dáil to be under any misapprehension about the two millions grant. That is the sum that we are going to make available. The sum that the Government will put up out of that will depend largely upon how the fund is funded in the meantime. That is, the Road Board Fund. We are prepared to start putting it into operation now, and even to put in some money from the State. That, of course, requires a Supplementary Estimate. But there is no necessity to mention that until we bring up the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. JOHNSON: Last night I said that we had not extracted from the President much information regarding the Government policy on railways. We are better off to-night, inasmuch as this motion has at least extracted from the President a statement of the Government's present views upon the schemes for the relief of unemployment. I think they are not satisfactory, notwithstanding the promise of considerable sums of money. I had hoped, from the earlier statement made by the President, that he was getting down to the real roots of this problem, that he was going to show us that he had tackled the problem in its ultimate. I was particularly hopeful when he uttered these words: "That the workers should be able to buy houses" (or one might say other goods as well) "out of the wages they obtain." I hope the President will develop that and follow it through. That is good doctrine. It is the whole of our philosophy, that those who produce should be able to repurchase the whole produce of their labour in one form or another, and that there should not be abstracted from their produce certain portions of that produce which go to other people who do nothing in assisting in its production. I hope that the axiom that the President laid down as a desirable one will be adopted by him, and by the Ministry as a whole, as a guide for their future thinking and action on economic subjects.

It appears that the Government has made up its mind that a preliminary to inducing better production is to cut wages. The Scheme that has been put forward says, "Cut wages, certainly; if you can increase the output do so." The Minister for Local Government writing to the County Council says "Cut wages, certainly, and if you can improve your organisation of the road work, do so." I suggested here and in Committees when discussing such matters with the Government, that I am quite prepared to stand for greater production. I am quite prepared to assist in advocating keener attention to business, whether from the employers or the farmers or the workers. I believe it is necessary. I do not believe that it is possible to get out of this country the best value necessary for the up-keep of the people of this country unless a greater effort is made in the conduct of productive undertakings. But I am certainly not going to assist in any campaign preliminary to that effort which will imply a general cutting of wages. Deputy Good has referred to an invitation that he threw out to me a week or two ago, when he said he would be glad to talk over and discuss the problem between employers and workers in the building trades on the basis of a reduction in wages, assuming from the beginning that that was a sine qua non and the only condition to be considered for better and cheaper production. I have stated here publicly that if the employers in the building trade and if the employers of the country generally are prepared to meet and discuss these problems on the basis of work done, and management and organisation as well as labour, that we should find accommodation.

That invitation has been responded to from no quarter. The purpose, as defined here in this debate is we must buy labour cheaply and leave the chance of the market for the disposal of the produce. Now that is not the way to approach this problem if we are going to get anywhere near a solution, either temporary or permanent. We agree most emphatically that this is not a temporary problem, a temporary evil, a passing phase, which is not applicable to Ireland alone, and while I am not going to suggest that it is possible within this winter for Ireland to solve the problem permanently that other people have failed to do, I believe we can get on to the right road if we are willing to look at the problem of production and distribution from the basis of work done and service rendered.

The President emphasises time after time, the necessity for doing these things on a proper economic basis. Houses must be built on economic terms—I do not know at present what that means. Does it presuppose the continuation of present prices, for instance, present rates of profit, present rates of wages? You are going to build houses now at a price, and when we talk about economic basis we have got to assume something stable, and it is all very well to say we must build a house which is economic, meaning thereby that the income it is possible to draw for the rent of that house will pay for the capital expenditure. We then come back to the question what is going to be the basis of wages for the people who will occupy these houses? We fine down and get away from the undergrowths and we find the proposition in the mouths of the Farmers' Party. We find it must be the basis of the rate of wages which agriculture can pay to its labourer.

Mr. HEFFERNAN: I only said that in regard to rural districts, not in regard to towns.

Mr. JOHNSON: I quite understand that, but there are reactions if we fix the price for the basic occupation, and if we fix the rate of wages paid to road workers, on the foundation laid for agricultural labourers and that of the town workers on the foundation laid for road workers we very soon find that the ultimate on which this accretion falls is the rate paid by the agriculturist. But what is the case made by the agriculturists? What do they base their wages upon? Will they contend that they can afford to pay 25/- for labour to-day? Will they contend that they can afford to pay 28/-? Is it not that they are paying their present wages because they can get men to work for these wages, that men for fear of unemployment and for fear of hunger are compelled to work for these wages—

Mr. HEFFERNAN: Agriculture is paying more than the industry will yield. The agriculturist is drawing on his capital to pay 25/-.

Mr. JOHNSON: Exactly. It is not what the industry will bear, that is fixing the wages for agriculture. Industrialists for the moment, when they want to make the point and force reductions, say we can only pay what the industry will bear. Agriculturists say they cannot bear it—and when they are paying, £1, 25/-, 28/- and 30/- they are paying labour the price for which they can get it, and they are paying only the price that will induce men to work for. All right! I want to remind the Dáil of the very important fact that the Dáil will have to bear this in mind in its considerations of this and cognate problems.

We have deliberately for public policy decided that the agricultural land of the country shall be owned by the farming occupiers of the country, with the result that one-third of the population is dependent either upon employing other people or being employed by other people—landless men. This one-third of the population is to compete for the sale of its labour. They cannot fall back again on what they produced from the land. There is no ultimate reserve in the land for them; therefore, they are obliged to combine to get the best price they can out of their labour or, and this is the alternative I put to the Dáil, they must look for some social security for their

[Mr. Johnson.] livelihood. They must look for security, and that security can only be found in common agreement by the community that they will be sustained in their livelihood. That is probably agreed to. Well, then, the question arises what is the standard at which you are going to maintain them, what is the minimum upon which you are going to base their livelihood? The farmers say they cannot afford to employ out of the industry; that they are living upon capital. That is a temporary phase we are told. I suggest that it would be well to look forward to the probability that the prices for agricultural produce in the chief markets are not likely to rise. Well, then, for the agricultural labourers, who are unemployed, I put it to the Government for their very careful consideration whether the logic of the situation does not compel them to provide at least access to sufficient land for the agriculturalist to enable him to live upon his produce as the ultimate basis of security.

The road workers' case then is going to be dealt with on the assumption that the agricultural labourers wage is to be the determinant as to the rate of pay to be given to the road workers. The circular that was sent out by the Ministry of Local Government strikes me, and I speak quite deliberately, as about the worst emanation from a Government Department dealing with economic affairs that ever I have seen or heard of. It begins by quoting the statement of the Minister for Defence, and saying that the proposed schemes that he had mentioned would not be conducted in the manner that would raise or keep prices of wages above the nominal level at which they should fairly stand at the present time. Who is to judge what that level should be, deponent saith not. Then we have this Department, on that as a text, telling the County Councils that there was no chance of their getting any assistance for remaking or for the reconstruction of the roads on the scheme which is to employ demobilised men, and others not normally working at the roads, and that they must, and this is made a condition, cut the wages of the ordinary road workers. They have the audacity to say that the inferior condition into which the main roads of the country have fallen is admittedly due to the totally inadequate return obtained in recent years from the money expended on their upkeep. It may be that road men have been paid wages and have done no work. That may be alleged, but we have heard in this Dáil that the roads have been destroyed by abnormal conditions, and we know that men have been prevented by the action of the party and of the people for whom the Government now speak, from repairing these roads; that men have been held up for months and months and that work on the roads has been stopped for two or three years past.

Then the Local Government Department has the audacity to write to the County Councils and tell them that the state of the roads is admittedly due to the inadequate return for the money expended. They are informed that the existing rates of wages must be reduced and the present privileged character of road labour reviewed. There is no discrimination. That circular is sent to every County Council, every Urban Council and every County Borough. The County which pays 28/- receives it just as well as the County that pays 45/-. The desire to "level," which the President expressed, is voided. All they require is to reduce. "No matter what you are getting now, reduce it," thus maintaining the difference between the higher and the lower rates. It is contended that the wages for the ordinary road workers must be cut, so that the work of reconstruction of roads may be done at a lower cost and so that demobilised men, for whom Deputy O'Mahony so eloquently spoke, should be employed at "cut" wages. Deputy O'Mahony asks for fair consideration. He suggests that honour should be given to demobilised soldiers. I suggest that it is no honour to ask them to cut into the rates of wages paid to their brethren who did not go into the army but who assisted them in many other ways. I say that it is a scandalous suggestion, unworthy of a Government that pretends to be friendly to the workers and to honour the soldiers that are being demobilised.

The proposition that wages in the building trades must be reduced is made seriously and in the hope that a response will be given. If it is simply cutting wages, then there will be no response from me at any rate. I believe—and I repeat what I said previously on this matter—that it should be a small thing for any body of men, capable of organising their own business, to take even ten thousand of the thirty thousand odd men throughout the country who are engaged in the various operations of construction, unify them in a body, associated with directors of that industry, and propound a scheme that will ensure employment. There is no use going to workmen in the building trade and saying “Cut wages” unless you can at the same time say “Here is permanence of employment for a period of say five years.” You need not take the weekly wages in the building trade. If you want to understand something of the effect of wages increases or wages reductions upon the lives of the workers in those trades, you have got to look at their annual income, taking into account broken time and all the rest. I say it should be possible if there was good-will—I certainly believe it is possible from the workmen’s side—to enter into an understanding on the basis of continuous employment. Then you could appeal with some hope and heart to the men to increase their output, to give a better return and to cease the slackness that inevitably comes to men when they are expecting to be paid off a job. Approach the men in the building trade with a promise of permanence of employment, not under one employer necessarily but by a proper association of all the factors entering into the production of houses and I have not the slightest doubt that you will get the response you wish for and that the workers’ houses will be built more quickly, more cheaply, and perhaps, with suggestions for better design. The men would enter into the spirit of the operation, but it depends upon this assurance of employment. It is astonishing to me that the employers of this country have not attempted to consider this problem from any point of view except that of the cutting of wages.

They complain of slackness, of lack of interest, and of failure to respond to the needs of the community, and they make no effort to reorganise their own industry, to improve their own methods, or to approach the problem from the point of view of the workman’s life, which is bound up with his industry. I say until you do that you are not going to get any satisfaction out of the proposals that have been put forward.

The President has suggested certain cuts in wages. I wish he would be a little more precise and tell us whether he means these cuts should be on the Dublin rates, the Cork rates, the Limerick rates, or the Wexford rates. Is it again to be the proposition that there should be a percentage rate, no matter what wages are being paid to-day? These are some of the questions that immediately arise when you are dealing with a national problem, and not with a local problem. The President has made suggestions that, conditional upon a certain hoped-for agreement which entails the cutting of wages, moneys will be forthcoming to assist in the building of houses. So far as that goes one must be thankful, but it does not go very far. These suggestions have been hinted at before, but we have had no definite proposals put forward, and we are still expected, I presume, to meet employers without any further suggestion than that of cutting wages. I do not know whether it would be complained that the hands of the Government have been forced and that they did not desire to state their policy on this matter until it had been ripened somewhat, but I would like, before it had been made, that they had been a little nearer some understanding, because it seems to me that both the circular of the Minister for Local Government and the statement of the President rather partake of the nature of a threat. It suggests to unemployed men: “We know you are unemployed, we know you have no insurance to fall back upon, we know you are hungry, and we are going to take advantage of your necessity to bring down, not only your own rate of wages, but the rates of wages of your more fortunate fellow-

[Mr. Johnson.] workmen." I am afraid it will be received as having been uttered in the nature of a threat. The whip of hunger is being used deliberately and openly by the Government of the day to drive down the rates of wages.

But one has to bear in mind that while road-work is probably, and, I think, certainly the most valuable work that could be done as emergency work, to employ the largest number of unskilled men, there will be large numbers of skilled men in other trades that are not going to be benefited by either of these schemes. I am led to make a remark regarding the bottle-making industry, which both Deputy Byrne and the President referred to. It may be news, but it is a fact, that the company in Ringsend that make bottles by machinery is quite able to compete with imported English bottles. It cannot compete with bottles imported from Germany, and it has applied for, but has not received, the assistance which would have enabled it to carry on business for the last three or four months. It has not received protection against dumping, though it has applied and has made definite proposals in that respect. The end of it has been that this firm of manufacturers, with £100,000 worth of machinery, has had to go into the merchanting business itself by purchasing German bottles and selling them in Ireland to its customers. I do not know how far that is typical of many other industries, but certainly, if the information I have received from the people affected is true—I have the utmost confidence in their statement—it certainly has meant the disemployment of 300 men in the Ringsend district.

I cannot help saying that the Government has not approached this problem as it would have done had there been a military necessity where the resources of the State would have been mobilised for the defence of the State. I say that the civil interest is of equal moment, and I am going to say now that I believe the cant that is talked from all sides about the dole is entirely unjustified. Uncovenanted benefit may not be pleasant. I never hear from employers, merchants, and farmers that overdrafts from banks or public loans are demoralising, and uncovenanted benefit is nothing more than an overdraft from the State to keep men and their families from hunger. I stand for the dole, but I put this condition, and always have put it, that you have a right either to maintain your citizens or offer them reasonable employment. If you cannot offer them that employment you have a right to maintain them, and I guarantee if you make that condition you will find means very much quicker for utilising the unemployed labour of the country. The dole which is so much derided has, of course, had unfortunate consequences because the right condition of alternative employment has not been given. The Dole saved England from premature revolution and, maybe, if something satisfactory is not done here, the absence of the Dole will cause revolution. Unemployment insurance was changed on the distinct understanding, certainly on the distinct hope and expectation, that the normal amount of employment would be available in this country by October and that the normal unemployment fund would meet the ordinary cases of want. That hope has not been fulfilled. I trust that any efforts which the Government are making will remove the necessity for the revival of the uncovenanted benefit. I do not see very much chance of the promises that have been made being fulfilled even if ten or fifteen thousand men are employed on those various schemes. I do not see what is to become of the other 30,000 without something in the nature of uncovenanted benefit. There is no suggestion of a provision to ensure that the volume of actual trade, that is to be done on productive operations, is going to be increased by the employment of road labourers and house builders. I think the proposals of the Government, extensive as they may seem, are not going to be sufficient to remove the distress caused by unemployment. I think that the line the Government is taking, making it a condition of any of these proposals that there should be wage cuts without any guarantee of more employment, is a false line to take, and it will lead to disaster. I see very little hope in it, and I hope that there will be much more consideration of the problem before the Government says that this is its final word on the matter.

The PRESIDENT: I must say that I neither saw nor heard of that letter from the Ringsend Bottle Company to which Deputy Johnson alluded.

THE ADJOURNMENT.

POSITION OF RESIGNED AND DISMISSED R.I.C.

The PRESIDENT: I move the adjournment until January 10th, at 3 o'clock. I suppose it will be in order to wish Deputies a very happy Christmas.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: There is one matter which Deputy Johnson wishes to raise.

Mr. JOHNSON: I will not delay the Dáil for more than a minute. I wish to ask the Minister for Finance if he is ready to lay the Regulations respecting the resigned and dismissed R.I.C. men's compensation upon the table. He promised, I think, on the 4th instant, that within a few days they would be made known but that has not yet been done. I do not desire that the Dáil should leave until we know exactly where we stand in regard to the matter.

Mr. BLYTHE: Before it becomes operative the Order will have to be laid before both Houses and must be approved by Resolution of the Dáil which must consider any recommendations previously made by the Seanad. I had a Conference, I think, the day before yesterday, at which all the points which remained outstanding were agreed to. The Order is now being drafted and will be ready in two or three days. I will have it laid before the Dáil immediately on re-assembly and I will have it laid before the Seanad before that, because I understand that it is likely that the Seanad will meet in the New Year sooner than the Dáil. I think almost immediately after the Dáil re-assembles it will be possible to deal with it.

Mr. JOHNSON : Is that the usual method, that an Order must be voted upon or is it an Order that will lie awaiting any action to be taken by the Dáil and Seanad; it is quite a new procedure, the idea of Orders that have to be voted upon.

Mr. BLYTHE : I have not the Act by me, but I am pretty sure that it is one that has to be voted on. That is my impression.

Mr. JOHNSON : Apart from that, could anything be done for these men in the meantime, as the Minister admitted the other day that there was great distress amongst them, and this is the holiday season? Could he bank on the faith that this Order will be accepted, and pay something on account?

Mr. BLYTHE : I am afraid not. .

Mr. JOHNSON : Then the distress may continue?

Mr. BLYTHE : I am afraid that it is impossible to do anything.

The Dail adjourned at 8.58 p.m. until 3 p.m. on January 10th, 1924.

APPENDIX.

OIREACHTAS EIREANN.

DE CEADAIOIN, 3adh DEIRE FOGHMHAIR 1923.

(WEDNESDAY, 3rd OCTOBER, 1923.)

TUAIRISG OIFIGIUIL.

(OFFICIAL REPORT.)

ORÁID O'N t-SEANASCAL

(ADDRESS BY GOVERNOR-GENERAL.)

Tháinig Oireachtas Eircann le chéile ar 2.15 p.m. Bhí Mícheál Ò hAodha (Ceann Comhairle Dháil Eircann), 'sa chathaoir.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Iarraim anois ar an Oifigeach Teangmhála an Seanascal do thabhairt isteach. I now ask the Officer of Communications to introduce the Governor-General.

HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL then entered (the Ceann Comhairle and the assembled Deputies and Senators rising in their places) and delivered the following speech from the Dais:—

1. I greet you, Members of Oireachtas Eireann, assembled here after the first election by the people since the enactment of the Constitution which enshrines the authority and the powers entrusted to you. Your first Session under that Constitution was one of arduous labour for the building up of the State on secure foundations, and charged 'as I am by His Majesty to associate myself as his representative in your task of Government, I look forward to the labours on which you are now entering, full of hope that your efforts may bear ever-increasing fruit for the welfare of our country.

2. The most notable, as it is one of the most pregnant, of recent events in our history has been the entry of the Irish Free State into Membership of the League of Nations with the unanimous assent of all the States' members and amidst the enthusiasm of their assembled representatives. The visit of your Delegation to Geneva will herald the revival of the ancient associations of this Nation with the other peoples of the world, will enhance our national prestige, and will enable our people to contribute in no small degree to the maintenance of world-peace.

3. Now, a further Conference of Nations has called for your participation, a conference of the States constituting that Confraternity of Nations with which, by virtue of your Treaty with Great Britain, you have become more closely associated. The representatives of your partner States have already accorded to your representatives a generous and whole-hearted welcome which promises a friendly helpfulness in consultation upon problems of common interest.

4. Your past Session was necessarily devoted to a large extent to the enacting of legislation complementary to your Constitution in order to supply the details of the political organisation of the State. The principal one of these measures was the Electoral Act, by which you have brought every adult citizen of the Saorstát into actual participation in the responsibilities of Government and cleared the way for all to play their respective parts and to discharge their duties in the ordering of the life of the Nation. Further measures are necessary to complete our national institutions and to translate into realisation the desire of our citizens for national re-organisation and development. Amongst the measures to be submitted to you will be one providing for the organisation of the great departments of State, the distribution of their functions in a manner calculated to bring about greater efficiency in administration, and the regular Constitution of the Ministries charged with the administration of the various Departments of Government.

5. The Constitution made provision for long-desired reforms in the administration of law and justice. A measure has accordingly been laid before you for the establishment of a judicial system in conformity with the needs of our people, to which your urgent and earnest consideration is asked. Further measures in pursuance of the same object will also be presented to you, including provisions for the reciprocal enforcement of judgments and judicial orders as between this country and the other members of the British Commonwealth in the interests of mutual accommodation in matters appertaining to the administration of justice.

6. Time and opportunity in the past Session did not permit of any but temporary provision being made for a Civil Police Force, and for the Military Defence Forces. Your Gárda Síochána has already grown into an institution which has won the confidence of the people. A Bill will be introduced to give it permanent form and to better define its powers as a Civil Police Force for the protection of public peace and security outside the Metropolitan area.

7. Your Military Defence Forces are passing through a transition period after a struggle in which their gallantry rescued the Nation from chaos. As befits soldiers of the people, they now await the devising by you of their future constitution and establishment, for which purpose a comprehensive measure will be laid before you.

8. Emergency measures were found necessary in the past Session to deal with the existing state of armed rebellion which was, and to some extent still is, supported by crimes of violence and disorder, and to make possible the transition which is happily taking place to normal conditions.

We acknowledge with gratitude the services of the various arms of National defence in putting down the cruel campaign waged against the people. We bear testimony also to the civic spirit which has borne with becoming fortitude the trials inseparable from that campaign. It is our earnest prayer that those persons who have been guilty of crimes against their country in an attempt to defy and over-ride the expressed will of the Nation, and without regard to life, property, or National honour, may be brought to a realisation of their responsibilities and that, desisting from their work of evil, they may apply their energies towards the reparation of the damage they have caused and the restoration of the Nation's resources which they have so sadly depleted.

9. A number of persons is at present detained for reasons of public safety. It is the general hope and prayer that the necessity for seeking extraordinary powers will disappear and that, with a return of goodwill and civic sanity and tolerance of differences of opinion, it may be found compatible with public security gradually to release the majority of those persons.

On your Government, however, devolves the responsibility of protecting the citizens of Saorstát Éireann from any renewal of disturbance or destruction, and they will, should occasion demand, ask your sanction for such legislation as may from time to time be found necessary.

10. The problem of unemployment which confronts us has had the special consideration of your Ministers. They are confident that with stable conditions, enterprise will find many opportunities in this country. Developments are at present hampered by disagreements between employers and employees, to the loss not only of those directly concerned but of the general community. It must be recognised that the conditions of the time prohibit the maintenance of the inflation caused by the European War and artificially prolonged by our domestic strife. High-prices, high profits and high wages can no longer be sustained by a country whose economic life has agriculture as its base and foundation. Those engaged in the production and sale of essential commodities must realise their responsibilities to the general consumer, and your Ministers will vigilantly scrutinise the discharge of this responsibility in the coming winter. A recognition of facts is of the first necessity if industrial friction is to be allayed. Such recognition alone will enable measures to give effect to various proposals for the absorption of labour on constructive work which are being examined to be laid before you. In particular, it is hoped that it may be possible to proceed with the reconstruction of the roads and to make provision for a larger scheme of housing. The legislation you have passed for compensating the owners of destroyed property has been so framed as to encourage expenditure on construction, and it is anticipated that the restoration of damaged or destroyed buildings will soon be generally begun. You will in due course be recommended to make such use of your fiscal powers as close and dispassionate enquiry shows to be best calculated to promote and diffuse prosperity. The practicability of these measures and their ultimate success depend on the co-operation of all parties, and on the sub-ordination of their private interests to the common good. The resources of the Nation are limited and the needs of many of its members great. In such circumstances your Ministers rely with confidence on a fair share of all present burdens being taken by each citizen to the full measure of his or her energy and powers.

11. The reorganisation of our railway systems has for a considerable time exercised the minds of your Ministers and of those charged with the management of the railways, and it is hoped that it may be possible during the present Session to submit proposals calculated to enhance the efficiency of that important service and to reduce its cost.

12. Urgent necessity exists for the enactment of laws relating to merchant shipping and for the adaptation and consolidation of existing legislation, and a measure relating to this important subject will be submitted for your consideration.

13. The problem of land tenure, that great and, as it seemed, perennial obstacle to the economic development of Ireland, has been finally disposed of by the Land Law Act, which alone would have made your past Session notable. That Act makes generous provision for the completion, with the financial assistance of the State, of land purchase, and will secure to the agricultural community enjoyment to the full of the fruits of their toil. It will bring relief to the occupiers of uneconomic holdings and enable them to order their lives and bring up their families in reasonable comfort and security. The execution of the provisions of that Act will be an immediate charge of your newly-appointed Ministry.

14. The encouragement and development of agricultural industries next claim consideration. If existing markets are to be held and made more profitable and new markets opened up, and if the depression which has overtaken agriculture generally in Europe is to be combatted, such measures, with these objects in view, as due and competent consideration may suggest and as are compatible with the economic conditions of the country, will be submitted to you. At an early date your attention will be asked for a Bill for the establishment of a National Brand for butter of high standard, a Bill for regulating the methods of grading eggs and for licensing merchants engaged in that business, as well as a Bill for the improvement of the breed of cattle. You will also be invited to consider a Bill for enabling local authorities to provide land for allotments in urban districts, and a Bill to promote afforestation.

15. The future development of local government administration has been receiving most careful consideration. At a later stage it is proposed to introduce comprehensive legislation to ensure that the work of local authorities may be conducted more effectively and expeditiously and with economies suited to the resources of the rate-payers.

16. Certain necessary legislation dealing with the regulation of Public Holidays, particularly in relation to Elections, with the dates of Local Government Elections, the date of the Revision of the Registers of Voters, the preparation of Jurors' Lists, the collection of Local Rates which have fallen into arrears, and the initiation, maintenance and management of Drainage Schemes, will also be laid before you.

17. The protection of inventions will form the subject of legislation, already promised, which will be introduced in the present Session, for the establishment of a Patent Office and for the Registration of Trade Marks and Designs. A measure will also be presented to regulate the copyright of original works and publications.

18. A Bill codifying and amending the law relating to the supply of Electrical Power and Lighting is in course of preparation.

19. You will be asked to consider proposals for the regularising of Commissions of Enquiry and the definition of their powers with a view to the facilitation of their proceedings.

20. Measures to improve the law relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors are under consideration, and it is hoped that legislation on this matter will be laid before you before the conclusion of the present Session.

21. The various problems connected with education are being closely studied. Many of the widely-demanded reforms in the existing educational systems can be effected by administrative action, and this is being done as far as possible. Legislation is, however, necessary on certain matters, as, for instance, school attendance, the reorganisation of secondary education, the co-ordination of the present disjointed systems, and the provision of medical and dental treatment for school children. Measures dealing with these problems are under consideration and will in due course be presented to you.

22. Estimates of the sums required for the service of Saorstát Eireann for the year ending 31st March, 1925, will be laid before Dáil Eireann in due course, and in accordance with the provisions of your Constitution, and will require your most earnest consideration.

23. The losses and devastation wantonly inflicted on the country dictate a policy of the most rigid economy in every sphere of national life. Your Ministers feel bound to urge not only on every department of State but on every citizen the compelling necessity of husbanding our resources, avoiding waste, and extracting the utmost value from every public and private expenditure.

24. Proposals will be submitted to provide for the repayment of monies borrowed at home and abroad for national purposes leading to the establishment of Saorstát Eireann—a matter which has been the subject of public guarantees—and in this connection to bring the surplus assets of the several loans into account in ease of such national obligation to make such repayment.

25. MEMBERS OF OIREACHTAS EIREANN, it is my earnest prayer that in the labours upon which you are now entering, you may be guided by Divine Providence in the discharge of your task and that your deliberations may redound to the credit, the prosperity, and the peace of our country.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Joint Sitting is now concluded.
